GRave, Learned PLUTARCH, like the glorious Sunne Alone Triumphant in his Radiant Throne,

 Whom Rome or Athens, choicest Nurseries,
 Or other places had brought forth, new Lives. }
 Their crumbled Statues, by all-eating Time, Long since devour'd, Hee re-commends to Fame Their better part, their Splendid Actions, Land and Sea fights, their Consultations, Deep Plots, and Military Stratagems, Close Policies, and that mysterious Gem,
 The Art of Conquering and Governing.
 The Gown and Sword (both justly meriting

 And Him too, b whose breath, Her Trumpet's blown, Happy, Great PLUTARCH, who giv'st them their due,
 And thereby mak'st thy Self Immortal too.
 The Serpentine wreath'd Orb, doth typifie
 And Hieroglyphick out Eternity, That circles Thee, and showres its influence On Them. Yet thy just soul cannot dispense With tainting crimes, both base Detraction, And, Courts-pest, servile Adulation;
 Who equally condemn't; and so mak'st good,
 Their choice, * who being askt, What 'twas they wou'd

 That treat of Humane Learning, they return'd This Answer, 'Twas Thy Works; Thou do'st, they knew,
 In thy unflattering Mirror, clearest shew What steers the World; to th' life do'st represent Vertue and Vice, Reward and Punishment.
 Let Truths out-balance Fictions, and then read What's in Romanza's feign'd, here Verifi'd.
 Whence Nobler Spirits will sublimate their flame;

TO THE Most High and Mighty Princess ELIZABETH,

By the Grace of God, of England, France and Ireland Queen, Defender of the Faith, &c.

Under hope of your Highness Gracious and accustomed Favor, I have presumed to present here unto your Majesty, Plutarchs Lives Translated, as a Book fit to be protected by your Highness, and meet to be set forth in English. For who is fitter to give countenance to so many great States, then such an High and Mighty Princess? who is fitter to revive the dead memory of their Fame, then she that beareth the lively image of their Vertues? who is fitter to Authorize a work of so great Learning and Wisdom, then she whom all do honor as the Muse of the world? Therefore I humbly beseech your Majesty, to suffer the simpleness of my Translation, to be covered under the amplexes of your Highness protection. For, Most Gracious Sovereigne, though this Book be no Book for your Majesties self, who are meetter to be the chief Story, then a Student therein, and can better understand it in Greek, then any man can make it English: yet I hope the common sort of your Subjects shall not only profit themselves hereby, but also be animated to the better service of your Majesty. For among all the prophane Books that are in reputation at this day, there is none (your Highness best knows) that teacheth so much Honor, Love, Obedience, Reverence, Zeal, and Devotion to Princes, as these Lives of Plutarch do. How many examples shall your Subjects read here, of several persons and whole Armies, of Noble and Base, of Young and Old, that both by Sea and Land, at home and abroad, have strained their wits, not regarding their states, ventured their persons, yea cast away their Lives, not only for honor and safety, but also for the pleasure of their Prince?

Then will may the Readers think, if they have done this for Heathen Kings, what should we do for Christian Princes? If they have done this for Glory, what

The Epistle Dedicatory.

Should we do for Religion? If they have done this without hope of Heaven; what should we do; that look for immortality? And so adding the encouragement of these examples, to the forwardness of their own dispositions; what service is there in war, what honor in peace, which they will not be ready to do, for their worthy Queen?

And therefore that your Highness may give grace to the Book, and the Book may do his service to your Majesty. I have Translated it out of French, and do here most humbly present the same unto your Highness, beseeching your Majesty with all humility, not to reject the good meaning, but to pardon the errors of your most humble and obedient subject and servant; who prayeth God long to multiply all graces and blessings upon your Majesty.

and obedient servant

To the Reader.

THE profit of Stories, and the praise of the Author, are sufficiently declared by Amiot, in his Epistle to the Reader: so that I shall not need to make many words thereof. And indeed if you will supply the defects of this Translation, with your own diligence and good understanding: you shall not need to trust him, you may prove your selves, that there is no prophane Study better then Plutarch. All other learning is private, fitter for Universities then Cities, fuller of contemplation then experience, more commendable in Students themselves, then profitable unto others. Whereas Stories are fit for every place, reach to all persons, serve all times, teach the living, revive the dead, so far excelling all other Books, as it is better to see Learning in Noblemens Lives, then to read it in Philosophers writings. Now for the Author, I will not deny but love may deceive me, for I must needs love him with whom I have taken so much pain: but I believe I might be bold to affirm, that he hath written the profitablest Story of all others. For all other were faine to take their matter, as the fortune of the Countries whereof they wrote, fell out: But this man being excellent in wit, learning, and experience, hath chosen the special Acts of the best persons, of the famousst Nations of the world. But I will leave the judgement to your selves. My onely purpose is to desire you to excuse the faults of my translation, with your own gentleness, and with the opinion of my diligence and good intent. And so I wish you all the profit of the Book. Fare ye well.

A M I O T TO THE READERS.

THE reading of books which bring but a vaine and unprofitable pleasure to the Reader, is justly misliked of wise and grave men. Again, the reading of such as do but only bring profit, and make the Reader to be in love therewith, and do not ease the pain of the reading by some pleasantness in the same: do seem somewhat harsh to divers delicate wits, that cannot tarry long upon them. But such Books as yeeld pleasure and profit, and do both delight and teach, have all that a man can desire why they should be universally liked and allowed of all sorts of men, according to the common saying of the Poet Horace:

That he which matcheth profit with delight, Doth win the prize in every point aright.

Either of these yeeld his effect the better, by reason the one runneth with the other, profiting the more because of the delight, and delighting the more because of the profit. This commendation (in my opinion) is most proper to the reading of stories, to have pleasure and profit matched together, which kind of delight and teaching, meeting in this wise Arme in Arme, hath more allowance then any other kind of writing or invention of man. In respect whereof it may be reasonably avowed, that men are more beholding to such good wits, as by their grave and wise writing have deserved the name of Historiographers then they are to any other kind of Writers: because an history is an orderly register of notable things said, done, or happened in times past, to maintain the continual remembrance of them, and to serve for the instruction of them to come.

And like a memory is as a store-house of mens conceits and devices, without the which the actions of the other two parts should be imperfect, and well-near unprofitable: so may it also be said, that an History is the very treasury of mans life, whereby the notable doings and sayings of men, and the wonderful adventures and strange cases (which the long continuance of time bringeth forth) are preserved from the death of forgetfulness. Hereupon it riseth that Plato the wise saith, that the name of History was given to the recording of matters, to stay the fleeting of our memory, which otherwise would be soon lost, and retain little. And we may well perceive how greatly we be beholding unto it, if we do no more but consider in how horrible darkness, and in how beastly and pestilent a quagmire of ignorance we should be plunged: if the remembrance of all things that have been done, and have happened before we were born, were utterly drowned and forgotten. Now therefore I will overpass the excellency and worthiness of the thing it self, forasmuch as it is not onely of more antiquity then any other kind of writing that ever was in the world, but also was used among men, before there was any use of letters at all: because that men in those dayes delivered in their life times the remembrance of things past to their successors, in songs, which they caused their children to learn by heart, from hand to hand, as is to be seen yet in our dayes by the example of the barbarous people that inhabit the new-found Land in the West, who without any records or writings, have had the knowledge of things past, well near eight hundred yeeres afore; Likewise I leave to discourse, that it is the surest, safest, and durablest monument that men can leave of their doings in this world, to consecrate their names to immortality. For there is neither Picture, nor Image of Marble, nor Arch of Triumph, nor pillar, nor sumptuous Sepulchre, that can match the durability of an eloquent History furnished with the properties which it ought to have. Again, I mind not to stand much upon this, that it hath a certain truth in it, in that it alwayes professeth to speak truth, and for that the proper ground thereof is to treat of the greatest and highest things that are done in the world: inasmuch that (to my seeming) the greatest profit thereof is, as Horace saith, that it is commonly called the mother of truth and uprightness; which commendeth it so greatly, as it needeth not elsewhere to seek any authority, or ornament of dignity, but of her very self. For it is a certain rule and instruction, which by examples past, teacheth us to judge of things present, and to foresee things to come: so as we may know what to like of, and what to follow: what to mislike, and what to eschew. It is a Picture, which (as it were in a

table) setteth before our eyes the things worthy of remembrance that have been done in old time by mighty Nations, Noble Kings and Princes, wise Governors, valiant Captaines, and persons renowned for some notable qualities, representing unto us the manners of strange Nations, the laws and customs of old time, the particular affairs of men, their consultations and enterprises, the means that they have used to compass their wishall, and their demeaning of themselves when they were come to the highest, or thrown down to the lowest degree of state. So as it is not possible for any case to rise either in peace or war, in publick or private affairs, but that the person which shall have diligently read, well conceived, and thoroughly remembered Histories, shall find matter in them whereat to take delight, and counsel whereby to resolve himself to take a part, or to give advice unto others, how to choose in doubtful and dangerous cases that which may be for the most profit, and in time to find out to what point the matter will come, if it be well handled: and how to moderate himself in prosperity, and how to cheer up and bear himself in adversity. These things it doth with much greater grace, efficacy, and speed, then the Books of Moral Philosophy do: forasmuch as examples are of more force to move and instruct, then are the arguments and proofs of reason, or their precise precepts; because examples be the very forms of our deeds, and accompanied with all circumstances. Whereas reasons and demonstrations are general and tend to the proof of things, and to the beating of them into understanding: and examples tend to the shewing of them in practise and execution, because they do not onely declare what is to be done, but also work a desire to do it, as well in respect of a certain natural inclination which all men have to follow examples, as also for the beauty of vertue, which is of such power, that whereforever she is seen, she maketh her self to be loved and liked. Again, it doth things with greater weight and gravity, then the inventions and devices of the Poets: because it helpeth not its self with any other thing then with the plain truth, whereas Poetry doth commonly enrich wherewith it rewardeth well-doers, is a very lively and sharpe spur for men of noble courage and gentleman-like nature, to cause them to adventure upon all manner of noble and great things. For books are full of examples of men of high courage and wisdom, who for desire to continue the remembrance of their name by the sure and certaine record of Histories, have willingly yielded their lives to the service of the Common weal, spent their goods, sustained infinite pains both of body and mind in defence of the oppressed, in making common buildings, in establishing of Laws and Governments, and in the finding out of Arts and Sciences necessary for the maintenance and ornament of mans life: for the faithful registering whereof, the thank is due to Histories. And although true Vertue seek no reward for her commendable doings like a hireling, but contenteth her self with the conscience of her well-doing: yet notwithstanding I am of opinion, that it is good and meet to draw men by all means to good doing; and good men ought not to be forbidden to hope for the honour of their vertuous deeds, seeing that honor doth naturally accompany vertue, as the shadow doth the body. For we commonly see, that not to feel the sparks of desire of honor, is an infallible signe of a base, vile, and clownish nature: and that such as count it an unnecessary, needless, or unseemly thing to be praised, are likewise no doers of any thinge worthy of praise, but are commonly men of faint courage, whose thoughts extend no further then to their lives, whereof also they have no further remembrance, then is before their eyes. But if the counsel of old men be to be greatly esteemed, because they must needs have seen much by reason of their long life: and if they that have travelled long in strange Countries, and have had the managing of many affairs, and have gotten great experience of the doings of this world, are reputed for Sage, and worthy to have the reins of great Governments put into their hands: how greatly is the reading of Histories to be esteemed, which is able to furnish us with more examples in one day, then the whole course of the longest life of any man is able to do? Inasmuch that they which exercise themselves in reading as they ought to do, although they be but young, become such in respect of understanding of the affairs of this world, as if they were old and gray headed, and of long experience. Yea though they never have removed out of their houses, yet are they advertised, informed, and satisfied of all things in the world; as well as they that have shortened their lives by innumerable travels and infinite dangers, in running over the whole earth that is inhabited: Whereas on the contrary part, they that are ignorant of the things that were done and come to pass before they were born, continue still as children, though they be never so aged, and are but as strangers in their own native Countries. To be short, it may be truly said, that the reading of Histories is the School of Wisdom, to fashion mens understanding, by considering aduisedly the fate of the world that is past, and by marking diligently by what Laws, Manners, and Discipline, Empires, Kingdoms, and Dominions, have in old time been established, and afterward maintained and increased: or contrariwise changed, diminished, and overthrowen. Also we read, that whensoever the right Sage and Vertuous Emperor of Rome, Alexander Severus, was to consult of any matter of great importance, whether it concerned Wars, or Governments: he always called such to counsel, as were reported to be well seen in Histories. Notwithstanding I know there are that will stand against me in this point, and uphold, that the reading of Histories can serve to small purpose, or none at all, towards the getting of skill: because skill consisteth in action, and is generated by the very experience and practise of things, when a man doth well mark and thoroughly bear away the things that he hath seen with his eyes, and found true by proof, according to the saying of the Ancient Poet Akranius:

My

To the Readers.

My name is Skill, my Syre Experience high,
And Memory bred and brought me forth to light.

Which thing was meant likewise by the Philosopher that said, that the hand is the instrument of skill. By reason whereof it cometh to pass (say they) that such as speak of matters of Government and State, but specially of matters of War by the book, speak but as book Knights, as the French Proverb termeth them, after the manner of the Grecians, who call him a book-Pilot, which hath not the sure and certain knowledge of the things that he speaks of: meaning thereby, that it is not for a man to trust to the understanding which he hath gotten by reading, in things that consist in the deed doing, where the hand is to be set to the work: no more then the often hearing of men talke and reason of painting, or the disputing upon colours, without taking of the pensill in hand, can stand a man in any stead at all to make him a good Painter. But on the contrary part, many have proved wise men and good Captains, which could neither write nor read. Besides this, they alledge further, that in matters of war, all things alter from yeer to yeer; by means whereof the sleights and policies that are to be learned out of books, will serve the turn no more then Adonis that are blown up. According whereunto Cambyles telleth his son Cyrus in Xenophon, that like as in Musick the newest songs are commonly the best liked of for once, because they were never heard of afore: So in the Wars, those policies that never were practised afore, as those that take best success, and commonly have the best effect, because the enemies do least doubt of them. Nevertheless I am not he that will maintain, that a wise Governor of a Common-weal, or a great Captain, can be made of such a person, as hath never travelled out of his study, and from his book: howbeit that which Cicero writeth of Lucius Lucullus, is true, that when he departed out of Rome as Captain General and Lieutenant of the Romanes, to make War against King Mithridates, he had no experience at all of the Wars, and yet afterward he bestowed so great diligence in the reading of histories, and in considering upon every point with the old Captains and men of long experience whom he carried with him, that by the time of his coming into Asia, where he was indeed to put his matters in execution, he was found to be a very sufficient Captain, as appeared by his deeds: insomuch that by those wayes, clean contrary to the common order of War, he discomfited two of the most puissant and greatest Princes that were at that time in the East. For his understanding was so quick, his care so vigilant, and his courage so great, that he needed no long training nor great instruction by experience. And although I grant there have been divers Governors and Captains which by the only force of nature (furthered by long continued experience) have done goodly and great exploits: yet can it not be denied me, but that if they had matched the gifts of nature with the knowledge of learning and the reading of histories, they might have done much greater things, and they might have become much more perfect. For like as in every other cunning and skill wherein a man intendeth to excell: so also to become a perfect and sufficient person to Govern in peace and war, there are three things of necessity required, namely, Nature, Art, and Practise. Nature (in the case we treat of) must furnish us with a good mother-wit, with a body well disposed to endure all manner of travel, and with a good will to advance our selves: Art must give us judgement and knowledge, gotten by the examples and wise discourses that we have read and double read in good Histories: and Practise will get us readinesse, assurednesse, and the ease how to put things in execution. For though Skill be the ruler of doing the deed, yet it is Vertue of the mind which teacheth a man the mean point between the two faulty extremities of too much and too little, wherein the commendation of all doings consisteth. And who-soever he is that goeth about to attain to it by the onely trial of experience, and had rather learn it at his own cost, then at another mans: he may well be of the number of those that are touched by this ancient Proverb, which saith, Experience is the School-mistress of fools: because mans life is so short, and experience is hard and dangerous; specially in matters of war, wherein (according to the saying of Tamachus the Athenian Captain) a man cannot fault twice, because the fautes are so great, that most commonly they bring with them the overthrow of the state, or loss of the lives of those that do them. Therefore we must not tarry for this wit that is won by experience, which costeth so dear, and and is so long in coming, that a man is oftentimes dead in seeking of it before he have attained it, so as he had need of a second life to employ it in, because of the over late coming by it. But we must make speed by our diligent and continual reading of Histories both old and new, that we may enjoy this happiness which the Poet speaketh of:

A happy wight is he that by mishaps
Of others, doth beware of afterclaps.

By the way, as concerning those that say that paper will bear all things: if there be any that unworthily take upon then the name of Historiographers, and do deface the dignity of the story for hatred or favor, mingling any untruth with it: that is not the fault of the History, but of the men that are partial, who do abuse that name unworthily, to cover and cloak their own passions withall, which thing shall never come to pass, if the writer of the story have the properties that are necessary required in a story-writer, as these: That he set aside all affection, be void of envy, hatred and flattery: that he be a man experienced in the affairs of the world, of good utterance and judgement, to discern what is to be said, and what to be left unsaid; and what would do more harme to have it declared, then do good to have it reprov'd or condemned: forasmuch as his chief drift ought to be to serve the Common-weal, and that it is but as a register to set down the judgements and definitive sentences of Gods Court; whereof some are given according according to the ordinary course and capacity of our weak natural reason, and other some go according to Gods Infinite Power and Incomprehensible Wisdom, above and against all discourse of mans understanding, who being unable to reach the bottom of his judgements, and to finde out the first motions and grounds thereof, doe impute the cause of them to a certain fortune, which is nought else but a fained device of mans wit, dazzled at the beholding of such brightness, and confounded at the gazing of so bottomlesse a deep: howbeit, nothing cometh to pass nor is done without the leave of him that is the very right and truth itself, with whom nothing is past or to come, who knoweth and understandeth the very original causes of all necessity. The consideration whereof teacheth men to humble themselves under his mighty hand, by acknowledging that there is one first cause which over-ruleth nature, whereof it cometh, that neither hardiness is alwayes happy, nor wisdom alwayes sure of good success. These so notable commoditie are every where accompanied with singular delight, which proceedeth chiefly of diversity and novelty, wherein our nature delighteth, and is greatly desirous of: because we having an earnest inclination towards our best prosperity and advancement, it goeth on still, seeking in it every thing which it taketh to be goodly, or good in this world. But forasmuch as it findeth not wherewith to content itself under the scope of heaven, it is soon weary of the things that it had earnestly desired before, and so goeth on wandering in the unskilfulness of her likings, whereof she never ceaseth to make a continual changing untill she have fully satisfied her desires, by attaining to the last end, which is, to be knit to her chief felicity, where is the full perfection of all goodliness and goodness. This liking of variety cannot be better relieved then by that which is the finder out and the preserver of time, the father of all novelty, and messenger of antiquity. For if we finde a certain singular pleasure, in hearkening to such as be returned from some long voyage, and do report things which they have seen in strange Countries, as the manners of people, the natures of places, and the fashions of lives, differing from ours: and if we be sometime so ravished with delight and pleasure at the hearing of the talke of some wise, discreet, and well spoken old man, from whose mouth there floweth a stream of speech sweeter then honey, in rehearsing the adventures which he hath had in his green and youthful years, the pains that he hath endured, and the perils that he hath overpassed, so as we perceive not how the time goeth away: how much more ought we to be ravished with delight and wondering, to behold the state of mankind, and the true success of things, which antiquity hath and doth bring forth from the beginning of the world; as the setting up of Empires, the overthrow of Monarchies, the rising and falling of Kingdoms, and all things else worthy admiration, and the same lively set forth in the fair, rich, and true table of Eloquence? And that so lively, as in the very reading of them we see our minds to be so touched by them, not as though the things were already done and past, but as though they were even then presently in doing, and we finde our selves carried away with gladness and grief through fear or hope, well near as though we were then at the doing of them: whereas notwithstanding we be not in any pain or danger, but only conceive in our minds the adversities that other folkes have endured, our selves sitting safe with our contentation and ease, according to those verses of the Poet Lucretius:

It is a pleasure for to sit at ease Upon the Land, and safely for to see How other folkes are tossed on the Seas, That with the blustering winds turmoiled be.
Not that the sight of others miseries Doth any way the honest heart delight:
But for because it liketh well our eyes,
To see harms free, that on our selves might light.

Also it is seen that the reading of Histories doth so hold and allure good wits, that divers times it not maketh them to forget all other pleasures, but also serveth very fitly to turn away their griefs, and sometimes also to remedy their diseases. As for example, we find it written of Aphonius King of Naples, that Prince so greatly renowned in Chronicles for his wisdom and goodness, that being sore sicke in the City of Capua, when his Physicians had spent all the cunning that they had to recover him his health, and he saw that nothing prevailed: he determined with himself to take no more medicines, but for his recreation caused the story of Quintus Curtius, concerning the deeds of Alexander the Great, to be read before him: at the hearing whereof he took so wonderful pleasure, that nature gathered strength by it, and overcame the waywardness of his disease. Whereupon having soon recovered his health, he discharged his Physicians with such words as these: Feare me no more with your Hippocrates and Galene, for they can no skill to helpe me to recover my health: but well fare Quintus Curtius that could so good skill to helpe me to recover my health. Now if the reading and knowledge of Histories be delightful and profitable to all other kind of folke: I say it is much more for great Princes and Kings, because they have to do with charges of greatest weight and difficulties, to be best stored with gifts and knowledge for the discharge of their duties: seeing the ground of stories is, to treat of all manner of high matters of estate, as Wars, battels, Cities, Countries, treaties of peace and alliances; and therefore it seemeth more fit for them, then for any other kind of degrees of men: because they being bred and brought up tenderly, and at their ease, by reason of the great regard and care that is had of their persons (as meet is for so great states to have) they take not so great pains in their youth for the learning of things as becometh those to take which will learn the noble ancient languages, and the painefull doctrine comprehended in Philosophy. Again, when they come to mans estate, their charge calleth them to deal in great affairs, so as there remaineth

no exercise of wit more convenient for them, than the reading of Histories in their owne Tongue; which without paine is able to teach them even with great pleasure and ease, whatsoever the painfull Workes of the Philosophers concerning the Government of Common-wealths, can shew them: to make them skilfull in the well Ruling and Governing of the People and Countries that God hath put under their subjection. But the Work is, that they ever (or for the most part) have such manner of persons about them, as seeke nothing else but to please them by all the waies they can, and there are very few that dare tell them the truth freely in all things: Whereas on the contrary part, an History flattereth them not, but layeth open before their eyes, the faults and vices of such as were like them in greatness of Degree. And therefore Demetrius Phalerius (a man renowned as well for his skill in the good Government of a Common-wealth, as for his excellent knowledge otherwise) counselled Ptolomy, first King of Egypt after the death of Alexander the Great, that he should often and diligently read the Bookes that treated of the Government of Kingdoms, because (said he) thou shalt finde many things there, which thy servants and familiar friends dare not tell thee: Moreover this is another thing, that such great Personages cannot easily travele out of the bounds of their Dominions, to go view strange Countries, as private persons do: because the jealousy of their Estate, and the regard of their Dignity, requires that they should never be in place where another man might command them. And oftentimes for want of having seen the Countries, and knowne the People and Princes that are their neighbours, they have adventured upon Attempts without good ground: To avoid the which, the instruction they may have by the reading of Histories, is one of the easiest and fittest remedies that can be found. And though there were none other cause than only this last, surely it ought to induce Princes to the often and diligens reading of Histories, wherein are written the Heroicall Deeds of Wise and Valiant Men, specially of Kings that have been before them: the consideration whereof may cause them to be desirous to become like them, specially which were of Stately and Noble Courage: because the seeds of Princely Vertues that are bred with themselves, do then quicken them up with an emulation towards those that have been or are equal in Degree with them, as well in respect of Nobleness of Blood, as of Greatness of State, so as they be loth to give place to any person, and much lesse can finde in their hearts to be out-gone in Glory of Vertuous doings. Whereof innumerable examples might be alledged, if the thing were not so well known of it self, that it were much more against reason to doubt of it, than needfull to prove it. Therefore a man may truly conclude, that an History is the School-Mistress of Princes, at whose hand they may without paine, in way of pastime, and with singular pleasure learne the most part of the things that belong to their Office. Now, according to the diversity of the matter that it treateth of, or the order and manner of writing that it useth, it hath sundry names given unto it: but yet among the rest, there are two chiefe kinds. The one, which setteth downe mens doings and adventures at length, is called by the common name of an History: The other, which declareth their natures, sayings and manners, is properly named their Lives. And although the ground of them both do close very neare in one, yet doth the one respect more the Things, and the other the Persons: the one is more common, and the other more private: the one concerneth more the things that are without the man, and the other the things that proceed from within: The one, the events; the other, the consultations: between the which there is oftentimes great odds, according to this answer of the Persian Sirammes, to such as marvelled how it came to passe, that his devices being so politike, had so unhappy successe: It is (quoth he) because my devices are wholly from mine owne invention, but the effects of them are in the disposition of Fortune and the King. And surely among those that ever have taken upon them to write the Lives of Famous men, the chiefe prerogative, by the judgement of such as are clearest sighted, is justly given to the Greek Philosopher Plutarch, born in the City of Chæronea in the Countrey of Bœotia, a Noble man, perfect in all rare Knowledge, as his Workes may well put men out of doubt, if they list to reade them through, who all his life long, even to his old age, had to deal in affairs of the Common-wealth, as he himselfe witnesseth in divers places, specially in the Treatise which he intituled, Whether an old man ought to meddle with the Government of a Common-wealth or not: and who had the hap and Honour to be Schoolmaster to the Emperour Trajan, as is commonly beleev'd, and as is expressly pretended in a certain Epistle set before the Latine translation of his matters of State, which (to say the truth) seemeth in my judgement to be somewhat suspicious, because I finde it not among his Workes in Greeke: besides that it speaketh as though the Booke were Dedicated to Trajan, which thing is manifestly disproved by the beginning of the Booke, and by divers other reasons. Yet notwithstanding, because methinks it is largely and gravely written, and well-beseming him, I have set it down here in this place: Plutarch unto Trajan sendeth greeting: "I know well, that the modesty of your nature was not desirous of Sovereignty, though you have always endeavoured to deserve it by your Honourable conversation: by reason whereof you have been thought so much the worthier of it, as you have been found the further off from all ambition. And therefore I do now rejoyce in your Vertue and my Fortune, if it be so great as to cause you to administer that thing with Justice, which you have obtained by Desert. For otherwise, I am sure you have put your self in hazard of great danger, and me in perill of slanderous tongues, because that Rome cannot away with a wicked Emperour, and the common voice of the people is alwaies wont to cast the faults of the scholars in the teeth of their School-masters: As for example, Seneca is railed upon by slanderous tongues, for the faults of his scholar Iar Nero: The scapes of Quintilians young scholars, are imputed to Quintilian himself: and

"Socrates

"Socrates is blamed for being too milde to his hearers. But as for you, there is hope you shall do all things well enough, so you keep you as you are. If you first set your self in order, and then dispose all other things according to Virtue, all things shall fall out according to your desire. I have set you down the means in writing, which you must observe for the well Governing of your Common-wealth, and have shewed unto you of how great force your behaviour may be in that behalfe. If you thinke good to follow these things, you have Plutarch for the director and guider of your life: if not, I protest unto you by this Epistle, that your falling into danger, to the overthrow of the Empire, is not by the Doctrine of Plutarch. This Epistle witnesseth plainly, that he was the Schoollmaster of Trajan, which thing seemeth to be avowed by this writing of Suidas: he was the Schoollmaster of Trajan, which thing seemeth to be avowed by this writing of Suidas: Plutarch being born in the City of Chærenea in Boeotia, was in the time of the Emperor Trajan, and somewhat before. But Trajan honoured him with the Dignity of Consulship, and commanded the Officers and Magistrates that were throughout all the Countrey of Illyria, that they should not do any thing without his Counsell and Authority. So doth Suidas write of him. And I should not do any thing without his Counsell and Authority. So doth Suidas write of him. And I am of opinion, that Trajan being so wise an Emperor, would never have done him so great Honour, if he had not thought himself beholding to him for some speciall cause. But the thing that maketh me most to beleve it true, is, that the same goodnesse and justice appeared to be naturally imprinted in most of Trajans sayings and doings, whereof the pattern and mould (as a man may terme it) is cast and set down in Plutarchs Morals, so as men may perceive expressly, that the one could well skill to performe rightly, that which the other had taught wisely: For Dion writeth, that among other Honours which the Senate of Rome gave by Decree unto Trajan, they gave him the title of the Good Emperour. And Eutropius reporteth, that even unto his time, when a new Emperour came to be received of the Senate, among the cries of good handsell, and the wishes of good luck that were made unto him, one was; Happier be thou than Augustus, and better than Trajan. Howsoever the case stood, it is very certain that Plutarch Dedicated the collection of his Apophthegmes unto him. But when he had lived a long time in Rome, and was come home again to his own house, he fell to writing of this excellent Work of Lives, which he calleth Parallellon, as much to say, as a compiling or matching together, because he matcheth a Grecian with a Roman, setting down their Lives each after other, and Comparing them together, as he found any likeness of Nature, Conditions, or Adventures betwixt them, and examining what the one of them had better or worse, greater or lesser than the other: which things he doth with so goodly and grave Discourse every where, taken out of the deepest and most hidden secrets of morall and naturall Philosophy, with so sage Precepts and fruitfull Instructions, with so effectfull commendation of vertue, and detestation of vice, with so many goodly allegations of other Authors, with so many fit comparisons, and with so many high inventions; that the Book may better be called by the Name of the Treasury of all rare and perfect Learning, than by any other name. Also it is said, that Theodorus Gaza, a Grecian of singular Learning, and a worthy of the ancient Greece, being asked on a time by his familiar friends (which saw him so earnestly given to his study that he forgot all other things) what Author he had severest choise, if he were at that point that he must needs choise some one to hold him to alone, did answer, that he would choise Plutarch; because that if they were all put together, there was no one both so profitable, and so pleasant to read, as he. Sossius Senecio to whom he Dedicated his Worke, was a Senator of Rome, as witnesseth Dion, who writeth that the three persons whom Trajan most loved and honoured, were Sossius, Parma, and Celsus, insomuch that he caused Images of them to be set up. True it is that he wrote the Lives of many other men, which the spitefulnesse of the time hath bereft us of, among which he himselfe maketh mention of the Lives of Scipio Africanus, and Metellus Numidicus. And I have read a little Epistle of a sonne of his, whose name is not expressed, copied out of an old copy in the Library of St Marke in Venice, wherein he writeth to a friend of his, a Register of all the Books that his Father made: and there among the couples of Lives, he setteth down the Lives of Scipio and Epaminondas, and lastly, the Lives of Augustus Caesar, of Tiberius, of Caligula, of Claudius, of Nero, of Galba, of Vitellius, and of Otho. But having used all the diligence that I could in searching the chiefe Libraries of Venice and Rome, I could never finde them out. Only I drew out certain diversities of readings, and many corrections, by conferring the old Written Copies with the printed Books: which have stood me in great stead to the understanding of many hard places: and there are a great number of them which I have restored by conjecture, by the judgement and help of such men of this age, as are of greatest knowledge in Humane Learning. For all this, there remain some places unamended, howbeit very few, because some lines were wanting in the Originall Copies, whereof (to my seeming) it was better for me to witness the want by marking it with some starre, than to guesse at it with all adventure, or to adde any thing to it. Now finally, If I have overset my self in any thing, as it is very easie to do in so hard and long a Worke, specially to a man of so small ability as I am: I beseech the Readers to vouchsafe for my discharge, to admit the excuse which the Poet Horace giveth me, where he saith:

A man may well be overseen In Workes that long and tedious been.

Specially first that of so many good men, and men of skill, as have heretofore set hand to the translating of it, there was never yet any one found, that went through with it in any Language, at leastwise that I have seen or heard of: and that such as have enterprised to translate it, specially into Latine,

To the Readers.

Latine, have evidently witnessed the hardnesse thereof, as they may easily perceive which list to conferre their Translations with mine. Nevertheless if it is so fortune that men finde not the speech of this Translation so flowing, as they have found some other of mine, that are abroad in mens hands: I beseech the Readers to consider, that the office of a fit Translator consisteth not onely in the faithfull expressing of his Authors meaning, but also in a certain resembling, and shadowing out of the form of his style, and the manner of his speaking: unlesse they will commit the error of some Painters, who having taken upon them to draw a man lively, do paint him long where he should be short, and grosse where he should be slender, and yet set out the resemblance of his countenance naturally. For how harsh or rude soever my speech be, yet am I sure that my Translation will be much easier to my Countrymen, than the Greeke Copy is, even to such as are best practised in the Greeke Tongue, by reason of Plutarchs peculiar manner of inditing, which is rather sharp, learned, and short, than plain, polished, and easie. At the hardest, although I have not compassed my matters so happily as ye would have wished and desired: yet do I hope that your Lordships in reading it will hold the parties good will excused, which hath taken such pains in doing of it to profit you. And if my labour be so happy as to content you, God be praised for it, which hath given me the grace to finish it.

THE LIVES

GREEKS AND ROMANS,
The most of them compared together by that grave and Learned Philosopher and Historiographer PLUTARCH of Chæroneæ.

Ann. Mund.

THESEUS.

Ant. Christi.
1232.

LIKE as the Historiographers which do set forth the description of the Earth in Figure (my Friend Sossius Senecio) are wont to place in the lowermost part of the Mapps, the farre distant Regions unknown unto them, and to mark in the Margent such like Notes and Reasons as these: Beyond these Countries are nothing but deep dry sands without water, full of foul ill favoured venemous beasts; or much mudd unnavigable, or SCYTHIA forsaken for cold, or else the Sea frozen with Ice: Even so in this my History, I could speak of strange things, and more ancient, and further off from mens memory. But herein I have compared the Lives of some Noble men, the one with the other, having followed all those times, whereof the Monuments remain yet so whole, that men may speak of very great likelihood, or rather write a very troth. What hath been written before, is but of strange faynings, and full of monstrous fables, imagined and devised by Poets, which are altogether uncertain, and most untrue. Howbeit having heretofore set forth the Lives of Lycurgus (which established the Laws of the LACEDÆMONIANS) and of King Numa Pompilius, methought I might with reason also ascend unto the time of Romulus, thence I was come to hear unto his time. Wherefore having long debated with my self what Æschylus the Poet said:

Sossius Senecio
a Senator of Rome.

What

*What Champion may with such a man compare?
Or who (think I) shall be against him set?
Who is so bold? or who is he that dare Defend his force in such encounter met?*

In the end I resolv'd to compare him which did set up the noble and famous City of ATHENS, unto him which founded the glorious and invincible City of ROME. Wherein I would have wish'd that the Fables of her Antiquity had been set out so in our writings, that we might yet have graced them with some appearance of Historical narration. But if by chance in some places they range a little too boldly out of the bounds or limits of true appearance, and have no manner of conformity with any credibleness of matter: the Readers in courtesie must needs hold me excused, accepting in good part that which may be written and reported of things so extremely old and ancient. Now surely me thinks, that Theseus in many things was much like unto Romulus. For being both begotten by stealth and out of lawful Matrimony, they were both bruited to be born of the seed of gods.

Both valiant were, as all the world doth know,

Both were very wise and strong besides of body. The one of them built ROME, and the other the City of ATHENS, two of the most noble Cities of the world. The one and the other were ravishers of women, and neither the one nor the other could avoid the mischief of quarrell and contention with their friends, and to defile themselves with the blood of their nearest kinsmen. Moreover, they say that both the one and the other in the end did get the hate and ill-will of their Citizens. At the least if we beleave those things which are left written, and carry greatest shew of troth, Theseus of his Fathers side was descended of the right lineage of Erichtheus the great, and of the first Inhabitants which occupied the Countrey of ATTICA, the which since were called AUTOSTHONES, as much to say, as born of themselves. For there is no memory or other mention made, that they came out of any other Countrey then that. And of his Mothers side he came of Pelops, who was in his time the mightiest King of all the Countrey of PELOPONNESUS, not so much for his goods and riches, as for the number of children which he had. For his Daughters which were many in number he bestowed them on the greatest Lords of all the Countrey; his Sons also which likewise were many he dispersed into every City and Free-Town, finding means to make them Governours and Heads of the same. Pitheus Grandfather to Theseus on the Mothers side, was one that founded the little City of TROEZEN, and was reputed to be one of the best learned and wisest men of his time. But the knowledge and wisdom, which only carried estimation at that time, consisted altogether in grave sentences and moral sayings; as those are which wan the Poet Hesiodus such fame for his Book entituled, The works and daies, in the which is read even at this present this goodly sentence, which they father upon Pitheus:

To hired men, and that without delay.*

And this doth Aristotle the Philosopher himself testifie: and the Poet Euripides also, calling Hippolytus the Scholler of the holy Pitheus, doth sufficiently declare of what estimation he was: But Aegus desiring (as they say) to know how he might have children, went into the City of DELPHES to the Oracle of Apollo: where by a Nunne of the Temple, this notable Prophecie was given him for an answer; the which did forbid him to touch or know any woman, until he was returned again to ATHENS. And because the words of this Prophecie were somewhat dark and hard, he returned by the City TROEZEN, to tell it unto Pitheus. The words of the Prophecie were these:

*O thou which art a gemme of perfect grace, Pluck not the tappe out of thy trusty tunne, Before thou do return unto thy place.

Pitheus understanding the meaning, perswaded him, or rather cunningly by some device deceived him, in such sort, that he made him to lie with his Daughter called Ethra. Aegus, after he had accompanied with her, knowing that she was Pitheus Daughter with whom he had lien, and doubting that he had gotten her with child, left her a Sword and a pair of Shoes, the which he hid under a great hollow stone, the hollownes whereof served just to receive those things which he layed under it, and made no living creature privie to it but her alone; straightly charging her, that if she happened to have a Sonne, under it which he left there; that he should then send him unto him by those Tokens, as secretly as the could, that no body else might know of it: for he did greatly fear the Children of one called Pallas, the which lay in wait and spiall by all the means they could to kill him, only of despite because he had no children, they being fifty brethren, and all begotten of one Father. This done, he departed from her: And Ethra within few months after was delivered of a goodly Sonne, the which from that time was called Theseus: and as some say, so called, because of the Tokens of knowledge his Father had layed under the stone. Yet some others write, that it was afterwards at ATHENS when his Father knew him, and avowed him for his Sonne. But in the mean time, during his infancie and childhood, he was brought up in the house of his Grandfather Pitheus, under the government and teaching of one called Conidas, his Schoolmaster: in honour of whom the ATHENIANS to this day do sacrifice a Weather, the day before the great Feast of Theseus, having more reason to honour the memory of this Governour, then of a Silanian and of a Paribafus, to whom they do honour also, because they painted and cast moulds of the Images of Theseus. Now there was a custome at that time in GREECE, that the young men after their infancie and growth to mans state, went into the City of DELPHES, to offer part of their hairs in the Temple of Apollo. Theseus also went thither as other did: and some say that the place where the ceremony of this Offering was made, hath ever since kept the old name (and yet continueth) Theseia. Howbeit he did not shave his head but before only, as Homer faith, like the fashion of the ABANTES in old time: and this manner of shaving of hairs, was called for his sake, Theseida. And as concerning the ABANTES, in troth they were the very first that shaved themselves after this fashion: nevertheless they learned it not of the ARABIANS, as it was thought of some; neither did they it after the imitation of the MISSIANS; but because they were warlike and valiant men, which did joyn neer unto their enemy in battell, and above all men of the world were skillfull in fight hand to hand, and would keep their grounds as the Poet Archilochus witnesseth in these verses:

*They use no slings in foughren fields to have,
Nor bended bowes: but Swords and trenchant blades.
For when fierce Mars beginneth for to rave
In bloody field, then every man invades His fiercest foe, and fighteth hand to hand:
Then do they deeds, right cruell to recomfort,
For in this wise, the brave and Warlike band
Do shew their force, which come from Negropont.*

The cause why they were thus shaven before, was, for that their enemies should not have the vantage to take them by the hairs of the head while they were fighting. And for this self-same consideration, Alexander the great commanded his Captains to cause all the MACEDONIANS to shave their beards: because it is the easiest hold (and readiest for the hand) a man can have of his enemy in fighting, to hold him fast by the same. But to return to Theseus. Ethra his Mother had ever unto that time kept it secret from him, who was his true Father. And Pitheus also had given it out abroad, that he was begotten of Neptune, because the TROEZONIANS have this god in great veneration, and do worship him as patron and protector of their City, making Offerings to him of their first fruits: and they have for the mark and stamp of their Money, the three pick'd Mace, which is the sign of Neptune, called his Trident. But after he was come to the prime and lustiness of his youth, and that with the strength of his body he shewed a great courage, joyned with a naturall wildome and staydnesse of wit: then his Mother brought him to the place where this great hollow stone lay, and telling him truly the order of his birth, and by whom he was begotten, made him to take his Fathers tokens of knowledge, which he had hidden there, and gave him counsell to go by sea to ATHENS unto him. Theseus easily list up the stone, and took his Fathers tokens from under it: Howbeit he answered plainly, that he would not go by sea, notwithstanding that it was a great deal the safer way, and that his Mother and Grandfather both had instantly intreated him, because the way by land from TROEZEN to ATHENS was very dangerous, all the wayes being beset by robbers and murderers. For the world at that time brought forth men, which for strongnesse in their arms, for swiftnesse of their feet, and for a generall strength of the whole body, did farre passe the common force of others, and were never weary for any labour or travell they took in hand. But for all this, they never employed these gifts of nature to any honest or profitable thing, but rather delighted villanously to hurt and wrong others: as if all the fruit and profit of their extraordinary strength had consisted in cruelty and violence only, and to be able to keep others under and in subjection; and to force, destroy, and spoyl all that came to their hands. Thinking that the more part of those which think it a shame to do ill, and commend justice, equity and humanity, do it of faint cowardly hearts, because they dare not wrong others, for fear they should receive wrong themselves: and therefore, that they which by might could have vantage over others, had nothing to do with such quiet qualities. Now Hercules, travelling abroad in the world, drave away many of those wicked theevish murderers, and some of them he slew and put to death; other as he passed through those places where they kept, did hide themselves for fear of him, and gave place: inasmuch as Hercules perceiving they were well tamed and brought low, made no further reckoning to pursue them any more. But after that by fortune he had slain Iphitus with his own hands, and that he was passed over the seas into the countrey of LYDIA, where he served Queen Omphale a long time, condemning himself unto that voluntary pain for the murder he had committed: all the Realm of LYDIA during his abode there, remained in great peace and security from such kinde of people. Howbeit in GREECE, and all thereabouts, these old mischiefs began again to renew, growing hotter and violenter then before: because there was no man that punished them, nor that durst take upon him to destroy them: By which occasion, the way to go from PELOPONNESUS to ATHENS by land was very perilous. And therefore Pitheus declaring unto Theseus, what manner of theeves they were that lay in the way, and the outrages and villanies they did to all travellers and wayfaring men, fought the rather to perswade him thereby to take his voyage along the seas. Howbeit in mine opinion, the fame and glory of Hercules noble deeds, had long before secretly set his heart on fire, so that he made reckoning of none other but of him, and lovingly hearkened unto those which would seem to describe him what manner of man he was, but chiefly unto those which had seen him, and been in his company, when he had said or done any thing worthy of memory. For then he did manifestly open himself, and he felt the like passion in his heart, which Themistocles long time afterwards endured, when he said; that the victory and triumph of Miltiades would not let him sleep. For even so, the wonderfull admiration which Theseus had of Hercules courage, made him in the night that he never dreamed but of his noble acts and doings, and in the day time, pricked forward with emulation and envy of his glory, he determined with himself one day to do the like; and the rather, because they were near kinmen, being Cousins removed by the mothers side: For Æthra was the daughter of Pisibemus, and Alcmena (the mother of Hercules) was the daughter of Lyfidices, the which was half-sister to Pisibemus, both children of Pelops and of his wife Hippodamia. So he thought he should be utterly shamed and disgraced, that Hercules travelling through the world in that sort, did seek out those wicked thieves to rid both sea and land of them: and that he, farre otherwise, should flye occasion that might be offered him, to fight with them that he should meet on his way. Moreover, he was of opinion, he should greatly shame and dishonour him, whom fame and common bruit of people reported to be his father: if in shunning occasion to fight, he should convey himself by sea, and should carry to his true father also a pair of shoes (to make him known of him,) and a sword not yet bathed in blood. Where he should rather seek cause, by manifest tokens of his worthy deeds, to make known to the world of what noble bloud he came, and from whence he was descended. With this determination, Theseus holdeth on his purposed journey with intent to hurt no man, yet to defend himself, and to be revenged of those which would take upon them to assault him. The first therefore whom he flew within the territories of the City of EPIDAUROM, was a robber called Periphetes. This robber used for his ordinary weapon to carry a clubbe, and for that cause he was commonly furnished Cornyetes, that is to say, a clubbe carrier. So he first strake at Theseus to make him stand: but Theseus fought so lustily with him, that he killed him. Whereof he was so glad, and chiefly for that he had won his clubbe, that ever after he carried it himself about with him, as Hercules did the Lyons skinne. And like as this spoile of the Lyon did witness the greatnesse of the beast which Hercules had slain, even so Theseus went all about, shewing that his clubbe which he had gotten out of anothers hands, was in his own hands invincible. And so going on further, in the freights of PELOPONNESUS he killed another, called Sinnis, furnished Pitycametes, that is to say, a wreather or bower of Pine-apple trees: whom he put to death in that self cruell manner that Sinnis had slain many other travellers before. Not that he had experience thereof, by any former practise or exercise: but onely to shew, that clean strength could do more then either Art or exercise. This Sinnis had a goodly fair daughter called Perigouna, which fled away when she saw her father slain: whom he followed and fought all about. But she had hidde her self in a grove full of certain kinds of wild pricking rushes called Stæbe, and wild Spe-rage, which the simply like a child intreated to hide her, as if they had heard, and had sense to understand her: promising them with an oath, that if they saved her from being found, she would never cut them down, nor burn them. But Theseus finding her, called her, and swore by his faith he would use her gently, and do her no hurt, nor displeasure at all. Upon which promise she came out of the bush, and lay with him, by whom she was conceived of a goodly boy, which was called Menal-ippus. Afterwards Theseus married her unto one Deioneus, the sonne of Egeus the Oecbalian.

Of this Menalippus the sonne of Theseus, came Joxus: the which with Ornytus brought men into the country of CARIA, where he built the City of JOXIDES. And hereof cometh that old ancient ceremony, observed yet unto this day by those of JOXIDES, never to burn the briers of wild Sperage, nor the Stæbe, but they have them in some honour and reverence. Touching the wild savage Sow of Crommyon, otherwise named Phæa, that is to say, overgrown with age: she was not a beast to be made light account of, but was very fierce, and terrible to kill. Theseus notwithstanding tarried for her, and killed her in his journey, to the end it should not appear to the world, that all the valiant deeds he did, were done by compulsion and of necessity: adding thereto his opinion also, that a valiant man should not only fight with men, to defend himself from the wicked:
but that he should be the first, to assault and slay wild hurtfull beasts. Nevertheless others have written, that this Phæa was a woman robber, a murderer, and naught of her body, which spoiled those that passed by the place called CROMMYONIA, where she dwelt: and that she was furnished a Sow, for her beastly brutish behaviour and wicked life, for the which in the end she was slain by Theseus. After her he killed Sciron, entering into the territories of MEGARA, because he robbed all travellers by the way, as the common report goeth: or as others say, for that of a cruell, wicked, and savage pleasure, he put forth his feet to those that passed by the sea side, and compelled them to wash them: And then when they thought to stoop to do it, he still spurned them with his feet, till he thrust them heading into the sea: so Theseus threw him headlong down the rocks. Howbeit the writers of MEGARA impugning this common report, and desirous (as Simonides saith) to overthrow it that had continued by prescription of time, did maintain that this Sciron was never any robber, nor wicked person, but rather a pursuer and punisher of the wicked, and a friend and kinsman of the most honest and justest men of GREECE. For there is no man but will confesse that Æacus was the most vertuous man among the GREECIANS in his time, and that Cyclops the SALAMINIAN is honoured and revered as a God at ATHENS: and there is no man also but knoweth that Pelemus and Telamon were men of singular a vertue. Now it is certain, that this Sciron was sonne in law to Cyclops father in law of Æacus, and grandfather to Pelemus and Telamon, the which two were the children of Endeides, the daughter of the said Sciron, and of his daughter Chariclo. Also it is not very likely, that so many good men would have had affinity with so naughty and wicked a man: in taking of him, and giving him that which men love best of all things in the world. And therefore the Historiographers say, that it was not the first time, when Theseus went unto ATHENS, that he killed Sciron, but that it was many days after, when he took the City of ELEUSIN, which the MEGARIANS held at that time, where he deceived the Governour of the City, called Diocles, and there he flew Sciron. And these be the objections

the MEGARIANS alledged touching this matter. He flew also Cercyon the ARCADIAN, in the City of ELEUSIN, wrestling with him. And going a little further, he flew Damastes, otherwise surnamed Procrustes, in the City of HERMIONIA: and that by stretching of him out, to make him even with the length and measure of his beds, as he was wont to do unto strangers that passed by.
Theseus did that in imitation of Hercules, who punished Tyrants with the self-same pain and torment in wrestling. So he put Cercyon to death, fighting with him man to man. So he brake Terminus head, from whom this Proverb of Terminus evil came, which continueth yet unto this day: for this Terminus did use to put them to death in this sort whom he met; to joll his head against theirs. Thus proceeded Theseus after this self manner, punishing the wicked in like sort, justly compelling them to abide the same pain and torments, which they before had unjustly made others abide. And so he held on his journey until he came to the River of CEPHISUS, where certain persons of the house of the Phyalides were the first which went to meet him, to honour him, and at his request they purified him according to the Ceremonies used at this time: and afterwards having made a sacrifice of propitiation unto their gods, they made him great cheer in their houses: and this was the first notable entertainment he found in all his journey. It is supposed he arrived in the City of ATHENS, the eight day of the month of June, which then they called Cronius. He found the Commonwealth turmoiled with seditions, factions and divisions, and particularly the house of Ægeus in very ill termes also, because that Medea (being banished out of the City of CORINTH) was come to dwell in ATHENS, and remained with Ægeus, whom she had promised off by vertue of certain medicines to make him to get children. But when she heard tell that Theseus was come, before that the good King Ægeus (who was now become old, suspicious and afraid of sedition, by reason of the great factions within the City at that time) knew what he was, she perswaded him to poison him at a feast which they would make him as a stranger that passed by. Theseus failed not to go to this prepared feast whereunto he was bidden, but yet thought it not good to disclose himself. And the rather to give Ægeus occasion and mean to know him, when they brought the meat to the board, he drew out his sword as though he would have cut withall, and shewed it unto him. Ægeus seeing it, knew it straight, and forthwith overthrew the cup with poison which was prepared for him: and after he had enquired of him and asked things, he embraced him as his sonne. Afterwards in the common assembly of the inhabitants of the City, he declared, how he avowed him for his sonne. Then all the people received him with exceeding joy, for the renew of his valiantnesse and manhood. And some say, that when Ægeus overthrew the cup, the poison which was in it, fell in that place, where there is at this present a certain compass inclosed all about within the Temple which is called Delphinion. For even there in that place, in old time, stood the house of Ægeus: in witness whereof, they call yet at this present time the image of Mercury (which is on the side of the Temple looking towards the rising of the Sunne) the Mercury gate of Ægeus. But the PALLANTIDES, which before stood always in hope to recover the Realm of ATHENS, at the least after Ægeus death, because he had no children:
when they saw that Theseus was known, and openly declared for his sonne and heir, and successor to the Realm, they were not able any longer to bear it, seeing that not only Ægeus (who was but the adopted sonne of Pandion, and nothing at all of the blood Royall of the Erethrides) had usurped the Kingdom over them, but that Theseus also should enjoy it after his death. Whereupon they determined to make warre with them both; and dividing themselves into two parts, the one came openly in arms with their father, marching directly towards the City: the other lay close in ambush in the village of GARGETTUS, meaning to give charge upon them in two places at one instant. Now they brought with them an Herald born in the Town of AGNUS, called Leos, who bewrayed unto Theseus the secret and device of all their enterprise. Theseus upon this intelligence went forth, and set on those that lay in ambush, and put them all to the sword. The other which were in Pallas company understanding thereof, did break and disperse themselves incontinently, and this is the cause (as some say) why those of PALLENA do never make affinity nor marriage with those of AGNUS at this day: and that in the Town when any Proclamation is made, they never speak these words which are cried every where else throughout the whole country of ATTICA, Accoute Leos, (which is as much to say as hearken O people) they do so extremely hate this fame word Leos, for that it was the Heralds Name that wrought them that treason. This done, Theseus who would not live idly at home and do nothing, but desirous therewithall to graffie the people, went his way to fight with the Bull of Marathon, the which did great mischief to the inhabitants of the country of TETRAPOLIS. And having taken him alive, brought him through the City of ATHENS, to be seen of all the inhabitants. Afterwards he did sacrifice him unto Apollo Delphius. Now concerning Hecale, who was reported to have lodged him, and to have given him good entertainment, it is not altogether untrue. For in the old time, those Towns and villages thereabouts did assemble together, and made a common sacrifice which they called Hecaleion, in honour of Jupiter Hecalion, where they honoured this old woman, calling her by a diminutive Name, Hecaleina: because that when she received Theseus into her house, being then but very young, she made much of him, and called him by many pretty made Names, as old folks are wont to call young children. And forasmuch as she had made a vow to Jupiter to make him a solemn sacrifice, if Theseus remained safe from the enterprise he went about, and that she died before his return; in recompence of the good cheer she made him, she had that honour done unto her by The-seus commandment, as Philochorus hath written of it. Shortly after this exploit, there came certain of King Minos Ambassadors out of CRETA, to ask a Tribute, being now the third time that it was demanded; which the ATHENIANS paid for this cause. Androgeus, the eldest sonne of King Minos, was slain by treason within the country of ATTICA: for which cause Minos pursuing the revenge of his death, made very hot and sharp warres upon the ATHENIANS, and did them great hurt. But besides all this, the gods did sharply punish and scourge all the country, as well with barrennesse and famine, as also with plague and other mischiefs, even to the drying up of their Rivers. The ATHENIANS perceiving these fore troubles and plagues, ran to the Oracle of Apollo, who answered them that they should appease Minos, and when they had made their peace with him, then the wrath of the gods would cease against them, and their troubles should have an end. Whereupon the ATHENIANS sent immediately unto him, and intreated him for peace: which he granted them, with condition that they should be bound to send him yearly into CRETA, seven young boyes, and as many young gyrls. Now thus farre all the Historiographers do very well agree, but in the rest not. And they which seem furthest off from the troth, do declare, that when these young boyes were delivered in CRETA, they caused them to be devoured by the Minotaur within the Labyrinth: or else that they were shut within this Labyrinth, wandering up and down, and could finde no place to get out, untill such time as they died, even famished for hunger. And this Minotaur, as Euripides the Poet saith, was

A Corps combin'd, which monstrous might be deem'd:

A Boy, a Bull, both man and beast it seem'd.

But Philochorus writeth, that the CRETANS do not confesse that, but say that this Labyrinth was a goal or prison, in the which they had no other hurt, saving that they which were kept there under lock and key, could not flee nor start away: and that Minos had in memory of his sonne Androgeus, instituted games and playes of prize, where he gave unto them that won the victory, those young children of ATHENS, the which in the mean time notwithstanding were carefully kept and looked unto in the prison of the Labyrinth: and that at the first games that were kept, one of the Kings Captains called Taurus, who was in best credit with his master, won the prize. This Taurus was a churlish and naughty natured man of condition, and very hard and cruell to these children of ATHENS. And to verifie the same, the Philosopher Aristotle himself, speaking of the Commonwealth of BOTTEIANS, declareth very well, that he never thought that Minos did at any time cause the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but saith, that they poorly toyled in CRETA, even to crooked age, earning their living by true and painfull service. For it is written, that the CRETANS (to satisfie an old vow of theirs, which they had made of ancient time) sent sometime the first-born of their children unto Apollo in the City of DELPHES: and that amongst them also they mingled those which were defended of the ancient prisoners of ATHENS, and they went with them. But because they could not live there, they directed their journey first into ITALY, where for a time they remained in the Realm of PUGLIA; and afterwards from thence went into the confines of THRACIA, where they had this name of BOTTEIANS. In memory whereof the daughters of the BOTTEIANS in a solemn Sacrifice they make, do use to sing the foot of this Song: Let us to Athens go. But thereby we may see how perilous a thing it is, to fall in displeasure and enmity with a City which can speak well, and where Learning and eloquence do flourish. For ever since that time, Minos was always blazed and disgraced throughout all the Theaters of ATHENS. The testimony of Hesiodus, who calleth him the most worthy King, doth nothing at all help him, nor the praise of Homer, who nameth him Jupiters familiar friend; because the tragicall Poets got the upper hand in disgracing him, notwithstanding all these; and upon their stages where all the Tragedies were plaide, they still gave forth many ill favoured words and foul speeches of him, as against a man that had been most cruell and unnaturall. Yet most men think, that Minos was the King that established the Laws, and Radamanthus the Judge and preserver of them, who caused the same also to be kept and observed. The time being now come about for payment of the third Tribute; when they came to compell the fathers which had children not yet married, to give them to be put forth to take their chance and lot: the Citizens of ATHENS began to murmur against Eggeus, alledging for their griefs, that he who only was the cause of all this evil, was only alone exempted from this grief. And that to bring the government of the Realm to fall into the hands of a stranger his baird, he cared not though they were bereft of all their naturall children, and were unnaturally compelled to leave and forsake them. These just sorrowes and complaints of the fathers whose children were taken from them, did pierce the heart of Theseus, who willing to yeeld to reason, and to run the self same fortune as the Citizens did, willingly offered himself to be sent thither, without regard taking to his hap or adventure. For which the Citizens greatly esteemed of his courage and honourable disposition, and dearly loved him for the good affection he seemed to bear unto the commonalty. But Eggeus having used many reasons and perswasions to cause him to turn and stay from his purpose, and perceiving in the end there was no remedy but he would go, he then drew Lots for the Children which should go with him. Hellanicus notwithstanding doth write, that they were not those of the City which drew Lots for the Children they should send, but that Minos himself went thither in person, and did choose them, as he chose Theseus the first, upon condition agreed between them: that is to wit, that the ATHENIANS should furnish them with a Ship, and that the Children should ship and imbarke with him, carrying no weapons of warre: and that after the death of the Minotaur this Tribute should cease. Now before that time, there was never any hope of return, nor of safety of their children; therefore the ATHENIANS alwayes sent a Ship to convey their Children, with a black saile, in token of assured losse.

Nevertheless

Nevertheless Theseus putting his father in good hope of him, being of a good courage, and promising boldly that he would set upon this Minotaur, Eggeus gave unto the Master of the ship a white saile, commanding him that at his return he should put out the white saile if his sonne had escaped: if not, that then he should set up the black saile, to shew him as farre off his unlucky and unfortunate chance. Simonides notwithstanding doth say, that this saile which Eggeus gave to the Master, was not white, but red, died in grain, and of the colour of Scarlet, and that he gave it him to signifie as farre off their delivery and safety. This Master was called Phereclus Amasias, as Simonides saith. But Philochorus writeth, that Scirus the SALAMINIAN gave to Theseus a Master called Naufibemus, and another mariner to tackle the saile, who was called Phaeas; because the ATHENIANS at that time were not greatly practised to the sea. And this did Scirus, for that one of the Children on whom the Lot fell was his nephew: and thus much the Chappels do testifie, which Theseus built afterwards in honour of Naufibemus, and of Phaeas, in the village of Phalerus, joyning to the Temple of Scirus. And it is said moreover, that the feast which they call Cybernesia, that is to say, the feast of Patrons of the ships, is celebrated in honour of them. Now after the Lots were drawn, Theseus taking with him the Children allotted for the Tribute, went from the Pallace to the Temple called Delphinion, to offer up to Apollo for him and for them an offering of supplication, which they call Hiceteria, which was an Olive bow hallowed, wreathed about with white wool. After he had made his prayer, he went down to the sea side to imbarke, the sixth day of the month of March: on which day at this present time they do send their young girls to the same Temple of Delphinion, there to make their prayers and petitions to the gods. But some say, that the Oracle of Apollo in the City of DELPHES had answered him, that he should take Venus for his guide, and that he should call upon her to conduct him in his voyage: for which cause he did sacrifice a Goat unto her upon the sea side, which was found suddenly turned into a Ramme, and that therefore they surnamed this goddesse Epirragia, as one would say, the goddesse of the Ramme. Furthermore, after he was arrived in CRETA, he flew there the Minotaur (as the most part of ancient Authors do write) by the means and help of Ariadne: who being fallen in fancie with him, did give him a clue of thred, by the help whereof she taught him, how he might easily wind out of the turnings and cranks of the Labyrinth. And they say, that having killed this Minotaur, he returned back again the same way he went, bringing with him those other young children of ATHENS, whom with Ariadne also he carried afterwards away. Phereclus saith moreover, that he brake the keels or bottoms of all the ships of CRETA, because they should not foddainly set out after them. And Demon writeth, that Taurus (the Captain of Minos) was killed in fight by Theseus, even in the very haven mouth, as they were ready to ship away, and hoise up saile. Yet Philochorus reporteth, that King Minos having set up the games, as he was wont to do yearly in the honour and memory of his Sonne, every one began to envy Captain Taurus, because they ever looked that he should carry away the game and victory, as he had done other years before; over and above that, his authority got him much ill will and envy, because he was proud and stately, and had in suspicion that he was great with Queen Pasiphae. Wherefore when Theseus required that he might encounter with Taurus, Minos easily granted it. And being a solemn custom in CRETA, that the women should be present, to see those open sports and fights, Ariadne being at these games, amongst the rest, fell further in love with Theseus, seeing him so goodly a person, so strong, and invincible in wrestling, that he farre exceeded all that wrestled there that day. King Minos was so glad that he had taken away the honour from Captain Taurus, that he sent him home frank and free into his country, rendering to him all the other prisoners of ATHENS: and for his sake clearly released and forgave the City of ATHENS the Tribute, which they should have payed him yearly. Howbeit, Clidemus searching out the beginning of these things to the utmost, reciteth them very particularly, and after another sort. For he saith, about that time there was a general restraint throughout all GREECE, restraining all manner of people to bear saile in any vessell or bottom, wherein there were above five persons, except only Jason, who was chosen Captain of that great ship Argus, and had Commission to saile every where, to chase and drive away rovers and pirats, and to scour the seas throughout. About this time, Dedalus being fled from CRETA to ATHENS in a little Bark, Minos contrary to this restraint, would needs follow him with a fleet of divers vessels with owers; who being by force of weather driven with the coast of SICILIE, fortune to die there. Afterwards his sonne Dencalion, being marvellously offended with the ATHENIANS, sent to summon them to deliver Dedalus unto him, or else he would put the children to death, which were delivered to his father for hostages. But Theseus excused himself, and said he could not forsake Dedalus, considering he was his near kinsman, being his Cofingerman; for he was the sonne of Merope, the daughter of Erichtheus. Howbeit by and by he caused many vessels secretly to be made, part of them within ATTICA it self in the village of Thymetades, farre from any high wayes; and Part of them in the City of TROEZEN, by the sufferance of Pirheus his grandfather, to the end his purpose should be kept the more secret. Afterwards when all his ships were ready, and rigged out, he took sea before the CRETANS had any knowledge of it: inso much as when they saw them as farre off, they did take them for the Barks of their friends. Theseus landed without resistance, and took the haven. Then having Dedalus, and other banished CRETANS for guides, he entred the City it self of GNOSUS, where he flew Dencalion in a fight before the gates of the Labyrinth, with all his guard and officers about him. By this means the Kingdom of CRETA fell by inheritance into the hands of his sister Ariadne. Theseus made league with her, and carried away the young children of ATHENS which were were kept as hostages, and concluded peace and amity between the ATHENIANS and the CRETANS: who promised, and sware, they would never make warres against them. They report many other things also touching this matter, and specially of Ariadne: but there is no troth nor certainty in it. For some say, that Ariadne hung her self for sorrow, when she saw that Theseus had cast her off. Other write, that she was transported by mariners into the Ile of NAXOS, where she was married unto Oenarus the Priest of Bacchus: and they think that Theseus left her, because she was in love with another, as by these verses should appear:

Aegles the Nymph was lov'd of Theseus, who was the Daughter of Panopeus.

Hercules the MAGARIAN saith, that these two verses in old time were among the verses of the Poet Hesiodus, howbeit Pisistratus took them away: as he did in like manner add these other here in the description of the hells in Homer to gratifie the ATHENIANS.

Others hold opinion, that Ariadne had two children by Theseus: the one of them was named Oenopia, and the other Staphylus. Thus amongst others the Poet Jon writeth it, who was born in the Ile of CHIO, and speaking of this City, he saith thus:

Oenopian which was the soune of worthy Theseus, Did cause men build this stately Town, which now triumpheth thus.

Now what things are found seemly in Poets fables, there is none but doth in manner sing them. But one Paenon born in the City of AMATHUNTA, reciteth this clean after another sort, and contrary to all other: saying, that Theseus by tempest was driven with the Ile of CYPRUS, having with him Ariadne, which was great with child, and so fore sea-sick, that she was not able to abide it. In so much as he was forced to put her a land, and himself afterwards returning aboard, hoping to save his ship against the storm, was compelled forthwith to loofe into the sea. The women of the countrey did courteously receive and intreat Ariadne: and to comfort her again (for she was marvellously out of heart, to see she was thus forsaken) they counterfeited Letters, as if Theseus had written them to her. And when her groaning time was come, and she to be layed, they did their best by all possible means to save her, but she died notwithstanding in labour, and could never be delivered: So she was honourably buried by the Ladies of CYPRUS. Theseus not long after returned thither again, who took her death marvellously heavily, and left money with the inhabitants of the Countrey, to sacrifice unto her yearly: and for memory of her, he caused two little Images to be molten: the one of copper, and the other of silver, which he dedicated unto her. This Sacrifice is done the second day of September, on which they do observe this ceremony: they do lay a young Child upon a bed, which pitifully crieth and lamenteth, as women travelling with child. They say also, that the AMATHUNIANS do yet call the grove where her Tombe is set up, the wood of Venus Ariadne. And yet there are of the NAXIANS, that report this otherwise: saying, There were two Minors, and two Ariadnes, whereof the one was married to Bacchus in the Ile of NAXOS, of whom Staphylus was born: and the other the youngest, was ravished and carried away by Theseus, who afterward forsook her, and she came into the Ile of NAXOS with her Nurce called Corcyna, whose grave they do shew yet to this day. The second Ariadne died there also, but she had no such honour done to her after her death, as to the first was given. For they celebrate the Feast of the first with all joy and mirth: where the Sacrifices done in memory of the second, be mingled with mourning and forrow. Theseus then departing from the Ile of Creta, arrived in the Ile of DELOS, where he did sacrifice in the Temple of Apollo, and gave there a little Image of Venus, the which he had gotten of Ariadne. Then with the other young boyes that he had delivered, he danced a kind of dance, which the DELIANS keep to this day, as they say: in which there are many turns and returns, much after the turnings of the Labyrinth. And the DELIANS call this manner of dance, the Crane, as Dicaearchus saith. And Theseus danced it first about the Altar, which is called Ceraton, that is to say, horn-staffe; because it is made and builded of horns only, all on the left hand well and curiously set together without any other binding. It is said also, that he made a game in this Ile of DELOS, in which at the first was given to him that overcame, a branch of Palm for reward of victory. But when they drew near to the coast of ATTICA, they were all joyfull, he and his Master, that they forgot to set up their white sail, by which they should have given knowledge of their health and safety unto Aegleus. Who seeing the black sail afarre off, being out of all hope evermore to see his sonne again, took such a grief at his heart, that he threw himself headlong from the top of a cliff, and killed himself. So soon as Theseus was arrived at the Port named Phalerus, he performed the sacrifices which he had vowed to the gods at his departure: and sent an Herald of his before unto the City, to carry news of his safe arrivall. The Herald found many of the City mourning the death of King Aegleus. Many other received him with great joy, as may be supposed. They would have crowned him also with a garland of flowers, for that he had brought so good tydings, that the Children of the City were returned in safety. The Herald was content to take the garland, yet would he not in any wise put it on his head, but did wind it about his Herald's rod he bare in his hand, and so returned forthwith to the sea, where Theseus made his sacrifices. Who perceiving they were not yet done, did refuse to enter into the Temple, and stayed without for troubling of the sacrifices. Afterwards all ceremonies finished, he went went in and told him the news of his fathers death. Then he and his company mourning for sorrow, halted with speed towards the City. And this is the cause, why to this day, at the feast called Osseophoria (as who would say the feast of boughs) the Herald hath not his head, but his rod only crowned with flowers, and why the assistants also after the Sacrifice done, do make such cries and exclamations: Eli, leuf, ion, ion: whereof the first is the cry and voice they commonly use to another to make haste, or else it is the foot of some song of Triumph: and the other is the voice and cry of men as it were in fear and trouble. After he had ended the Obsequies and Funerals for his Father, he performed all his Sacrifices unto Apollo, which he had vowed, the seventh day of the month of October, on which they arrived at their return into the City of ATHENS. Even so the custom which they use at this day to feeth all manner of pulse, cometh of this: that those which then returned with Theseus, did feethe in a great brasse pot all the remain of their provision, and therewith made good cheer together. Even in such sort as this come up the custom to carry a branch of Olive, wreathed about with wool, which they call Iresione: because at that time they carried boughs of supplication, as we have told you before. About which they hang all sorts of fruits: for then barrenness did cease, as the verses they sang afterwards did witnesse.

*Bring him good Bread that is of sweety taste, With pleasant Figs, and drops of dulcet mell:
Then simple Oyl, his body for to baste,
And pure good Wine, to make him sleep full well.*

Howbeit there are some which will say, that these verses were made for the Heraclides, that is to say, those that descended from Hercules: which flying for their safety and succour unto the ATHENIANS, were entertained and much made of by them for a time. But the most part hold opinion, they were made upon the occasion aforesaid. The vessell in which Theseus went and returned, was a Galliot of thirty oars, which the ATHENIANS kept until the time of Demetrius the Phalerian, always taking away the old pieces of wood that were rotten, and ever renewing them with new in their places. So that ever since, in the disputations of the Philosophers touching things that increase, to wit, whether they remain always one, or be made others: this Galliot was always brought in for example of doubt. For some maintained, that it was still one vessell: others to the contrary defended it was not so. And they hold opinion also, that the feast of boughs which is celebrated at ATHENS at this time, was then first of all instituted by Theseus. It is said moreover, that he did not carry all the wenches upon whom the Lots did fall, but chose two fair young boyes, whose faces were sweet and delicate as maidens be, that otherwise were hardy and quick-spirited: but he made them so oft bathe themselves in hot bathes, and keep them from the heat of the Sunne, and so many times to wash, annoint, and rub themselves with Oyls, which serve to supple and smooth their skins, to keep fresh and fair their colour, to make yellow and bright their hairs: and withall did teach them so to counterfet the speech, countenance and fashion of young maids, that they seemed to be like them, rather than young boyes: For there was no manner of difference to be perceived outwardly, and he mingled them with the gyrls, without the knowledge of any man. Afterwards when he was returned, he made a procession, in which both he and the other young boyes were apparelled then, as they be now which carry boughs on the day of the feast in their hands. They carry them in the honour of Bacchus and Ariadne, following the fable that is told of them: or rather because they returned home just at the time and season, when they gather the fruit of those trees. There are women which they call Deiphophores, that is to say, supper-carriers, which are assistants to the Sacrifice done that day, in representing the Mothers of those upon whom the Lots did fall, because they in like sort brought them both meat and drink. There they tell tales, for so did their Mothers tattle to their children to comfort and encourage them. All these particularities were written by Demon the Historiographer. There was moreover a place chosen out to build him a Temple in: and he himself ordained, that those houses which had paid tribute before unto the King of Creta, should now yearly thenceforth become contributors towards the charges of a solemn Sacrifice, which should be done in the honour of him: and he did assign the order and administration of the same, unto the house of the Phyalides, in recompence of the curtesie which they shewed him when he arrived. Furthermore after the death of his Father Aegleus, he undertook a marvellous great enterprise: for he brought all the inhabitants of the whole Province of ATTICA, to be within the City of ATHENS, and made them all one Corporation, which were before dispersed into divers Villages, and by reason thereof were very hard to be assembled together, when occasion was offered to establish any Order concerning the common State. Many times also they were at variance together and by the ears, making warres one upon another. But Theseus took the pains to go from village to village, and from family to family, to let them understand the reasons why they should consent unto it. So he found the poor people and private men ready to obey and follow his will, but the rich, and such as had authority in every village, all against it. Nevertheless he won them, promising that it should be a Commonwealth, and not subject to the power of any sole Prince, but rather a popular State. In which he would only reserve to himself the charge of the Warres, and the preservation of the Laws: for the rest, he was content that every Citizen in all, and for all should bear a like sway and authority. So there were some that willingly granted thereto. Other who had no liking thereof, yielded notwithstanding for fear of his displeasure and power; which then was very great. So they thought it better to consent with good will, unto that he required, then to tarry his forcible compulsion. Then he caused all the places where Justice was ministred, and all their Halls of assembly to be overthrown and pulled down: He removed straight all all Judges and Officers, and built a Town-house, and a Counsell-hall, in the place where the City now standeth, which the ATHENIANS call ASTY; but he called the whole Corporation of them, ATHENS. Afterwards he instituted the great Feast and common Sacrifice for all the Countrey of ATTICA, which they call Panathenaea. Then he ordained another Feast also upon the sixteenth day of the moneth of June, for all strangers which should come to dwell in ATHENS, which was called Metacia, and is kept even to this day. That done, he gave over his Regall power according to his promise, and began to set up an Estate or policy of a Commonwealth, beginning first with the service of the gods. To know the good successe of his enterprife, he sent at the very beginning to the Oracle of Apollo in DELPHES, to enquire of the fortune of this City: from whence this Answer was brought unto him:

*O thou which art the Sonne of Aegæus, Begot by him on Pithæus Daughter dear:
The mighty Jove, my Father glorious,
By his decree hath said there shall appear A fat all end of every City here.
Which end he will shall also come adown, Within the Walls of this thy stately Town.
Therefore shew thou, a valiant constant minde,
And let no care, nor eare thy heart displease:
For like unto a bladder blown with Winde Thou shalt be tost, upon the surging Seas, Yet let not dunt of dolours thee displease.
For why? thou shalt, not perishe nor decay, Nor be overcome, nor yet be cast away.*

It is found written also, that Sibylla afterwards gave out such a like Oracle over the City of ATHENS:

The bladder blown may fleet upon the fludde, But cannot sink, nor stick in filthy mudd.

Moreover, because he would further yet augment his people, and enlarge his City, he enticed many to come and dwell there, by offering them the self same freedom and priviledges which the naturall born Citizens had. So that many judge, that these words which are in use at this day in ATHENS, when any open Proclamation is made, All people, come ye hither: be the self same which Theseus then caused to be proclaimed, when he in that sort did gather a people together of all Nations. Yet for aught that, he suffered not the great multitude that came thither tagge and ragge, to be without distinction of degrees and orders. For he first divided the Noblemen from Husbandmen and Artificers, appointing the Noblemen as Judges and Magistrates to judge upon matters of Religion, and touching the service of the gods: and of them also he did chuse Rulers, to bear civill Office in the Commonwealth, to determine the Law, and to tell all holy and divine things. By this means he made the Noblemen and the two other estates equall in voice. And as the Noblemen did passe the other in honour, even so the Artificers exceeded them in number, and the Husbandmen them in profit. Now that Theseus was the first who of all others yielded to have a Commonwealth or popular Estate (as Aristotle saith) and did give over his Regall power: Homer himself seemeth to testify it, in numbering the Ships which were in the GRÆCIANS Army before the City of TROIA. For amongst all the GRÆCIANS, he onely calleth the ATHENIANS People. Moreover Theseus coyned Money, which he marked with the stamp of an Oxe, in memory of the Bull of Mrrathon, or of Taurus the Captain of Minos, or else to provoke his Citizens to give themselves to labour. They say also that of this Money they were since called Hecatombion, and Decabion, which signifieth worth an hundred Oxen, and worth ten Oxen. Furthermore having joynd all the territory of the City of MEGARA unto the country of ATTICA, he caused that notable four-square Pillar to be set up for their confines within the strait of PELOPONNESUS; and engraved thereupon this superscription, that declareth the separation of both the countries which confine there together. The superscription is this:

*Where Titan doth begin, his beams for to display, Even that way stands Ionia, in fertile wife alway:
And where again he goeth, adown to take his rest, There stands Peloponnesus land, for there I count it West.*

It was he also which made the Games called Isthmia, after the imitation of Hercules, to the end that as the GRÆCIANS did celebrate the Feast of Games called Olympia, in the honour of Jupiter, by Hercules ordinance: so, that they should also celebrate the Games called Isthmia, by his order and institution, in the honour of Neptune. For those that were done in the Straights in the honour of Melicerta, were done in the night, and had rather form of Sacrifice or of a mytery, then of Games and open Feast. Yet some will say, that these Games of Isthmia were instituted in the honour and memory of Sciron, and that Theseus ordained them in satisfaction of his death; because he was his Cousin-germain, being the Sonne of Canethus, and of Heniocha the Daughter of Pithæus. Other say that it was Sinis and not Sciron, and that for him Theseus made these Games, and not for the memory of the other. Howsoever it was, he specially willed the CORINTHIANS, that they should give unto those that came from ATHENS to see their Games of Isthmia, so much place to sit down before them (in the most honourable part of the feast place) as the saile of their ship should cover, in the

the which they came from ATHENS: thus do Hellanicus and Androm. Halicarnassensis write hereof. Touching the voyage he made by the sea Maior, Philochorus, and some others hold opinion; that he went thither with Hercules against the AMAZONES: and that to honour his valiantnesse, Hercules gave him Antiopa the AMAZONE. But the more part of the other Historiographers, namely Hellanicus, Pherecides, and Herodotus, do write, that Theseus went thither alone, after Hercules voyage, and that he took this AMAZONE prisoner; which is likeliest to be true. For we do not finde that any other who went this journey with him, had taken any AMAZONE prisoner besides himself. Bion also the Historiographer, notwithstanding this faith, that he brought her away by deceit and stealth. For the AMAZONES (saith one) naturally loving men, did not flee at all when they saw them land in their countrey, but sent them presents, and that Theseus enticed her to come into his Ship, who brought him a present: and so soon as she was aboard, he hoysed his sayl, and so carried her away. Another Historiographer Menecrates, who wrote the History of the City NICEA in the country of BYTHINIA, saith: That Theseus having this AMAZONE Antiopa with him, remained a certain time upon those coasts, and that amongst other he had in his company three younger brethren of ATHENS, Ennimus, Thous, and Solois. This last, Solois, was marvellously in love with Antiopa, and never bewrayed it to any of his other companions, saving unto one with whom he was most familiar, and whom he trusted best: so that he reported this matter unto Antiopa. But the utterly rejected his suit, though otherwise he handled it wisely and courteously, and did not complain to Theseus of him. Howbeit the young man despairing to enjoy his love, took it so inwardly, that desperately he leapt into the River, and drowned himself. Which when Theseus understood, and the cause also that brought him to this desparation and end, he was very fory, and angry also. Whereupon he remembered a certain Oracle of Pythia, by whom he was commanded to build a City in that place in a strange countrey, where he should be most fory, and that he should leave some that were about him at that time, to govern the same. For this cause therefore he built a City in that place, which he named PYTHOPOLIS, because he built it onely by the commandment of the Nunne Pythia. He called the River in the which the young man was drowned, Solois, in memory of him: and left his two Brethren for his Deputies and as Governours of this new City, with another Gentleman of ATHENS, called Hermus. Hereof it cometh, that at this day the PYTHOPOLITANS call a certain place of their City, Hermus house. But they faile in the accent, by putting it upon the last syllable: for in pronouncing it so, Hermus signifieth Mercury. By this means they do transerre the honour due to the memory of Hermus, unto the god Mercury. Now hear what was the occasion of the warres of the AMAZONES, which me thinks was not a matter of small moment, nor an enterprife of a woman. For they had not placed their Camp within the very City of ATHENS, nor had not fought in the very place it self (called PNYCE) adjoining to the Temple of the Muses, if they had not first conquered or subdued all the countrey thereabouts: neither had they all come at the first, so valiantly to assaile the City of ATHENS. Now whether they came by land from so farre a countrey, or that they passed over an arme of the sea, which is called Bosphorus Cimmericus, being frozen as Hellanicus saith, it is hardly to be credited. But that they camped within the precinct of the very City it self, the names of the places which continue yet to this present day do witness it, and the graves also of the women which died there. But so it is, that both Armies lay a great time one in the face of the other, ere they came to battell. Howbeit at the length Theseus having first made Sacrifice unto Feare the goddess, according to the counsell of a Prophecy he had received, he gave them battell in the moneth of August, on the same day, in the which the ATHENIANS do even at this present day solemnise the Feast, which they call Boedromia. But Clidemus the Historiographer, defining particularly to write all the circumstances of this encounter, saith; that the left point of their battell bent towards the place which they call AMAZONION: and that the right point marched by the side of CHRYSA, even to the place which is called PNYCE, upon which the ATHENIANS coming towards the Temple of the Muses, did first give their charge. And for proof that this is true, the graves of the women which died in the first encounter, are found yet in the great street, which goeth towards the gate Piræica, near unto the Chappell of the little god Chalcodus, And the ATHENIANS (saith he) were in this place repulld by the AMAZONES, even to the place where the Images of Eumenides are; that is to say, of the Furies. But on the other side also, the ATHENIANS coming towards the quarters of Palladium, Ardetus, and Lucium, drave back their right point even to within their Camp, and slew a great number of them. Afterwards, at the end of four moneths, peace was taken between them by means of one of the women called Hyppolita. For this Historiographer calleth the AMAZONE which Theseus married, Hyppolita, and not Antiopa. Nevertheless, some say that she was slain (fighting on Theseus side) with a dart, by another called Molpadia. In memory whereof the Pillar which is joynd to the Temple of the Olympian ground, was set up in her honour. We are not to marvell, if the history of things so ancient, be found so diversly written. For there are also that write, that Queen Antiopa, sent those secretly which were hurt then into the City of CALCIDE, where some of them recovered, and were healed: and others also died; which were buried neare to the place called AMAZONION. Howsoever it was, it is most certain that this warre was ended by agreement: For a place adjoining to the Temple of Theseus, doth bear record of it, being called Orcomisum: because the peace was there by solemne oath concluded. And the Sacrifice also doth truly verifie it, which they have made to the AMAZONES, before the Feast of Theseus, long time out of minde. They of MEGARA also do shew a Tombe of the AMAZONES in their City, which is as they go from the market place; to the place they call Rhus; where they finde an ancient Tombe;

Tombe, cut in forme and fashion of a losenge. They say that there died other of the AMAZONES also, neare unto the City of CHÆRONEA, which were buried all along the little brook passing by the same, which in the old time (in mine opinion) was called Thermodon, and is now named Hemon, as we have elsewhere written in the Life of Demosthenes. And it seemeth also, that they did not passe through THESSALY without fighting: for there are seen yet of their Tombs all about the City of SCOTUSA, hard by the rocks which he called the Doggs-head. And this is that which is worthy memory (in mine opinion) touching the warres of these AMAZONES. How the Poet telleth, that the AMAZONES made warres with Thefeus to revenge the injury he did to their Queen Antiope, refusing her, to marry with Phadra: and for the murder which he telleth that Hercules did, that me thinks is altogether but a device of Poets. It is very true, that after the death of Antiope, Thefeus married Phadra, having had before of Antiope a Sonne called Hippolitus, or as the Poet Pindarus writeth, Demophon. And for that the Historiographers do not in any thing speak against the tragically Poets, in that which concerneth the ill happe that chanced to him, in the persons of this his Wife, and of his Sonne: we must needs take it to be so, as we finde it written in the Tragedies. And yet we finde many other reports touching the marriages of Thefeus, whose beginnings had no great good honest ground, neither fell out their ends very fortunate: and yet for all that they make no Tragedies of them, neither have they been played in the Theaters. For we reade that he took away Auxo, the TROEZENIAN, and that after he had killed Sinnis and Cercyon, he took their Daughters perforce: and that he did also marry Pherebea the Mother of Ajax, and afterwards Pherebea, and Joppa the Daughter of Iphicles. And they blame him much also, for that he so lightly forsook his Wife Ariadne, for the love of Egle the Daughter of Panopeus, as we have recited before. Lastly, he tooke away Hellen: which ravishment filled all the Realme of ATTICA with warres, and finally was the very occasion that forced him to forsake his country, and brought him at length to his end, as we will tell you hereafter. Albeit in his time other Princes of GRECE had done many goodly and notable exploits in the warres, yet Herodorus is of opinion, that Thefeus was never in any one of them: saving that he was at the battell of the Lapiths against the Centauri. Others say to the contrary, that he was at the journey of Calchide with Jason, and that he did help Melaeager to kill the wild Bore of Calydonia: from whence (as they say) this Proverbe came: Not without Thefeus: meaning that such a thing was not done without great helpe of another. Howbeit it is certain that Thefeus selfe did many famous acts, without aide of any man, and that for his valiantnesse this Proverbe came in use, which is spoken: This is another Thefeus. Also he did helpe Adrastus King of the ARGIVES, to recover the bodies of those that were slaine in the battell, before the City of THEBES. Howbeit it was not, as the Poet Euripides saith, by force of armes, after he had overcome the THEBANS in battell; but it was by composition: And thus the greatest number of the most ancient writers do declare it. Furthermore, Philochorus writeth, that this was the first treaty that ever was made to recover the dead bodies slain in battell: Neverthelesse we reade in the histories and gifts of Hercules, that he was the first that ever suffered his enemies to carry away their dead bodies, after they had been put to the sword. But whosoever he was, at this day in the village of ELEUTHERES, they do shew the place where the people were buried, and where Princes Tombs are seen about the City of ELEUSIN, which he made at the request of Adrastus. And for testimony hereof, the Tragedy Æschylus made of the ELEUSINIANS, where he causeth it to be spoken even thus to Thefeus himselfe, doth clearly overthrow the petitioners in Euripides. Touching the friendship betwixt Pirithous and him, it is said it began thus: The renowne of his valiancy was marvellously blown abroad through all GRECE, and Pirithous desirous to know it by experience, went even of purpose to invade his country, and brought away a certain booty of Oxen of his taken out of the country of MARATHON. Thefeus being advertised thereof, armed straight, and went to the rescue. Pirithous hearing of his coming, fled not at all, but returned back suddenly to meet him. And so soon as they came to see one another, they both wondred at each others beauty and courage, and so had they no desire to fight. But Pirithous reaching out his hand first to Thefeus, said unto him; I make your selfe judge of the damage you have sustained by my invasion, and with all my heart I will make such satisfaction, as it shall please you to asseffe it at. Thefeus then did not only release him of all the damages he had done, but also requested him he would become his friend, and brother in armes. Hereupon they were presently sworn brethren in the field: after which oath betwixt them, Pirithous married Deidamia, and sent to pray Thefeus to come to his marriage, to visit his country, and to make merry with the Lapiths. He had bidden also the Centauri to the feast: who being drunk, committed many lewd parts, even to the forcing of women. Howbeit the Lapiths chastised them so well, that they slew some of them presently in the place, and drave the rest forwards out of the country by the help of Thefeus, who armed himselfe, and fought on their side. Yet Herodorus writeth the matter somewhat contrary, saying, that Thefeus went not at all untill the warre was well begun: and that it was the first time that he saw Hercules, and spake unto him neare unto the City of TRACHINA, when he was then quiet, having ended all his farre voyages and greatest troubles. They report that this meeting together was full of great cheere, much kindnesse, and honourable entertainment betwene them, and great curtesie was offered to each other. Neverthelesse me thinks we should give better credit to those writers that say they met many times together, and that Hercules was accepted and received into the brotherhood of the myteries of ELEUSIN, by the means of the countenance and favour which Thefeus shewed unto him: and that his purification also was thereby allowed of, who was to be purged of necessity of all his ill deeds and cruelties, before he could enter into the

the company of those holy myteries. Furthermore, Thefeus was fifty yeares old when he took away Hellen and ravished her, which was very young, and not of age to be married, as Hellanicus saith. By reason whereof, some seeking to hide the ravishment of her as a haynous fact, do report it was not he, but one Idas and Lyncus that carried her away, who left her in his custody and keeping: and that Thefeus would have kept her from them, and would not have delivered her to her Brethren Castor and Pollux, which afterwards did demand her againe of him. Others againe say, it was her owne Father Tyndarus, who gave her to keep, for that he was afraid of Enarphoborus the Sonne of Hippocoon, who would have had her away by force. But that which cometh nearest to the troth in this case, and which indeed by many Authours is testified, was in this sort. Thefeus and Perithous went together to the City of LACEDÆMON, where they took away Hellen (being yet very young) even as she was dancing in the Temple of Diana, surnamed Oribia: and they fled for life. They of LACEDÆMON sent after her, but those that followed went no further then the City of TEGEA. Now when they were escaped out of the Countrey of PELOPONNESUS, they agreed to draw Lots together, which of them two should have her, with condition that whose Lot it was to have her, he should take her to his Wife, and should be bound also to helpe his Companion to get him another. It was Thefeus hap to light upon her, who carried her to the City of APHIDNES, because she was yet too young to be married. Whither he caused his Mother to come to bring her up, and gave his Friend called Aphidnes the charge of them both, recommending her to his good care, and to keep it so secretly, that no body should know what was become of her. Because he would do the like for Perithous (according to the agreement made betwixt them) he went into EPIRUS with him to steale the Daughter of Aidonius, King of the MOLOSSIANS, who had surnamed his Wife Proserpina, his Daughter Proserpina, and his Dogge Cerberus, with whom he made them fight which came to aske his Daughter in marriage, promising to give her to him that should overcome his Cerberus. But the King understanding that Perithous was come, not to request his Daughter in marriage, but to steale her away, he tooke him Prisoner with Thefeus: and as for Perithous, he caused him presently to be torne in pieces with his Dogge, and shut Thefeus up in close prison. In the mean time there was one at ATHENS called Menestheus, the Sonne of Petus: which Petus was the Sonne of Orneus, and Orneus was the Sonne of Erichonius. This Menestheus was the first that began to flatter the people, and did seeke to win the favour of the commonalty, by sweet enticing words: by which device he stirred up the chieft of the City against Thefeus (who indeed long before began to be weary of him) by declaring unto them how Thefeus had taken from them their Royalties and Signiories, and had shut them up in such sort within the walls of a City, that he might the better keep them in subjection and obedience in all things, after his will. The poore inferiour sort of people he did stirre up also to Rebellion, perswading them that it was no other then a dreame of Liberty that was promised them: and how contrariwise they were clearly dispossessed and thrown out of their owne houses, of their Temples, and from their naturall places where they were borne, to the end onely that of many good and loving Lords which they were wont to have before, they should now be compelled to serve one onely head, and a strange Lord. Even as Menestheus was very hot about this practise, the Warre of the Tyndarides fell out at that instant, which greatly furthered his pretence. For these Tyndarides (to wit the Children of Tyndarus) Castor and Pollux, came down with a great Army against the City of ATHENS: and some suspect sore that Menestheus was cause of their coming thither. Howbeit at the first entry they did no hurt at all in the country, but only demanded restitution of their Sister. To whom the Citizens made answer, that they knew not where she was left: and then the Brethren began to make spoile, and offer warre indeed. Howbeit there was one called Academos, who having knowledge (I cannot tell by what meane) that she was secretly hidden in the City of APHIDNES, revealed it unto them. By reason whereof the Tyndarides did alwayes honour him very much, so long as he lived, and afterwards the LACEDÆMONIANS, having oft burnt and destroyed the whole country of ATTICA throughout, they would yet never touch the Academie of ATHENS for Academos sake. Yet Dicæarchus saith, that in the Army of the Tyndarides there were two ARCADIANS, Echedemus and Marathus, and how of the Name of one of them, it was then called the place of Echedemus, which sithence hath been called Academia: and after the Name of the other, there was a Village called MARATHON, because he willingly offered himselfe to be sacrificed before the battell as obeying the order and commandement of a Prophecie. So they went and pitched their Camp before the City of APHIDNES, and having won the battell and taken the City by assault, they razed the place. They say that Alycus, the Sonne of Sciron was slain in this field, who was in the Hoast of the Tyndarides, and that after his Name, a certaine quarter of the Territory of MEGARA, was called Alycus, in the which his body was buried. Howbeit Hecæus writeth, that Thefeus selfe did kill him before APHIDNES: In witnesse whereof he alledgeth certaine verses which speake of Alycus.

While as he sought with all his might and maine
In thy defence faire Hellen for to fight, In Aphidnes upon the pleasant plaine, Bold Thefeus to cruell death him dight.

Howbeit it is not likely to be true, that Thefeus being there, the City of APHIDNES, and his Mother also were taken. But when it was wonne, they of ATHENS began to quake for feare, and Menestheus counselled them to receive the Tyndarides into the City, and to make them good cheer, so they would make no warres but upon Thefeus, which was the first that had done the wrong and injury: and that to all other else they should shew favour and good will. And so it fell out. For when the Tyndarides had all in their power to doe as they list'd, they demanded nothing else but that they might be received into their Corporation, and not to be reckoned for strangers, no more then Hercules was : the which was granted the Tyndarides, and Aphidnus did adopt them for his Children, as Pylus had adopted Hercules. Moreover they did honour them as if they had been gods, calling them Anaces. Either because they ceased the warres, or for that they ordered themselves so well, that their whole Army being lodged within the City, there was not any hurt or displeasure done to any person : but as it became those that have the charge of any thing, they did carefully watch to preserve the good quiet thereof. All which this Greeke word Anacos doth signifie, whereof perchance it comes that they call the Kings Anacles. There are others also who hold opinion that they were called Anaces, because of their Starres which appeared in the aire. For the ATTICAN tongue saith, Anacos, and Anecathen, where the common people say Ano, and Anethen, that is to say, above. Neverthelessse Atyra Thebes Mother, was carried prisoner to LACEDEMON, and from thence to TROIA with Hellen, as some say : and as Homer himselfe doth witness in his verses, where he speaketh of the Women that followed Hellen :

*Æthra the Daughter deare of Pitheus aged Sire,

Yet there are other who as well reject these two verses, and maintain they are not Homers: as also they reprove all that is reported of Munychus: to wit, that Laicide being privily conceived of him by Demophon, he was brought up secretly by Athra within TROI A. But Heister the Historian in his thirtieth of his Histories of ATTICA, maketh a recital far contrary to other, saying that some hold opinion, that Paris Alexander was slain in battell by Achilles and Fatrocus in the Countrey of THESSALY, neare to the River of Sperchius, and that his Brother Hektor tooke the City of TROEZE, from whence he brought away Athra: in which there is no manner of appearance or likelihood. But Adonius King of the MOLOSSIANS, seating Hercules one day as he passed through his Realme, defended by chance into talk of Thesens and Periboms, how they came to steale away his Daughter secretly: and after told how they were also punished. Hercules was marvellously sorry to understand that one of them was now dead, and the other in danger to die; and thought with himself that to make his mone to Adonius, it would not helpe the matter: he befought him only that he would deliver Thesens for his sake. And he granted him. Thus Thesens being delivered of his captivity, returned to ATHENS, where his friends were not altogether kept under by his enemies: at and his return he did dedicate to Hercules all the Temples, which the City had before caused to be built in his owne honour. And where first of all they were called Thesa, he did now surname them all Hercules, excepting foure, as Philoborus writeth. Now when he was arrived at ATHENS, he would immediatly have commanded and ordered things as he was wont to do: but he found himself troubled much with sedition, because those who had hated him of a long time, had added also to their old cankred hate, a disdain and contempt to fear him any more. And the common people now were become so stubborne, that where before they would have done all that they were commanded, and have spoken nothing to the contrary; now they looked to be borne with and flattered. Whereupon Thesens thought at the first to have used force, but he was forced by the faction and contention of his enemies to let all alone; and in the end, despairing he should ever bring his matters to passe to his desire, he secretly sent away his Children unto the Isle of EUBOE A, to Elphenor the Sonne of Chalcedur. And himself after he had made many wishes and curses against the ATHENIANS, in the village of GARGETTUS, in a place which for that cause to this day is called Araterion, (that is to say, the place of cursings) he did take the seas, and went into the Isle of SCIRO, where he had Lands and Possessions, and thought also to have found Friends. Lycomedes reigned at that time, and was King of the Isle, unto whom Thesens made request for some Land, as intending to dwell there: albeit some say that he required him to give him aid against the ATHENIANS. Lycomedes, were it that he doubted to entertaine so great a Personage, or that he did it to gratifie Menestheus; carried him up to the high Rocks, feigning as though he would from thence have shewed him all his Countrey round about: but when he had him there, he threw him down headlong from the top of the Rocks to the bottom, and put him thus unfortunately to death. Yet other write, that he fell downe of himselfe by an unfortunate chance, walking one day after supper as he was wont. There was no man at that time that did follow or pursue his death, but Menestheus quietly remained King of ATHENS: and the Children of Thesens, as private Souldiers followed Elphenor in the Wars of TROI A. But after the death of Menestheus, who died in the journey to TROY, Thesens Sonnes returned unto ATHENS, where they recovered their State. Sithence there were many occasions which moved the ATHENIANS to reverence and honour him as a demy-god. For in the Battell of Marathon, many thought they saw his shadow and image in arms, fighting against the barbarous people. And after the warres of the Medes (the year wherein Phedon was Governour of ATHENS) the Nun Pichiana answered the ATHENIANS, who had sent to the Oracle of Apollo: that they should bring back the bones of Thesens, and putting them in some honourable place, they should preserve and honour them devoutly. But it was a hard matter to find his grave; and if they had found it, yet had it been a hard thing to have brought his bones away, for the malice of those barbarous people which inhabited that Isle: which were so wilde and fierce, that none could trade or live with them. Notwithstanding Cimon having taken the Island (as we have writen in his Life) and seeking his grave: perceiving by good hap an Eagle pecking with her beak, and scraping with her claws in a place of some pretty height: straight it came into his minde (as by divine inspiration) to search and dig the place, where was found the Tombe of a great body, with the head of a Speare which was of braffe, and a Sword with it. All which things were brought to ATHENS by Cimon.

At this day all these relics lye yet in the midst of the City, neare to the place where the young men do use all their exercises of body. There is free liberty of access for all slaves and poore men (that are afflicted and pursued by any mightier then themselves) to pray and sacrifice in remembrance of Theseus: who while he lived was protector of the oppressed, and did courteously receive their requests and Petitions that prayed to have aide of him. The greatest and most solemne Sacrifice they do unto him, is on the eight day of October, in which he returned from Creta with the other young Children of ATHENS. Howbeit they do not leave to honour him every eighth day of all other month, either because he arrived from Troezen at ATHENS the eight day of June, as Diodorus the Cosmographer writeth: or for that they thought that number to be meetest for him, because the bruit ranne he was begotten of Neptune. They do sacrifice also to Neptune the eighth day of every month. because the number of eight is the first cube made of even number, and the double of the first square: which doth represent a steadfastnesse immoveable, properly attributed to the might of Neptune, whom for this cause we surname Asphelinus, and Gaiochus, which by interpretation doth signifie the safe keeper and the stay of the earth.

THE Historiographers do not agree in their writings, by whom, nor for what cause the great Name of the City of ROME (the glory whereof is blowne abroad through all the world) was first given unto it. For some thinke that the Pelasgians, after they had overcome the greatest part of the world, and had inhabited and subdued many Nations, in the end did stay themselves in that place where it was new builded: and for their great strength and power in armes, they gave the Name of ROME unto the City, as signifying power in the Greeke tongue. Other say, that after the taking and destruction of TROIA, there were certaine TROIANS, which saving themselves from the sword, rooke such vessels as they found at adventure in the Haven; and were by windes put to the THUSCANE shore, where they anchored near unto the River of Tyber. There their Wives being so fore sea-sick, that possibly they could not any more endure the boisterous furies of the seas, it happened one of them among the rest (the Noblest and wisest of the company) called Roma, to counsell the other Women of her companions, to set their Ships afire; which they did accordingly. Wherewith their Husbands at the first were marvellously offended. But afterwards, being compelled of necessity to plant themselves near unto the City of PALLANTIUM, they were appeased when they saw things prosper better then they hoped for, finding the soyle there fertile, and the people their neighbours civil and gentle in entertaining them. Wherefore among other honours they did to requite this Lady Roma, they called their City after her Name, as from whom came the original cause of the building and foundation thereof. They say, that from thence came this custome continuing yet to this day at ROME, that the Women saluting their Kinsfolks and Husbands, do kiss them on the mouth; for so did these TROIAN Ladies to please their Husbands, and to win them again, after they had lost their favours, and procured their displeasures with burning of their Ships. Other say, that Roma was the Daughter of Italus, and of Lucaria, or else of Telephus the Sonne of Hercules, and Wife of Aeneas: other say, of Ascanius the Sonne of Aeneas, who named the City after her Name. Other hold opinion, that it was Romanus (the Sonne of Ulysses and of Circe) that first founded ROME: other will say that it was Romus the Sonne of Emathion, whom Diomedes sent thither from TROIA. Other write that it was one Romis a Tyrant of the LATINS, who drove the THUSCANS out of those parts: which departing out of THESSALY, went first of all into LYDIA, and afterwards from LYDIA into ITALY. And furthermore, they who think that Romulus (as indeed it carrieth best likelihood) was he that gave the Name to the City, do not agree about his ancestors. For some of them write, that he was the Sonne of Aeneas, and of Dexithra the Daughter of Phorbus, and that he was brought into ITALY of a little Child with his Brother Remus: and that at that time the River of Tyber being overflowne, all other Ships were cast away, saving the Ship in which the two little Boyes were, which by great good hap came to flay upon a very plaine even ground on the banke: and because the Children beyond all hope were saved by this meane, therefore the place was afterwards called ROMA. Other say, that Roma the Daughter of the first Troian Lady was married unto Lavinus the Sonne of Telemachus, by whom she had Romulus. Other write, that it was Emilia the Daughter of Aeneas, and of Lavinia, which was hogotten with child by the god Mars. Other tell a tale of Romulus birth, nothing true nor likely. For it is said that there was sometime a King of ALBA named Tarchetius, a very wicked and cruell man, in whose house through the permission of the gods, appeared such a like vision: that there rose up in the hearth of his chimney the forme and fashion of a mans privy-member, which continued there many daies. And they say, that at that time there was in THUSCANE an Oracle of Thetis, from whom they brought unto this wicked King Tarchetius such an answer; that he should cause his Daughter yet unmarried to have carnall company with the strange thing, for the should bear a Sonne, that should be famous for his valiancy, for strength of body, and his happy successe, wherein he should exceed all men of his time. Tarchetius told this Oracle unto one of his Daughters, and willed her to entertaine this strange thing; but she disdaining to do it, sent one of her wayting women to undertake the entertainment. But Tarchetius was so mad at this, that he caused them both to be taken to put them to death: howbeit the goddesse Vesta appeared to him in his sleep in the night, and charged him he should not doe it. Whereupon he did command them to make him a peece of Cloth in the prison, with promise that they should be married when they had finished it. These poore Maids toiled at it all the live long day, but in the night there came other (by Tarchetius commandment) that did undoe all they had done the day before. In the meane time, this waiting woman that was got with child by this strange thing, was delivered of two goodly boyes or twins: whom Tarchetius gave unto one Teratius, with expresse commandment he should cast them away. This Teratius carried them to the banke of the River: tither came a shee-Wolfe and gave them sucke, and certaine Birds that brought little crums and put them in their mouths: untill a Swineheard perceiving them, and wondering at the sight, did boldly go the Children, and took them away with him. These Infants being thus preserved, after they were come to mans state, did set upon Tarchetius and slew him. One Promathian an Italian writer, delivereth this story thus. But the report that carrieth best credill of all, and is allowed of by many writers, cometh from Diclos Paphrethian, (whom Fabius Pictor followeth in many things) who was the first that put forth this story among the GRECIANS, and especially the chieft points of it. Though this matter be somewhat diversly taken, yet in effect the story is thus. The right line and bloud of the Kings of ALBA descended from Aeneas, by succession from the Father to the Sonne: and the Kingdome fell in the end between two Brethren, Numitor and Amulius. They agreed by Lot to make division between them, whereof the one to have the Kingdome, and the other all the Gold, Silver, ready Money, Goods and Jewels brought from TROIA. Numitor by his Lot chose the Realme for his portion: Amulius having all the Gold and Treasure in his hands, did finde himselfe thereby the stronger, and so did easily take his Realme from him. And fearing lest his Brothers Daughter might have Childen which one day might thrust him out againe, he made her a Nunne of the goddesse Vesta, there to passe her dayes in virginity, and never to be married: (some call her Rhea, other Sylvia, and other Ilia) nevertheless not long after she was found with child, against the rule and profession of the Vestall Nunnes. So nothing had saved her from present death, but the Petition of Antho the Daughter of King Amulius, who intreated her Father for her life: yet notwithstanding she was straightly locked up, that no body could see her, nor speake with her, lest she should be brought to bed without Amulius knowledge. In the end she was delivered of two faire Boyes and marvellous great twins: which made Amulius more afraid then before. So he commanded one of his men to take the two Children, and to throw them away, and destroy them. Some say that this servants Name was Faustulus: other thinke it was he that brought them up. But whosoever he was, he that had the charge to throw them away, put them in a Trough, and went towards the River with intention to throw them in. Howbeit he found it risen so high, and running so swiftly, that he durst not come neare the waters side, and so they being in the Trough, he laid them on the banke. In the meane time the River swelling still, and overflowing the banke, in such sort that it came under the Trough, did gently lift up the Trough, and carried it unto a great plaine, called at this present Germanum, and in the old time Germanium (as I take it) because the ROMANS called the Brothers of Father and Mother, Germani. Now there was near unto this place a wild Fig-tree which they called Ruminalis, of the Name of Romulus, as the most part thought:

or else because the beasts feeding there, were wont to come under the same in the extreame heate of the day, and there did ruminate, that is, chew their cudde in the shadow: or perhaps because that the two Children did sucke the teate of the Wolfe, which the ancient LATINS call RUMIA, and they at this day do yet call the goddesse on whom they cry out to give their Children sucke, RUMILIA. And in their Sacrifices to her they use no wine, but offer up Milke and Water mingled with Honey. To these two Children lying there in this sort, they write, there came a shee-Wolfe, and gave them sucke, and a Hitwaw also which did helpe to nourish and keepe them: These two beasts are thought to be consecrated to the god Mars, and the LATINS doe singularly honour and reverence the Hitwaw. This did much helpe to give credit to the words of the Mother, who affirmed she was conceived of those two Children, by the god Mars. Howbeit some thinke she was deceived in her opinion: for Amulius that had her maidenhead, went to her all armed, and perforce did ravish her. Other hold opinion that the Name of the Nurse which gave the two Children sucke with her breasts, gave occasion to common report to erre much in this tale, by reason of the double signification thereof. For the LATINS do call with one self name shee-Wolves Lupas, and Women that give their bodies to all comers; as this Nurse the Wife of Faustulus (that brought these Children home to her house) did use to do. By her right Name she was called Acca Laurentia, unto whom the ROMANS do sacrifice yet unto this day: and the Priest of Mars doth offer unto her in the month of April, the shedding of Wine and Milke accustomed at burials, and the Feast it self is called Laurentia. It is true that they honour also another Laurentia for like occasion. The Clarke or Sexten of Hercules Temple, not knowing one day how to drive away the time, as it should seem, of a certain liveliness and boldnesse, did desire the god Hercules to play at Dice with him, with condition that if he did winne, Hercules should be bound to send him some good fortune: and if it were his lucke to lose, then he promised Hercules he would provide him a very good supper, and would besides bring him a faire Gentlewoman to lye withall. The conditions of the play thus rehearsed, the Sexten first cast the Dice for Hercules, and afterwards for himselfe. It fell out that Hercules wan, and the Sexten meaning good faith, and thinking it very meet to performe the bargain that himselfe had made, prepared a good supper, and hired this Laurentia the Curtisan, which was very fair, but as yet of no great fame to come to it. Thus having feasted within the Temple, and prepared a bed ready there, after supper he locked her into the Temple, as if Hercules should have come indeed and lye with her. And it is said for troth, that Hercules came thither, and commanded her in the morning she should go into the market-place, and salute the first man she met, and keepe him ever for her friend. Which thing she performed, and the first man she met was called Tarrutius, a man of great years, and one that had gathered together marvellous wealth and riches. He had no children at all, neither was he ever married. He fell acquainted with this Laurentia, and loved her so dearly, that shortly chancing to die, he made her heire of all he had: whereof the disposed afterwards by her last Will and Testament, the best and greatest part unto the people of ROME. Moreover it is reported also, that she now being grown to be famous and of great honour (as thought to be the Lemman of a god) did vanish away suddenly in the self same place where the first Laurentia was buried. The place at this day is called Velabrum; because the River being overflown, they were oftentimes compelled to passe by boat to go to the market place, and they called this manner of ferrying over, Velatura. Other say, that those Tumblers and common Players, which shewed fundry games and pastimes to win the favour of the people, were wont to cover that passage over with canvas clothes and veiles, by which they go from the market-place to the Lifts or shew-place where they run their Horses, beginning their race even at that place; and they call a veile in their tongue Velum. This is the cause why the second Laurentia is honoured at ROME. Faustulus chief Neatheard to Amulius, took up the two Children, and no body knew it, as some say; or as others report (the likeliest to be true) with the privacy and knowledge of Numitor Amulius Brother, who secretly furnished them with money that brought up the two young Children. It is said also they were both conveyed unto the City of the GABIANS, where they were brought up at schoole, and taught all other honest things, which they use to teach the Sonnes and Childen of good and Noble men. Further they say, they were Named Remus and Romulus, because they were found sucking on the teates of a Wolfe. Now the beauty of their bodies did presently shew, beholding onely but their stature and manner of their countenances, of what nature and linage they were: and as they grew in yeares, their manly courage encreased marvellously, so as they became stout and hardy men, inso much as they were never troubled or attonied at any danger that was offered them. Howbeit it appeared plainly that Romulus had more wit and understanding then his Brother Remus. For in all things wherein they were to deal with their neighbours, either concerning hunting, or the bounds and limits of their Pastures, it was easily discerned in him, that he was borne to command, and not to obey. For this cause they were both exceedingly beloved of their companions, and of those which were their inferiours. As for the Kings heardmen, they passed not much for them, saying that they were even like themselves, and so seemed not to care a pinne for their anger or displeasure, but wholly gave themselves to all gentlemanly exercises and trades, thinking to live idly and at ease without travell, was neither comely nor convenient: but to exercise and harden their bodies with hunting, running, pursuing murderers and thieves, and to helpe those which were oppressed with wrong and violence, should be credit and commendation to them: By reason whereof, in very short time they grew to great fame and renowne. And it fell out by chance there arose same strife and variance between the Heardmen of Amulius, and the Heardmen of Numitor: inso much as those that were Numitors carried carried away by force some Cattell of the others. The other side would not beare that, but pursued fast after, and beating them well-favouredly, they made them take their legs, and brought back again the greatest part of the Cattell they had carried away with them. Whereat Numitor stormed marvellously, but yet his men seemed to make but little account of it, and purposing revenge, they gathered about them a good company of vagabonds (that had neither home nor resting place) and certain fugitive bondmen which they enticed ill-favouredly, encouraging them to steale away from their Masters. Thus one day whilest Romulus was busie about some Sacrifice (being a devout man and religious, and well given to serve the gods, and to learne to divine and tell beforehand what things should happen and come to passe) it happened the Hearldmen of Numitor to meete Remus very slenderly accompanied; so they fell upon him suddenly: blowes were dealt roundly on both sides, and men were hurt on either part. Howbeit Numitors men in the end proved the stronger part, and tooke Remus by force, and carried him straight before Numitor, alledging many complaints and matters against him. Numitor durst not punish him of his own authority, because he feared his Brother Amulius, who was somewhat terrible: but went unto him, and earnestly besought him to do him justice, and not to suffer him being his own Brother, to receive such injury of his men. There was not a man in the City of ALBA, but did greatly mislike the injury done to Numitor: and spake it openly, that he was no person to be offered such a wrong. Inasmuch as Amulius moved herewith, did deliver Remus into his hands, to punish him as he thought good. Whereupon Numitor carried him home with him. But when he had him in his house, he began to consider better of him, with admiration how goodly a young man he was, how in height and strength of body he passed all the rest of his people, and perceiving in his face an assured constancy, and bold stedfast courage that yielded not, nor was abashed for any danger he saw towards him: and hearing also the report of his acts and manhood to be answerable to that he saw: (being chiefly moved in mine opinion, by some secret inspiration of the gods, which ordain the depth of great matters) began partly by conjecture, and partly by chance to take a conceit of him. So he asked him what he was, and who was his Father and Mother: speaking to him in a more gentle wise, and with a friendlier countenance then before, to make him the bolder to answer, and be of better hope. Remus boldly answered him; Truly I will not hide the truth from thee, for thou seemest to be more worthy to be King then thy Brother Amulius. For thou enquirest, and hearest first before thou condemnest; and he condemnest before he examine or hear the parties. Untill now we thought we had been the Children of two of the Kings servants, to wit of Fausulus and of Laurentia: I say we, because my Brother and I are two twins. But seeing we are now falsely accused unto thee, and by malicious furnished tales are wrongfully brought in danger of our lives: we intend to discover our selves, and to declare strange things unto thee, whereof the present perill we now stand in, shall plainly prove the truth. Men say that we have been begotten miraculously, fostered and given sucke more strangely, and in our tender years were fed by Birds and wild Beasts, to whom we were cast out as a prey. For a Wolfe gave us suck with her teats, and an Hitwaw (they say) brought us little crummes, and put them in our mouths, as we lay upon the banke by the River, where we were put in a Trough that at this day remaineth whole, bound about with plates of Copper, upon the which are some Letters engraven halfe worne out, which peradventure will one day serve for some tokens of knowledge (unprofitable for our Parents) when it shall be too late, and after we are dead and gone. Numitor then comparing these words, with the age the young man seemed to be of, and considering well his face, did not reject the hope of his imagination that smiled on him, but handled the matter so, that he found meanes to speake secretly with his Daughter, notwithstanding at that time she was kept very straightly. Fausulus in the meane time hearing that Remus was prisoner, and that the King had delivered him already into the hands of his Brother Numitor to do justice, went to pray Romulus to helpe him, and told him then whose Children they were: for before he had never opened it to them but in dark speeches, and glauncing wise, and so much as sufficed to put them in some hope. So Fausulus taking the Trough with him at that time, went unto Numitor in all haste, as marvellously afraid for the present danger, he thought Remus in. The Kings souldiers which warded at the gates of the City, began to gather some suspicion of Fausulus manner of coming: and he made himself to be the more suspected, being questioned with about the cause of his repair thither, that he faultred in his words; besides they espied his Trough which he carried under his cloak. Now amongst the Warders, there was by chance one that was the man to whom the Children were committed to be cast away, and was present when they were left on the banke of the river to the mercy of Fortune. This man knew the Trough by and by, as well by the fashion, as by the Letters graven upon it: who mistrusted straight that which was true indeed. So he did not neglect the thing, but went forthwith to the King to tell him the matter, and led Fausulus with him to have him confesse the truth. Fausulus being in this perplexity, could not keep all close upon examination, but did utter out somewhat of the matter, and he told not all. For he plainly justified the Children were alive: yet he said they were farre from the City of ALBA, where they kept beasts in the fields. And as for the Trough, he was going to carry it to Ilia, because she had divers times prayed him to let her see and feele it: to the end she might be the more assured of her hope, who promised her that one day she should see her Children againe. So it chanced unto Amulius at that time, as it commonly doth unto those that are troubled, and do any thing in fear or anger, as a man amazed thereat, to send one presently (who in all other things was a very honest man, but a great friend of his Brother Numitors) to ask him if he had heard any thing that his Daughters Children were alive. This person being come to Numitors house, found him ready to embrace Remus, who fell to be witnesse thereof, thereof, and of the good hap discovered unto Numitor: whereupon he perswaded him how to set upon his Brother, and to dispatch the matter with speed. So from that time forward, he took their part: On the other side also the matter gave them no leisure to deferre their enterprife, although they had been willing: for the whole case was somewhat blowne abroad. So Romulus then got straight a power, and drew very near the City, and many of the Citizens of ALBA went out to joyne with him, who either feared or hated Amulius. Now Romulus power which he brought (over and beside those Citizens) was a good number of fighting men, and they were divided by hundreds, and every hundred had his Capitaine who marched before his Band, carrying little bundles of grasse or of boughs tied to the end of their poles. The LATINES call these bundles Manipulos, whereof it cometh that yet at this day in an Army of the ROMANES, the Souldiers which are all under one Ensigne, are called Manipulares. So Remus stirring up those that were within the City, and Romulus bringing in men from without, the Tyrant Amulius fell in such feare and agony, that without providing any thing for his safety, they came upon him suddenly in his Pallace, and slew him. Thus you heare how neare Fabius Pictor and Diocles Peparethian do agree in reciting the story, who was the first (in mine opinion) that wrote the foundation of the City of ROME: howbeit there are that think they are all but fables and tales devised of pleasure. But me thinks for all that, they are not altogether to be rejected or discredited, if we will consider Fortunes strange effects upon times, and of the greatnesse also of the Romane Empire: which had never achieved to her present possessed power and authority, if the gods had not from the beginning been workers of the same, and if there had not also been some strange cause, and wonderfull foundation, Amulius being now slain as before, and after that all things were appeased and reduced to good order again, Remus and Romulus would not dwell in the City of ALBA, being no Lords thereof, nor also would be Lords of it, so long as their Grandfather by the Mothers side was alive. Wherefore after they had restored him to his estate, and had done the honour and duty they ought unto their Mother, they purposed to go and build a City in those places where they had been first brought up, for this was the honestest colour they could pretend for their departing from ALBA. Peradventure they were enforced so to do whether they would or not, for the great number of banished men, and fugitive slaves which were gathered together by them for their strength, who had been utterly lost and cast away, if they had been once discharged by them. Therefore it was of necessity that they should dwell by themselves, separated in some place, to keep this number together and in some order. For it is true, that the inhabitants of the City of ALBA would not suffer such banished persons and runagates to be mingled amongst them, nor would receive them into their City to be free among them. All which appeareth sufficiently: first, because they took away Women by force: and so not of infolency, but of necessity, when they found no man that would bestow any of them. It is manifest also they did greatly honour and make much of the Women they had taken away before. Furthermore, when their City began a little to be settled, they made a Temple of refuge for all fugitives and afflicted persons, which they called the Temple of the god Aplaus: where there was sanctuary and safety for all sorts of people that repaired thither, and could get into the Temple: for whom it was alledged, they could not deliver any bondman to his Master, nor Debtor to his Creditor, nor the murderer to the Justice, that was fled thither for succour, because the Oracle of Apollo the Delphian, had expressly enjoined them to grant sanctuary to all those that would come thither for it. So by this meanes in short space their City flourished, and was replenished: where at the first foundation of it, they say there was not above One thousand Houses, as more at large hereafter shall be declared. When they came now to the building of their City, Romulus and Remus the two brethren fell suddenly at a strife together about the place where the City should be builded. For Romulus built ROME, which is called four-square, and would needs it should remaine in the place which he had chosen. Remus his Brother chose another place very strong of situation, upon Mount Aventine, which was called after his name Remonium, and now is called Rignarium. Notwithstanding in the end they agreed between themselves, this controversie should be decided by the flying of Birds, which do give a happy divination of things to come. So being set in divers places by themselves to make observation, some say that there appeared unto Remus six; and to Romulus twelve Vultures. Others say that Remus truly saw six, and Romulus feigned from the beginning that he saw twice as many: but when Remus came to him, then there appeared twelve indeed unto Romulus; and this is the cause why the ROMANES at this day in their divinations and soothsayings of the flying of Birds, do marvellously observe the flying of the Vultures. It is true which the Historiographer Herodotus Ponticus writeth; that Hercules joyced much when there appeared a Vultur to him, being ready to begin any enterprife. For it is the fowle of the world that doth least hurt, and never marreth nor destroyeth any thing that man doth sowe, plant or set, considering that the feedeth on carrion only, and doth never hurt nor kill any living thing. Also the doth not prey upon dead fowle, for the likenesse that is between them: where the Eagles, the Dukes and the Sakers, do murder, kill, and eate those which are of their own kinde. And yet as Eschylus saith;

Needs must that Fowle accounted be most vile, Most ravening, and full of filthy minde,
Which doth himselfe continually defile,
By preying still upon his proper kinde.

Moreover, other Birds are alwayes (as a man would say) before our eyes, and do daily shew themselves unto us: where the Vultur is a very rare Bird, and hardly to be seen, and men do not easily finde their ayries. Which hath given some occasion to hold a false opinion; that the Vultures are passengers passengers, and come into these parts out of strange Countries. The Prognosticators also think, that such things which are not ordinary, and but seldom seen, be not natural, but miraculously sent by the gods to prognosticate something. When Remus knew how his brother had mocked him, he was very angry with him. And when Romulus had cast a ditch, as it were for the wall about his City, Remus did not only scorn it, but hindered also his worke, and in the end for a mockery leapt over his Wall. To conclude, he did so much, that at the last he was slain there by Romulus owne hands, as some say : or as other hold opinion, by one of his men, which was called Celer. In this Fight they slew Faustulus, and Plisinius also his brother, who had holpen him to bring up Romulus. Howsoever the matter fell out, this Celer absented himself from Rome, and went into the Country of Thuscane. And they say, that men which are quick and ready upon a sudden, took their names ever after of him, and were called Celeres. As amongst others, Quintus Metellus under the death of his Father, having in very few daies made the people of Rome to see a combat of Fencers (called Gladiatores) fighting at the sharp, they furnished him Celer, for that the ROMANS marvelled how he could prepare his things in so short a time. Furthermore, Romulus having now buried his Brother, and his other two bringers up (called foster fathers) in the place they call Remonia, began then to build and lay the foundation of his City, sending for men out of Thuscane, who did name and teach him particularly all the Ceremonies he had to observe there, according to their Laws and Ordinances, as a great holy Myserie. And first of all they made a round Ditch in the place called at this day Comitium, into which they did cast their chiefest and best things, which men use lawfully for good, and naturally as most necessary. After that they did throw also into it, a little of the Earth, from whence every man came, and mingled these all together. This Ditch in their Ceremonies is called the World, in Latine Mundus, even the self-same name the Latines call the Universall. About this Ditch they did trace the compasse of the City they would build, even as one would draw a circle about a center. This done, the Founder of the City taketh a Plough, to which he fasteneth a Culter or Plough-share of brass, and so yoked in the Plough an Oxe and a Cow, he himself holding the Plough, did make round about the compasse of the City a deep Furrow. Those which followed him, had the charge to throw the Turves of Earth inward into the City, which the Plough-share raised up, and not to leave any of them turned outward. The Furrow thus cast up was the whole compasse of their Wall, which they call in Latine Pomarium, by shortning of the Syllables, for post murum, to wit, after Wall. But in the place where they determined to make a Gate, they did take off the Plough-share, and draw the Plough, with leaving a certain place unbroken up : whereupon the ROMANS think all the compasse of their Walls holy and sacred, except their Gates. For if their Gates had beene hallowed and sanctified, they would have had a confidence through them to have brought in, or carried out of the City, any things necessary for the life of man, that had not been pure and clean. Now they believe certainly, that this Ceremony of the Foundation of their City was made the one and twenty of April : because the ROMANS do yet keep that day holy day, and call it the Feast of the Nativity of their Country. On which day they did not in old time sacrifice any thing that had life, as esteeming that day (which was the Nativity of their City) to be most meet to be kept clean and pure from being polluted or defiled with any blood. Notwithstanding before Rome was builded they had another Feast, called the Shepherds or Heards-mens Holy-day, which they did celebrate upon the same day, and called it Palilia. Now at this day the beginnings of the moneths with the ROMANS is clean contrary to the GREGIANS : yet for all this, they hold opinion for certainty, that the day on which Romulus founded his City, was assuredly that which the GREGIANS call Triacada, that is to say, the thirtieth day. On which there was seen an Eclipse of the Moone, which they suppose was observed by the Poet Antimachus (born in the City of TEOS) in the thirteenth year of the sixth Olympiad. Likewise in the time of Marcus Varro (a learned man, and one that had read as much of ancient Stories as any ROMANE) there was a friend of his called Tarutius a great Philosopher and Mathematician, who being given to the calculation of Astronomy for the delight of speculation onely, wherein he was thought most excellent : it did fall out that Varro gave him this question, to search out what houre and day the Nativity of Romulus was ; who gathered it out by certain accidents, as they do in the resolutions of certain Geometrical questions. For they say, that by the self-same Science, one may tell before of things to come, and to happen to a man in his life, knowing certainly the houre of his Nativity : and how one may tell also the houre of his Nativity, when by accidents they know what hath happened to him all his life. Tarutius did the question that Varro gave him. And having thoughtfully considered the adventures, deeds, and gifts of Romulus, how long he lived, and how he died : all which being gathered and conferred together, he did boldly judge for a certainty, that he was conceived in his mothers wombe, in the first year of the second Olympiad, the three and twentieth day of the moneth which the EGYPTIANS call Cheac, and now is called December, about three of the clocke in the morning, in which houre there was a whole Eclipse of the Sun : and that he was borne into the world, the 21 of the Moneth of Thoth, which is the Moneth of September, about the rising of the Sun. And that Rome was begun by him on the ninth day of the Moneth which the EGYPTIANS call Pharmuthi, and answereth now to the Moneth of April, betweene two and three of the clock in the morning. For they will say, that a city hath his revolution and his time of continuance appointed, as well as the life of a man : and that they knew by the situation of the Stars, the day of her beginning and foundation. These things and such other like, peradventure will please the Readers better, for their strangeness and curiosity, then offend or mislike them for their falshood. Now after that that he had founded his City, he first and foremost did divide in two companies all those that were of age to carry Armour. In every one of these Companies there were three thousand Footmen, and three hundred Horsemen : and they were called Legions, because they were sorted of the chosen men that were pickt out amongst all the rest for to fight. The remaine after these was called Populus, which signifieth the people. After this, he made a hundred Counsellors of the best and honestest men of the City, which he called Patricians : and the whole company of them together he called Senatus, as one would say, the Councill of the Ancients. So they were called Patricians, as some will say, the Councill of the Fathers lawfull children, which few of the first Inhabitants could shew. It may be, some will say this name was given them of Patrocinium, as growing of the protection they had by the Sanctuary of their City, which word they use at this day in the self-same signification : as one that followed Evander into Italy, was called Patron, because he was pitifull, and relieved the poore and little children, and so got himself a name for his pity and humanity. But methinks it were more like the troth to say, that Romulus did call them so, because he thought the chiefest men should have a fatherly care of the meaner sort : considering also it was to teach the meaner sort, that they should not feare the authority of the greater, nor envie at the honours they had, but rather in all their causes should use their favour and good will, by taking them as their Fathers. For even at this present, strangers call those of the Senate, Lords or Captains : but the naturall ROMANS call them, Patres Conscripti, which is a name of Father-head and Dignity without envie. It is true, that at the beginning they were onely called Patres, but sithence, because they were many joyned unto the first, they have been named Patres Conscripti, as a man should say, Fathers of record together : which is the honourablest Name he could have devised to make a difference betwixt the Senators and the People. Furthermore, he made a difference between the chiefest Citizens, and the baser People, by calling the better sort Patroni, as much to say, as Defenders : and the meaner sort Clients, as you would say, Followers, or men protected. This did breed marvellous great love and good will among them, making the one much beholding to the other, by many mutual courtesies and pleasures : for the Patrons did help the Clients to their Right, defended their Causes in judgement, gave unto them counsell, and did take all their matters in hand. The Clients againe enterchangelably humbled themselves to their Patrons, not onely in outward honour and reverence towards them, but otherwise did help them with money to marry and advance their daughters, or else to pay their Debts and Credit, if they were poore or decayed. There was no Law nor Magistrate that could compell the Patron to be a Witnesse against his Client : nor yet the Client to witnesse against his Patron. So they increased and continued all other Rights and Offices of amity and friendship together, saving afterwards they thought it a great shame and reproach for the better and richer, to take reward of the meaner and poorer. And thus of this matter we have spoken sufficiently. Moreover, foure moneths after the foundation of the City was laid, Fabius writeth, there was a great ravishment of women. There are some which lay it upon Romulus, who being then of nature warlike, and given to Prophecies and Answers of the gods, foretold that his City should become very great and mighty, so as he raised it by Wars, and increased it by Arms : and he sought out this colour to do mischief, and to make War upon the SABYNS. To prove this true, some say he caused certain of their Maids by force to be taken away, but not past 30. in number, as one that rather sought cause of Wars, then did it for need of Marriages : which methinks was not likely to be true ; but rather I judge the contrary. For seeing his City was incontinently replenished with people of all sorts, whereof there were very few that had Wives, and that they were men gathered out of all Countries, and the most part of them poore and needy, so as their neighbors disdained them much, and did not look they would long dwell together : Romulus hoping by this violent taking of their Maids and ravishing them, to have an entry into alliance with the SABYNS, and to entice them further to joyne with them in Marriage, if they did gently intreat these Wives they had gotten, enterprised this violent taking of their Maids, and ravishing of them in such sort. First, he made it to be commonly bruted abroad in every place, that he had found the Altar of a god hidden in the ground, and he called the name of the god, Consus : either because he was god of Counsell ; whereupon the ROMANS at this day in their Tongue call Consilium, which we call Counsell : and the chief Magistrates of their City Consules, as we say Counsellors. Other say, it was the Altar of the god Nephtune, surnamed the Patron of Horses. For this Altar is yet at this day within the great Lits of the City, and ever covered and hidden, but when they use the running Games of their Horse-race. Other say, because Counsell ever must be kept close and secret, they had good reason to keepe that Altar of this god Consus hidden in the ground. Now other write, when it was opened, Romulus made a Sacrifice of wonderfull joy, and afterwards proclaimed it openly in divers places, that at such a day there should be common Playes at Rome, and a solemne Feast kept of the god Consus, where all that were disposed to come should be welcome. Great numbers of People repaired thither from all parts. He himself was set in the chiefest Seate of the Shew-place, apparelled faire in Purple, and accompanied with the chief of the City about him. And there having purposed this Ravishment you have heard of, he had given the signe before : that the same should begin, when he should rise up and fold a plaite of his Gowne, and unfold the same againe. Hereupon his men stood attending with their Swords : who so soone as they perceived the signe was given, with their Swords drawn in hand, and with great shouts and cries, ran violently on the Maids and Daughters of the SABYNS to take them away and ravish them ; and suffered the men to run away, without doing them any hurt or violence. So some say, there were but thirty ravished, after whose names were called the thirty Linages of the People of ROME. Howbeit Valerius Antias writeth, that there were five hundred and seven and twenty: and Juba, six hundred fourefcore and three. In the which is singularly to be noted for the commendation of Romulus, that he himselfe did take then but only one of the Maids, named Herfilia: that afterwards was the onely cause and mediation of peace betwixt the SABYNS and the ROMANS. Which argueth plainly, that it was not to do the SABYNS any hurt, nor to satisfie any difordinate lust, that they had so forcibly undertaken this ravishment: but to joyne two Peoples together, with the straightest bonds that could be between men. This Herfilia as some say, was married unto one Hoftilius, the noblest man at that time amongst the ROMANS: or as others write, unto Romulus himself, which had two Children by her. The first was a Daughter, and her name was Prima, because she was the first: the other was a Son, whom he named Asellus, because of the multitude of People he had assembled together in his City, and afterwards he was surnamed Abilius. Thus Zenodotus the TROEZENIAN writeth; wherein notwithstanding there be divers that do contrary him. Among those which ravished the Daughters of the SABYNS, it is said there were found certaine meane men carrying away a marvellous passing faire one. These met by chance on the way certain of the chiefe of the City, who would have taken her by force from them; which they had done, but that they began to cry, they carried her unto Talassius, who was a young man marvellously well beloved of every body. Which when the other understood, they were exceeding glad, and they commended them: inso much as there were some which suddenly turned back again, and did accompany them for Talassius sake, crying out aloud, and often on his name. From whence the custome came, which to this day the ROMANS sing at their Marriages, Talassius, like as the GRECIANS sing Hymeneus. For it is said he was counted very happy that he met with this Woman. But Sextius Sylla, a CARTHAGINIAN borne, a man very wise, and well learned, told me once it was the cry and signe which Romulus gave to his men to begin the Ravishment: whereupon those that carried them away went crying this word Talassius, and that from thence the Custome had continued, that they sing it yet at their Marriages. Nevertheless the most part of Authors, specially Juba, think it is a warning to remember the new-married-women of their worke, which is to spinne, which the GRECIANS call Talassia, the Italian word at that time being not mingled with the Greeke. And if it be true the ROMANS used this terme of Talassia, as we of GREECE do use, we might by conjecture yeeld another reason for it, which should carry a better likelihood and prooffe. For when the SABYNS after the Battell had made peace with the ROMANS, they put in an Article in favour of the Women in the Treaty, that they should not be bound to serve their Husbands in any other work but in spinning of Wooll. Ever since this Custome hath growne, that those which give their Daughters in Marriage, and those who leade the Bride, and such as are present at the Weddings, speak in sport to the new married Wife, laughing, Talassius: in token that they do not leade the Bride for any other work or service, but to spin Wooll. Thereof this hath been the use to this day, that the Bride doth not of her selfe come over the threshold of her Husbands doore, but she is hoisted prettily into the Houfe: because the SABYNE women at that time were so lift up, and carried away by force. They say also, that the manner of making the fied of the new wedded Wives haire, with the Iron head of a Javelin, came up then likewise: this Story being a manifest token that these first Marriages were made by force of Armes, and as it were at the Swords point: as we have written more at large in the Book, wherein we render and shew the causes of the ROMANS Fashions and Customes. This Ravishment was put in execution about the eighteenth day of the Moneth called Sextilis, and now named August: on which day they yet celebrate the Feast they call Confalua. Now the SABYNS were good men of War, and had great numbers of People, but they dwelt in Villages, and not within inclosed Walls: being a thing fit for their noble courages that did fear nothing, and as those who were defended from the LACEDÆMONIANS. Nevertheless they seeing themselves bound and tied to peace by Pledges and Hostages, that were very neare allied unto them, and fearing their daughters should be ill intreated, sent Ambassadors to Romulus, by whom they made reasonable offers and perswasions, that their Daughters might be delivered unto them again, without any force or violence, and then afterwards, that he would cause them to be asked in Marriage of their Parents, as both Reason and Law would require, to the end that with good will and consent of all parties, both Peoples might contract Amity and Alliance together. Whereunto Romulus made answer, he could not restore the Maids which his People had taken away and married: but most friendly he prayed the SABYNS to be contented with their Alliance. This Answer being returned, and not liked, whilst the Princes and Commonalty of the SABYNS were occupied in consultation, and about the arming of themselves: Acron King of the CENINESSES (a man exceeding courageous and skillfull in Wars, and one that from the beginning misfrustrated the over-bold and stout Enterprises that Romulus was likely to attempt, considering the late Ravishment of the SABYNS Daughters, and how he was already greatly dreaded of his Neighbours, and somewhat intolerable, if he were not chastised and brought lower, first began to invade him with a puissant Army, and to make hot and violent Wars upon him. Romulus on the other side prepared also, and went forth to meet him. When they were come so neare together, that they might see one another, they sent defiance to each other, and prayed that they two might fight man to man amidst their Armies, and neither of theirs to stir a foot. Both of them accepted of it, and Romulus making his Prayer unto Jupiter, did promise and make a Vow: That if he did give him the victory to overcome, he would offer up to him the Armour of his Enemy, which he did. For first he slew Acron in the Field, and afterwards gave Battell to his men, and overthrew them them also. Lastly he tooke his City, where he did no hurt nor yet displeasure to any, saving that he commanded them to pull down their Houses, and destroy them, and to go dwell with him at ROME: where they should have the self-same Rights and Privileges which the first Inhabitants did enjoy. There was nothing more enlarged the City of ROME then this manner of policy, to joyne alwaies unto it those she had overcome and vanquished. Romulus now to discharge his Vow, and in such sort that his Offering might be acceptable to Jupiter, and pleasant to his Citizens to behold, did cut down a goodly straight grown young Oke, which he lighted on by good fortune, in the place where his Campe did lye: the same he trimmed and set forth after the manner of victory, hanging and tying all about it in faire order, the Armour and Weapons of King Acron. Then he girding his Gowne to him, and putting upon his long bush of haire a Garland of Lawrell, laid the young Oke upon his right shoulder, and he first marched before towards his City, and sung a royall Song of Victory, all his Army following him in Arms unto the City in order of battell: where his Citizens received him in all passing wise and triumph. This noble and stately entry ever since hath given them minds in such sort, and in statelier wise to make their triumph. The offering of this Triumph was dedicated to Jupiter surnamed Feretriar: because the Latine word Ferire signifieth to hurt and kill: and the Prayer Romulus had made, was, he might hurt and kill his Enemy. Such Spoiles are called in Latine, Spolia opima: therefore saith Varro, that opes signifie riches. Howbeit methinks it were more likely to say, that they were so named of this word opus, which betokeneth a deed, because he must needs be the chiefe of the Army, that hath slain with his own hands the Generall of his Enemies, and that must offer the Spoils called Spolia opima, as you would say, his principall Spoiles and Deeds. This never happened yet but to three Roman Captains onely: of the which Romulus was the first, who slew Acron King of the CENINESSES. Cornelius Cossus was the second, who killed Tullus Hostilius, the Generall of the TRUSCANS. Clodius Marcellus was the third, who slew Britomarchus, King of the GAULES, with his own hands. And for the two last, Cossus and Marcellus, they made their entry into the City, carrying their Triumphs upon Chariots triumphant: but Romulus did not so. Therefore in this point Dionysius the Historiographer hath erred, writing that Romulus did enter into ROME upon a Chariot triumphant. For it was Tarquinius Priscus the son of Be-maratus, who first did set out Triumphs in so stately and magnificent show. Other hold opinion it was Valerius Publicola, who was the first that ever entered upon triumphant Chariot. Concerning Romulus, his Statues are yet to be seene in ROME, carrying his Triumph afoot. After this overthrow and taking of the CENINESSES, the Inhabitants of the Cities of FIDENA, CRUSTUMERIUM, and ANTEMNA, rose all together against the ROMANS, whilst the other SABYNS also were a preparing themselves. So they fought a Battell, in which they took the overthrow: and left their Cities to the spoile of Romulus, their Lands to be given where he thought good, and themselves to be carried to ROME. Romulus then did give their Lands among his Citizens, except those Lands which did belong to the Fathers of the Maidens that they had taken away and ravished. For he was contented that the Fathers of them should keepe still their Lands. By and by the other SABYNS stomacking thereat, did chuse them a Generall called Tatius, and so went with a puissant Army toward the City of ROME, whereunto to approach at that time it was very hard, the Castle or Keepe of their City being seated where at this day the Capitoll standeth, within which there was a great Garrison, whereof Tarpeius was Captain, and not his Daughter Tarpeia, as some will say, who set out Romulus as a foole. But Tarpeia the Captains Daughter, for the desire he had to have all the gold Bracelets which they did wear about their arms, sold the Fort to the SABYNS, and asked for reward of her Treason, all they did wear on their left armes. Tatius promised them unto her: and she opened them a Gate in the night, by the which she did let all the SABYNS into the Castle. Antigonus then was not alone, who said, He loved those which did betray, and hated them that had betrayed: nor yet Cæsar Augustus, who told Rymistales the THRACIAN, That he loved Treason, but he hated Traytors. And it is a common affection which we beare to wicked persons, whilst we stand in need of them: not unlike for all the world to those that have need of the gall and poyson of venomous Beasts. For when they finde it, they are glad, and take it to serve their turne: but after their turne is served, and they have that they fought, they hate the cruelty of such Beasts. So played Tatius at that time. For when he was gotten into the Castle, he commanded the SABYNS (for performance of his promise he had made to Tarpeia) they should not stick to give her all they were on their left armes, and to do as he did: who taking from his owne arme first, the Bracelets which he wore, did cast it to her, and his Target after: and so did all the rest in like sort, inso much as being borne downe to the ground by the weight of Bracelets and Targets, she died as pressed to death under her burden. Nevertheless Tarpeius self was attainted, and condemned also of Treason, by Romulus order, as Juba saith; it is set forth by Sulpicius Galba. They that write now otherwise of Tarpeia, saying she was the Daughter of Tatius, Generall of the SABYNS, and was forced by Romulus to lye with him, and how she was punished in this sort by her own Father after her said Treason committed: those I say, amongst whom Antigonus is one, are not to be credited. And the Poet Simylus also doth dote most; who saith Tarpeia sold the Capitoll not to the SABYNS, but to the King of GAULES; with whom she was in love, as in these Verses doth appeare:

Which neere unto the Capitoll did dwell;*

(In fervent flames of beastly love beblind.
Wherewith the King of Gaules did make her swell) Caus'd stately Rome surpris'd for to be By Enemies, as every man may see.
And so through hope of his fidelity Betray'd her Syre, with all his Family.

And a little after, in speaking of the manner of her death, he saith also :

Yet so : the Gaules, those worthy men of might, Threw her not down into the waves of Fo,
But from their Armes, wherewith they want to fight, They cast their Shields upon her body so,
That she suppress'd with such an heave weight, (Ah wofull Maid) to death was smother'd straight.

This Maiden therefore being buried in the same place ; the whole Hill was called afterwards Tarpēius after her name, which continued until Tarquinius the King did dedicate all the place to Jupiter: for then they carried her bones into some other place, and so it loit her name. Unless it be that rock of the Capitoll, which at this present time they call Rupes Tarpēia, from the topple whereof they were wont in old time to throw down headlong all wicked Offenders. When the SABYNS now had gotten this hold, Romulus being exceeding wroth, sent them a defiance, and bade them Battell if they durst. Tatius straight refused not, considering if by mischance they were distressed, they had a sure refuge to retire unto. The place between the two Armies where the Fight should be, was all round about environed with little hills. So as it was plaine, the Fight could not be but sharpe and dangerous, for the discommodiousness of the place, where was neither ground for any to flye, nor yet any space for any long chafe, it was of so small a compasse. Now it fortun'd by chance, the River of Tyber had overflowne the bankes a few dayes before, and there remained in it a deeper mud then men would have judged, because the ground was so plain, and was even where the great Market-men place of ROME standeth at this day. They could discern nothing thereof by the eye, because the upper part of it was crufted, whereby it was the more ready for them to venter upon, and the worse to get out, for that it did sinke underneath. So the SABYNS had gone upon it, had not Curtius the danger beene, which by good fortune itayd them. He was one of the noblest and valiantest men of the SABYNS, who being mounted upon a Courser, went on a good way before the Army. This Courser entring upon the crufted mud, and sinking withall, began to plunge and struggle in the mire : whereat Curtius proved a while with the spur to stirre him, and get him out, but in the end seeing it would not be, he left his back, and saved himselfe. The same very place to this day is called after his name, Lacus Curtius. The SABYNS then scaping thus this danger, began the Battell. The Fight did grow very cruel, and endured so great a while, the Victory leaning no more to the one side then to the other. There died in a small space a great number of men, amongst whom Hofilius was one, who as they say, was the Husband of Herfilia, and Grandfather to Hofilius that was King of ROMANS after Numa Pompilius. Afterward there were (as we may think) many other Encounters and Battels betweene them : howbeit they make mention of the last above all the rest, where Romulus had so fore a blow on his head with a stone, that he was almost felled to the ground, inso-much as he was driven to retire a little out of the Battell. Upon which occasion the ROMANS gave back also, and drew towards Mount Palatine, being driven out of the Plaine by force. Romulus began now to recover of the blow he had received, and so returned to give a new onfer, and cried out all he might to his Souldiers to tarry, and shew their face again to their Enemy. But for all his loud crying, they left not flying still for life, and there was not one that durst return again. Whereupon Romulus lifting up his hands straight to Heaven, did most fervently pray unto Jupiter, that it would please him to itay the flying of his People, and not suffer the ROMANS Glory thus to fall to their utter destruction, but to repaire it by his favour againe. He had no sooner ended his Prayer, but divers of his men that fled, began to be ashamed to flie before their King, and a sudden boldness came upon them, and their feare therewithall vanished away. The place they first stayed in, was where as now is the Temple of Jupiter Stator, which is as much to say, as Jupiter the Stayer. Afterwards gathering themselves together again, they repulsd the SABYNS even to the place they call now Regia, and unto the Temple of the Goddesse Vesta : where both the Battels being prepared to give a new Charge, there did fall out before them a strange and incredible thing to see, which itayd them they fought not. For of the SABYNE Women whom the ROMANS had ravished, some ran of the one side, other of the other side of the Battels, with Lamentations, Cryes, and Shouts, stepping betweene their Weapons, and among the flaine Bodies on the ground, in such sort that they seemed out of their wits, and carried as it were with some Spirits. In this manner they went to finde out their Fathers and their Husbands, some carrying their suckling Babes in their armes, other having their haire loose about their eyes, and all of them calling, now upon the SABYNS, now upon the ROMANS, with the gentlest names that could be devised : which did melt the hearts of both Parties in such sort, that they gave back a little, and made them place betweene both the Battels. Then were the Cryes and Lamentations of every one plainly heard. There was not a man there but it pitied him, as well to see them in that pitifull case, as to heare the lamentable words they spake : adding to their most humble Petitions and Requests that could be any way imagined, passing wise Perswasions and Reasons to induce them to a Peace. For what offence (say they) or what what displeasure have we done to you, that we should deserve such an heape of evils, as we have already suffered, and yet you make us beare ? we were as you know violently (and against all Law) ravished by those, whose now we remaine. But our fathers, our brethren, our mothers and friends, have left us with them so long, that proceffe of time, and the straightest bonds of the World, have tied us now so fast to them, whom mortally before we hated, that we are constrained now to be flighted thus, to see them fight, yea and to lament and dye with them, who before unjustly tooke us from you. For then you came not to our rescue when we were Virgins untouched, nor to recover us from them when they wickedly assaulted us, poore soules : but now ye came to take the Wives from their Husbands, and the Mothers from their little Children. So as the helpe ye thinke to give us now doth grieve us more, then the forsaking of us was sorrowfull to us then. Such is the love they have borne unto us, and such is the kindeffe we beare againe to them. Now, if ye did fight for any other cause then for us, yet were it reason ye should let fall your Armes for our sakes (by whom you are made Grandfathers and Fathers-in-law, Cousins and Brothers-in-law) even from those against whom you now bend your force. But if all this Warre began for us, we heartily beseech you then that you will receive us with your Sonnes-in-law, and your Sons by them, and that you will restore unto us our Fathers, our Brethren, our Kinsfolks and Friends, without ipoyling us of our Husbands, of our Children, and of our joyes, and thereby make us wofull Captives and Prisoners in our mindes. These requests and perswasions by Herfilia, and other the SABYNE Women being heard, both the Armies stayed, and held every body his hand, and straight the two Generals imparted together. During which parle they brought their Husbands and their Children, to their Fathers and their Brethren. They brought meate and drinke for them that would eat. They dressed up the wounds of them that were hurt. They carried them home with them to their Houses. They shewed them how they were Mistresses there with their Husbands. They made them see how greatly they were accounted of and esteemed ; yea how with a Wedlock-love and reputation they were honoured. So in the end peace was concluded betweene them, wherein it was Articled, That the SABYNE women which would remaine with their husbands should tarry still, and be exempted from all worke or service (as above recited) save only spinning of Wooll. And that the SABYNS and ROMANS should dwell together in the City, which should be called ROME, after Romulus name : and the Inhabitants should be called Quirites, after the name of the City of Tatius King of the SABYNS, and that they should reigne and governe together by a common consent. The place where this peace was concluded, is called yet to this day Comitium : because that Coire, in the Latine Tongue signifieth to assemble. So the City being augmented by the one halfe, they did chuse of the SABYNS another hundred new PATRICIANS, unto the first hundred of the ROMANS that were chosen before. Then were the Legions made of 6000. Footmen, and 600. Horfemen. After they divided their Inhabitants into three Tribes, whereof those that came of Romulus, were called Ramenfes after his name : those that came of Tatius were called Tatienfes after his name : and those that were of the third stock, were called Lucreses, as from the Latine word Lucus, called with us a Grove in English, because thither great number of people of all sorts did gather, which afterwards were made Citizens of ROME. The very word of Tribus (which signifieth bands, wards, or hundreds) doth witness this beginning of ROME from Wards or Hundreds. For hereupon the ROMANS call those at this day, their Tribunes, which are the chiefe heads of the people. But every one of these principall Wards had afterwards tenne other particular Wards under them, which some thinke were called after the names of the thirty SABYNE women that were ravished : but that seemeth false, because many of them carry the names of the places they came from. Howbeit at that time many things were stablished and ordained in honour of the women : as to give them place, the upper hand in meeting them : the upper hand in streets : to speake no foule or dishonest word before them, no man to unwray himselfe, or shew naked before them : that they should not be called before criminall Judges sitting upon Homicides and murderers : that their children should weare about their necks a kinde of Jewell, called Bulla, fashioned in manner like these water bubbles that rise upon the water when it beginneth to raine : and that their Gownes should be garded with Purple. Now the two Kings did not straight confer together so soone as any occasion of businesse was offered them, but either of them did first counsell alone with his hundred Senators, and afterwards they did all assemble together : Tatius dwelt in the place where now is the Temple of Juno Moneta : Romulus in the place called at this present, The staires of the faire banke, then, The descent of Mount Palatine, as they go to the Show-place or great Lifts, where they say was sometime the holy Cornell-tree, whereof they make so great account. Romulus one day desirous to prove his strength, threw (as it is said) a dart from Mount Aventine toward Mount Palatine ; the staffe whereof was of a Cornell-tree : and the Iron of it entred so deepe into the ground, being a lustie fat soyle, that no man could pull it out, although many proved it, and did the best they could. The ground being very good and fit to bring forth Trees, did so nourish the end of this staffe, that it tooke roote, and began to spreade branches : so that in time it became a faire great Cornell-tree, which the Successors of Romulus did inclose with a wall, and did keepe and worship it as a very holy thing. If by chance any went to see it, and found it looked not fresh and Greene, but like a Tree withered and dried away for lack of moisture : he went away straight as one afraid, crying to all he met (and they with him went crying still) in every place, Water, water, as it had beene to have quenched a fire. Then ranne they thither out of all Quarters with Vessels of water, to water and moist the Tree. In the time of Caius Cesar, who caused the staires about it to be repaired, they say the Labourers raising the place, and digging about this Cornell-tree, did by negligence hurt the rootes of the same in such sort, as afterwards it dried up altogether. Now the Sabyns received the Moneths after the manner of the Romans, whereof we have written sufficiently in the life of Numa. Romulus againe used the Sabyns shields: and both he and his people changed the fashion of their Armour and Weapons they used. For the Romans before did carry little Shields, after the fashion of the Argives. As for either of their Holy-dayes and Sacrifices, they kept them both altogether, and did not take away any of them, which either the one or the other people observed before, but they added thereunto some other new. As that which they call Matronalia, which was instituted in honour of the Women, because by their meanes peace was concluded. And that also of Carmenalia, in the honour of Carmen, whom some suppose to be the goddesse of Fate or Destiny, because she hath rule and power over the Nativities of men; by reason whereof the mothers call upon her often, and reverence her very much. Other say, she was the wife of Evander the ARCADIAN, who being a Prophetesse inspired by the god Phabus, gave the Oracles in Verse; whereupon she was surnamed Carmen, because that Carmen in Latine signifie Verses: for it is of certainty that her proper name was Nicostrata. Howbeit there are some which give another manner of derivation and interpretation of this word Carmen, which is the likelier to be true: as if they would say, Carmen is: which signifieth wanting wit, for the very fury that taketh them when they are inspired with the propheticall spirit. For in Latine Cavere betokeneth to lack: and Mens signifieth wit. As for the Feast of Palilia, we have told of it before: but the Feast of Lupercalia, considering the time of celebrating thereof, it seemeth it is ordained for a purification. For it is celebrated on the unfortunate dayes of the Moneth of February, which are called the purging dayes. The dayes in the old time on which they did celebrate the same, were called Februa. But the proper name of the Feast, is as much to say, as the Feast of Woolves. Wherefore it seemeth to be a Feast of great antiquity, and instituted by the ARCADIANS which came in with Evander: albeit the name of Woolves is as common to the females, as the males, and so it might perhaps be called, by reason of the Woolfe that brought up Romulus. For we see those which run up and downe the City that day, and they call Luperci, do begin their course in the very place where they say Romulus was cast out. Howbeit, many things are done, whereof the originall cause were hard now to be conjectured. For Goats about a certaine time of the yeare, are killed; then they bring two young boyes, Noble-mens sons, whose foreheades they touch with the knife beblouded with the blood of the Goats that are sacrificed. By and by they dry their foreheades with wooll dipped in milk. Then the young boyes must laugh immediately after they have dried their foreheades. That done, they cut the Goats skins, and make thongs of them, which they take in their hands, and run with them all about the City starke naked (saving they have a cloth before their secrets) and so they strike with these thongs all they meet in their way. The young wives never thun them at all, but are well contented to be striken with them, believing it helpeth them to be with childe, and also to be easily delivered. There is another thing yet in this Feast, that these LUPERCANS which run about the City, do also sacrifice a dogge. Concerning this Feast, the Poet named Busius doth write somewhat in his Elegies, where shewing the occasion of the fond Customes and Ceremonies of the ROMANS, he doth say, that Romulus after that he had slaine Amulius, did runne straight with great joy to the very place where the Woolfe gave him and his brother suck, in memory of which running, he saith this Feast of Lupercalia was celebrated: and that the Noblemens younger sonnes do runne through the City, striking and laying on them that they meete in their way with their Goat-thongs, in token that Remus and Romulus ranne from ALBA unto that place, with their drawne swords in their hands. And that the touching of their forehead with a bloody knife, is in remembrance of the danger they stood in at that time to have beene slaine. Last of all, the drying of their foreheades with Wooll, dipped in milk, is in memory of the milke they sucked of the Woolves. But Caius Acilius writeth that Remus and Romulus before ROME was built, did happen to lose their beasts on a day, and after they had made certaine Prayers unto Faunus for the finding of them, they ranne here and there starke naked as they went a seeking of them, for feare they should have beene troubled with overmuch heate and sweating. And this is the cause he saith, why the LUPERCANS do at this day runne about naked. And if it be true, they make this Sacrifice for a purging, a man might say they might offer up a dog for that purpose, as the GRECIANS in their Sacrifices of purgation, do use to carry out all their dogs. And in many places they do observe this Ceremony, to drive out the dogs, which they call Perilegiasmes. Otherwise, if it be of a thankfulness to the Woolfe that gave Romulus suck, and saved him from perishing, that the ROMANS do solemnize this Feast: it is not impertinent they should sacrifice a dog, because he is an enemy to the Woolves. Unlesse a man would say, it was to punish this beast which troubleth and letteth the LUPERCANS when they run. Some say also it was Romulus, who first instituted it a Religion to keepe holy fire, and that first ordained holy Virgins, which are called Vestales: other do ascribe it to Numa Pompilius. Notwithstanding it is most certaine otherwise, that Romulus was a very devout man, and greatly skilfull in telling of things to come by the flying of birds, for which cause he did ordinarily carry the Augurs crooked staffe, called in Latine Litus. It is a rod crooked at the end, where-with the Augurs or Soothsayers when they sit down to behold the flying of birds, do point out & mark the quarters of the Heaven. They carefully kept it within the Palace: howbeit it was lost in the time of wars with the GAULES, when the City of ROME was taken. Afterwards when these barbarous people were chafed & driven out, it was found againe (as it is said) all whole, within a great hill or heap of ashes, having no manner of hurt, where all things else about it had been consumed and marred with the fire. He

He is said to have made certaine Lawes, among which there is one that seemeth somewhat hard, which is: that the man is suffered to put away his wife, and in some case to give her nothing: and like liberty is not given to the wife to put away her husband. As if she may be proved to have consented to the poysoning of her children, or to have counterfeited her husbands keyes, or to have committed adultery. But if he put her away for any other cause, then the one halfe of the Goods is adjudged to the wife, and the other moiety to the Goddesse Ceres: and he that putteth away his wife after this sort, is commanded further to sacrifice to the Goddesse of the Earth. This also was notable in Romulus, who having ordained no paine nor punishment for Parricides (that is, for those that kill their Parents) called yet all murder Parricide, to shew how detestable that murder was; and as for Parricide, he thought it impossible. And it seemed a great while, he had reason to think so, that such wickednesse would never happen in the World. For in 600. yeares together it was not knowne that any man in ROME committed such an offence, and the first Parricide with them was Lucius Ofsius, after the Warres of Hannibal. But enough touching this matter. Furthermore in the first yeare of the reigne of Tatius, some of his kinsmen and friends met by chance on the way certaine Ambassadors, coming from the City of LAURENTUM unto ROME, whom they set upon, and meant to have robbed them. The Ambassadors resisting them, and not willing to deliver their money, they made no more ado, but slew them. This heinous deed being thus committed, Romulus was of opinion they should be executed openly in the high-way for example. But Tatius deferred it till from day to day, and did always excuse the matter unto him, which was the onely cause they fell out one with the other. For in all things else, they carried themselves as honestly as might be the one to the other, ruling and governing together, with a common consent and good accord. But the Parents and Kinsfolks of those who were murdered, when they saw they could have no justice because of Tatius, watched him one day as he sacrificed with Romulus, in the City of LAVINIUM, and stabbed him in, without offering Romulus any violence, but rather praised him for a good and righteous Prince. Romulus caused the body of Tatius to be straight taken up, and buried him very honourably in Mount AVENTINE, about the place now called ARMILUSTRIUM. Further he never shewed any countenance to revenge his death. There are some Historiographers that write, that those of the City of LAURENTUM being affraid at this murder, did deliver forthwith to Romulus the murderers of the Ambassadors. He notwithstanding did let them go againe, saying: One murder was requited by another. This gave some occasion of speech to thinke, he was glad he was rid of his companion: yet the SABYNs neither stirred nor rebelled for all this, but some of them were afraid of him for the great love they bare him, other for his power he was of, and other for the honor they gave him as a god, continuing still in duty and obedience towards him. Divers strangers also had Romulus valiantly in great honor: as amongst other, those who then were called the ancient LATINES, which sent Ambassadors to him to make league and amity with him. He devised to take the City of FIDENA which was neare to ROME. Some say he tooke it upon a sudden, having sent before certaine Horse-men to breake downe the hookes and hinges with force, which the Gates hang by: and himselfe came after with the rest of his Army, and stole upon them, before the City mistrusted any thing. Other write that the FIDENATES first invaded his Country, and foraged unto the very Suburbs of ROME, where they did great harme: and how Romulus laid an ambush in their way as they returned home, and slew a great number of them: When he tooke their City, he did not raze it, but made a Colony of it (as a place to send the over-increase of ROME unto) whither he sent afterwards two thousand five hundred ROMANS to inhabite there: and it was on the thirteenth day of April, which the ROMANS call the Ides of the same Moneth. Not long after there rose such a great Plague in ROME, that men died suddenly, and were not sick: the Earth brought forth no fruit: brute Beasts delivered no increase of their kinde: there rained also drops of blood in ROME, as they say. In-somuch as besides the evils men felt in this extremity, they fell in a marvellous feare of the wrath of the gods. Afterwards perceiving the like hapned to the Inhabitants of LAURENTUM, then every man judged it was the very vengeance and heave hand of the gods: who plagued and punished these two Cities for the murder committed upon Tatius, and the Ambassadors that were killed. Whereupon the murderers of both sides were apprehended and executed: and these plagues by and by ceased both in the one and the other City. Romulus besides, did purifie the Cities with certaine Sacrifices that he devised, which they keep till at this day, at the gate called Ferentia. But before the plague ceased, the CAMERIANS came to assault the ROMANS, and had overcome all the Country, supposing they should not be able to withstand them, because they had been so sore troubled with the plague. Yet notwithstanding, Romulus set upon them with his Army, and wain the field of them, in which conflict there were slaine about 6000. men. After the battell done, he tooke their City, and conveyed to ROME the one half of the Inhabitants that remained. After this, he sent twice as many ROMANS as there were naturall CAMERIANS left at CAMERINE, to dwell there among them. This was done the first day of August: so great was the multitude of the Inhabitants of ROME that had increased in 16. yeares from the first foundation of the City. Among other spoiles he got there, he carried away a Chariot of brasse with foure horses, which he caused to be set up in the Temple of Vulcan, and his owne Statue upon it, and Victory crowning him with a Garland triumphant. His power being grown thus great, his weake Neighbors did submit themselves unto him, being contented to live in peace by him. His stronger Neighbors were afraid of him, and envied much his greatnesse, and did take it no good policy to suffer him thus to rise in the face of the World, and thought it meet speedily to daunt his glory, and clippe his wings. The first of the THUSCANS that bent their power against him, were the VEIANS, who had a great Countrey, and dwelled in a strong and mighty City. To pick a quarrell to him, they sent to have delivered to them the City of FIDENA, which they said belonged unto them. This was thought not onely unreasonable, but a thing worthy laughing at, considering that all the while the FIDENATES were in War and danger, the THUSCANES never came to their aide, but had suffered them to be slaine, and then came to demand their Lands and Tenements, when other had possession of them. Therefore Romulus having given them an Answer full of mockery and derision, they divided their power into two Armies, and sent the one against them of FIDENA, and with the other they marched towards ROME That which went against the City of FIDENA prevailed, and killed there two thousand ROMANS: the other was overthrowne and discomfited by Romulus, in which there died eight thousand VEIANS. Afterwards they met againe somewhat neare the City of the FIDENATES, where they fought a battell, and did confesse the chiefeft exploit was done by Romulus owne hands that day, who shewed all the skill and valiantnesse that was to be looked for in a worthy Capitaine. It seemed that day, he farre exceeded the common fort of men, in strength of body and feats of Armes. Nevertheless that which some say, is hardly to be credited: and to be plaine, is out of all compasse of beliefe and possibility. For they write, there were fourteene thousand men slaine at that Battell, and that more then halfe of them were slaine by Romulus owne hands: and the rather, for that every man judgeth it a vaine bragge and ostentation which the MESSENIANS report of Aristomenes, who offered in Sacrifice to the gods three hundred Beasts of Victory, as for so many LACEDÆMONIANS himselfe had slaine in the Battell. Their Army being thus broken, Romulus suffered them to flye who by swiftnesse could save themselves, and marched with all his power in good array towards their City. The Citizens then considering their late great losse and overthrow, would not hazard the danger of withstanding him, but went out all together, and made their humble petition and suite for peace. All was granted them for a hundred yeares, save they should forgo their Territory called Septemagium, that was the seventh part of their Countrey: and yeeld to the ROMANS all their salt-houses by the Rivers side, and deliver fifty of their chiefeft Citizens for their pledges. Romulus made his entry and Triumph into ROME for them, the day of the Ides of October, which is the fifteenth day of the same moneth, leading in his Triumph many prisoners taken in those Wars: and among other, the Generall of the VEIANS, a very ancient man, who fondly behaved himselfe in his charge, and shewed by his doings, that his experience was farre short for his yeares in the Wars. And from thence it cometh, when they offer to the gods to give thanks for his Victory, that even at this day, they bring to the Capitoll through the Market-place, an old man apparelled in a Purple Robe, and with a Jewell called Bulla about his neck, which the Gentlemens young Children wear about their necks: and a Herald goeth hard by him, crying, Who buyeth, who, the SARDIANIANS? because they hold opinion the THUSCANES are come of the SARDIANIANS, and the very City of VEIES standeth in the Countrey of THUSCANE. This was the last Warre that Romulus had offered him: after which he could not beware of that which is wont to happen almost to all those, who by sudden prosperity and fortunes speciall favour, are raised to high and great estate. For trusting to prosperity and good successe of his acts, he began to be more strange and stately, and to carry a frower countenance then he was wont to do before: leaving to be after his old manner, a courteous and gracious Prince: and gave himselfe in fashions to be somewhat like a Tyrant, both for his Apparell, and stately port and Majesty that he carried. For he ware ever a Coate of Purple in graine, and upon that, a long Robe of Purple colour: and gave audience, sitting in a wide Chaire of Estate, having ever about him young men called Celeres, as we would say, souldiers, for their swiftnesse and speed in executing of his Commandements. Other there were that went before him, who carried as it were Tipstaves in their hands, to make the People give roome, and had Leather Thongs about their middle to binde fast streight, all the Prince should command. Now in old time the LATINES said, Ligare was to binde: but at this present they say Alligare, from whence it cometh that the Ushers and Serjeants are called Littores. Howbeit methinks it were more likely to say, they had put to a c, and that before they were called Littores, without a c. For they be the very same which the GRECIANS call Liturgos, and be in English, Ministers or Officers: and at this day, Leitos, or Leos in the GREEKE Tongue signifieth the People. Romulus now after his Grandfather Numitor was dead at the City of ALBA, and that the Realme by inheritance fell to him: to win the favour of the People there, turned the Kingdome to a Common-weale, and every yeare did chuse a new Magistrate, to minister justice to the SABIANS. This president taught the Noblemen of ROME to seeke and desire to have a free Estate, where no Subject should be at the commandement of a King alone, and where every man should command and obey as should be his course. Those which were called Patricians in ROME, did meddle with nothing, but had onely an honourable Name and Robe, and were called to Councell rather for a fashion, then to have their advice or counsell. For when they were assembled together, they did onely heare the Kings pleasure and commandement, but they might not speake one word, and so departed: having no other preheminance over the Common-wealth, saving they were the first that did know what was done. All other things thereby did grieve them lesse. But when of his owne meere Authority, and as it were of himselfe, he would as pleased him, bestow the conquered Lands of his Enemies to his Souldiers, and restore againe to the VEIANS their Hostages as he did: therein plainly appeared, how great injury he did to the Senate. Whereupon the Senators were suspected afterward that they killed him, when within few dayes after it was said, he vanished away so strangely, that no man ever knew what became of him. This

This was on the seventh day of the Moneth now called July, which then was named Quintilis, leaving no manner of certainty else of his death that is knowne, save onely of the day and the time when he vanished, as we have said before. For on that day the ROMANS do at this present many things, in remembrance of the misfortune which happened to them then. It is no marvel, the certainty of his death was not knowne: seeing Scipio Africanus was found after supper dead in his house, and no man could tell, nor yet did know how he died. For some say, that he fainted and died suddenly, being of weak complexion. Other say, he poisoned himselfe: other think his Enemies did get secretly in the night into his house, and smothered him in his bed. Yet they found his body layed on the ground, that every body might at leisure consider, if they could finde or conjecture the manner of his death. Howbeit Romulus vanished away suddenly, there was neither scene piece of his Garments, nor yet was there found any part of his body. Therefore some have thought that the whole Senators fell upon him together in the Temple of Vulcan, and how after they had cut him in pieces, every one carried away a piece of him, folded close in the skirt of his Robe. Other think also, this vanishing away was not in the Temple of Vulcan, nor in the presence of the Senators only: but they say that Romulus was at that time without the City, neare the place called the Goats Marsh, where he made an Oration to the People, and that suddenly the weather changed, and overcast so terribly, as it is not to be told nor credited. For first, the Sun was darkened as if it had beene very night: this darknesse was not in a calme or still, but there fell horrible thunders, boysterous winds, and flashing lightnings on every side, which made the people run away, and scatter here and there, but the Senators kept still close together. Afterwards when the lightning was past and gone, the day cleared up, and the Element waxed faire as before: then the people gathered together againe, and sought for the King, asking what was become of him. But the Noblemen would not suffer them to enquire any further after him, but counselled them to honour and reverence him as one taken up into Heaven: and that thenceforth in stead of a good King, he would be unto them a mercifull and gracious god. The meaner sort of people (for the most part of them) tooke it well, and were very glad to heare thereof, and went their way worshipping Romulus in their hearts, with good hope they should prosper by him. Howbeit some seeking out the troth more eagerly, did cumber sore and troubled the PATRICIANS, accusing them, that they abused the common People with vaine and fond persuasions, whilst themselves in the meane time had murdered the King with their owne hands. While things were thus in hurly burly, some say there was one Julius Proculus, the noblest of all the PATRICIANS, esteemed for a marvellous honest man, and knowne to have beene very familiar with Romulus, and came with him from the City of ALBA: that stepped forth before all the People, and affirmed (by the greatest and holiest Oathes a man might sweare) that he had met Romulus on the way, far greater and fairer, then he had seene him ever before, and armed all in white Armour, shining bright like fire: whereat being affraid in that sort to see him, he asked him yet: O King, why hast thou thus left and forsaken us, that are so fallily accused and charged to our utter discredit and shame, by thy vanishing? To whom Romulus gave this answer: Proculus, it hath pleased the gods from whom I came, that I should remaine among men so long as I did: and now having built a City, which in glory and greatnesse of Empire shall be the chiefeft of the World, that I should returne againe to dwell with them, as before, in Heaven. Therefore be of good comfort, and tell the ROMANS, that they exercising prowesse and temperance, shall be the mightiest and greatest People of the World. As for me, tell them I will henceforth be their god, protector, and patron, and they shall call me Quirinus. These words seemed credible to the ROMANS, as well for the honesty of the man that spake unto them, as for the solemne oathes he made before them all. Yet I wot not how, some Celestiall Motion, or Divine Inspiration helped it much: for no man said a word against it. And so all suspicion and accusation laid aside, every man began to call upon Quirinus, to pray unto him, and to worship him. Truly this tale is much like the tales that the GRECIANS tell of Aristeus the Proconnesian, and of Cleomedes the Astypalærian. For they say, that Aristeus died in a Fullers workhouse, and his friends coming to carry away his body, it fell out they could not tell what became of it: and at that instant there were some which came out of the fields, and affirmed they met and spake with him, and how he kept his way towards the City of CROTONA. It is said also that Cleomedes was more then a man naturally strong and great, and therewithall mad, and furious hasty. For after many desperate parts he had plaid; he came at the last on a day into a Schoole-house full of little children, the rooffe whereof was borne with one pillar, which he did hit with so terrible a blow of his fist, that he brake it in the middt, so as the whole rooffe fell and dashed the poore children in pieces. The people ran straight after him to take him: but he threw himselfe forthwith into a Chest, and pulled the lid upon him. He held it so fast down, that many striving together all they could to open it, they were not able once to stir it. Whereupon they brake the Chest all in pieces, but they found the man neither quick nor dead. Whereat they were marvellously amazed, and sent to Apollo Pythius, where the Prophetesse answered them in this Verse:

The report goeth also that Alcmenes corse did vanish away, as they carried it to buriall, and how instead thereof they found a stone laid in the beere. To conclude, men tell many other such wonders, that are farre from any appearance of truth: onely because they would make men to be as gods, and equal with them in power. It is true, that as to reprove and deny Divine Power, it were a lewd and wicked part: even so to compare Earth and Heaven together, it were a meere folly. Therefore we must let such Fables go, being most certain that, as Pindarus saith, it is true:

Yet me thinks the one is an error of too much pity and baseness, and the other of too much pride and cruelty. But if we may not charge Fortune with all mischances happening unto men, but that we ought to consider in them the diversities of manners and passions, seeing anger is unreasonable, and wrath rash and passionate: then can we not cleere the one, nor excuse the other of extreme rage and passion, in the fact committed by one against his Brother, and by the other against his naturall Sonne. Howbeit the occasion and beginning of anger doth much excuse Theſeus, who moved with the greatest cause that might be, was put into such choler and passion. But if Romulus variance with his Brother had proceeded of any matter of counsell, or cause of the Commonweale; there is none so simple to thinke, that his wisdom would so suddenly have set upon him. Whereas Theſeus in contrary manner killed his Sonne, provoked by those passions that few men can avoide; to wit, love, jealousy, and false report of his Wife. Moreover Romulus anger went to the effect; whereof the issue fell out very lamentable: Theſeus anger stretched no further then to rough words and old folks curses in their heate: For it seemeth, curled Fortune, and nought else was the cause of his Sonnes only mishap, as fore-spoken and wished for somewhat by his Father. These be the speciall things may be alledged for Theſeus. But for Romulus this was a notable thing in him: First, His beginning being very low and meane, and his Brother and he taken for bondmen, and the Children of Hogheards, before they were themselves all free, they set at liberty in manner all the LATINS, winning at one instant many Titles of glory and honour: as, Destroyers of their Enemies, Defenders of their Parents, Kings of Nations, Founders of new Cities, and no overthrowers of the old: whereas Theſeus of many habitations and houses made onely one, and did overthrow and pluck downe divers States, bearing the Names of ancient Kings, Princes, and half-gods of ATTICA. All these also did Romulus afterward, and compelled his Enemies whom he had overcome, to destroy their owne houses, and to come and dwell with their Conquerours: And in the beginning, he never changed nor increased any City that was built before, but built himselfe a new City out of the ground, getting all together, Land, Countrey, Kingdome, Kindred and Marriages, without losing or killing any man: and to the contrary, rather he did good to many poore vagabonds, who had neither Countrey, Land nor houses, and desired nothing else but to make a People amongst them, and to become Citizens of some City. Also Romulus bent not himselfe to follow Theeves and Robbers, but subdued by force of armes many mighty and puissant people: he took Cities, and triumphed over Kings and Princes which he had vanquished in battell. And touching the murder of Remus, it is not certainly known of whose hands he died: the most part of Authours doe charge other with the death of him. But it is certaine that Romulus delivered his Mother from apparent death, and restored his Grandfather to the royall Throne of Enceas, who before was deposed and brought from a King to servile obedience, without any regard of honour or dignity; to whom he did many more great pleasures and services: Besides he never offended him willingly, no not so much as ignorantly. Contrary I thinke Theſeus, who failing by negligence to put out his white saile at his returne, cannot be cleared of parricide, how eloquent an Oration soever could be made for his excuse; yea though it were before the most favourable judges that could be. Wherefore an ATHENIAN very well perceiving that it was an hard thing to excuse and defend so foule a fault, doth feigne that the good old man Egeus having news brought him that his Sonnes Ship was at hand, did run in so great haste to his Castle, to see his Sonne arrive as farre off, that as he ran, his foot hit against something and overthrew him: as though he had none of his people about him, or that never a man seeing him run so hastily to the sea side, did make haste to attend and waite upon him. Furthermore, Theſeus faults touching Women and Ravishments, of the twain, had the lesse shadow and colour of honesty: Because Theſeus did attempt it very often: for he stole away Ariadne, Antiope, and Anaxo the TROEZIAN. Againe, being stepped in yeares, and at later age, and past marriage, he stole away Hellen in her minority, being nothing neer to consent to marry. Then his taking of the Daughters of the TROEZIANS, of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and the AMAZONS (neither contracted to him, nor comparable to the birth and lineage of his own Countrey which were at ATHENS, and descended of the Noble race and progeny of Erichonius, and of Cecrops) did give men occasion to suspect that his womanishnesse was rather to satisfie lust, then of any great love. Romulus now in a contrary manner, when his people had taken eight hundred or thereabouts, of the SAEYNE Women to ravish them, kept but one only one for himselfe that was called Herfilia, as they say, and delivered the rest to his best and most honest Citizens. Afterwards by the honour, love and entertainment that he caused them to have and receive of their Husbands, he changed this violent force of ravishment, into a most perfect bond and league of amity: which did so knit and joyne in one these two Nations, that it was the beginning of the great mutuall love which grew afterwards betwixt those two Peoples, and consequently of the joyning of their powers together. Furthermore, time hath given a good testimony of the love, reverence, constancy, kindnesse, and all matrimoniall offices that he established by that meane betwixt Man and Wife: For in two hundred and thirty yeares afterwards, there was never Man that durst forsake or put away his Wife, nor the Wife her Husband. And as among the GRECIANS, the best Learned men, and most curious observers of Antiquities, do know his Name that was the first murderer of his Father and Mother: even so all the ROMANS knew what he was, which first durst put away his Wife: It was one Spiritus Carvilius, because his Wife was barren and had no Children. The effects also doe agree with the testimony of the time: For the Realme was common unto the Kings of both Nations; and through the alliance of these Marriages that began first of Ravishments, both Nations lived peaceably, and in equality, under one civill policy, and well governed Commonweale.

The ATHENIANS contrariwise, by Theſeus Marriages, did get neither love nor Kindred of any one person, but rather they procured warres, enmities, and the slaughter of their Citizens, with the losse in the end of the City of APHIDNES: and yet very hardly, and by the mercy of their enemies (whom they honoured as gods) they escaped for him, the danger which the TROIANS suffered afterwards, for the selfe act done by Alexander Paris. So it fell out at the last, that his Mother was not onely in danger, but even feelingly suffered like misery and captivity, which Hecuba did afterwards, when she was forsaken of her Sonne: unlesse peradventure those things that they write of the imprisonment and captivity of Aisbra, be found false and but fables, as for the fame and memory of Theſeus were behoveful, that both it and many other things also, were of no more troth nor likelihood. That which they write of Romulus divinements, maketh great difference between him and Theſeus. For Romulus in his birth was preserved by the marvellous favour of the gods: Theſeus to the contrary was begotten against the gods will, as appeared plainly by the answer of the Oracle to Egeus, that he should not meddle with any Woman in a strange and forraigne Countrey.

THE LIFE OF LYCURGUS.

Ann. Mund.

Man cannot speake any thing at all of Lycurgus, who made the Lawes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, but he shall finde great contrariety of him amongst the Historiographers. For of his Parentage and travell out of his Countrey, of his Death and making of Lawes, of his forme of Government and order of executing the same, they have written diversly. And yet above all things, concerning him, they agree worst about the time he lived in: For some of them (and Aristotle is of that number) will needs have him to have been in the time of Iphycus, and that he did helpe him to stablish the Ordinance, that all Warres should cease during the Feast of the games Olympical: for a testimony whereof, they alledge the Copper coyt which was used to be throwne in those games, and had found graven upon it, the Name of Lycurgus. Other counting the dayes and time of the succession of the Kings of LACEDÆMON (as Erastostenes and Apollodorus) say, he was many yeares before the first Olympiad: Timaeus also thinketh there were two of this Name; and in divers times; howbeit the one having more estimation then the other, men gave this Lycurgus the glory of both their doings. Some say the eldest of the twaine was not long after Homer; and some write they saw him. Xenophon sheweth us plainly he was of great antiquity: saying he was in the time of the Heraclides, who were nearest of blood by descent to Hercules. For it is likely Xenophon meant not those Heraclides, which descended descended from Hercules selfe: for the last Kings of SPARTA were of Hercules progeny, as well as the first. Therefore he meaneth those Heracles, which doubtlesse were the first and nearest before Hercules time. Nevertheless though the Historiographers have written diversly of him, yet we will not leave to collect that which we finde written of him in ancient Histories, and is least to be denied, and by best testimonies most to be proved. And first of all, the Poet Simonides saith, his Father was called Prytanis and not Ennomus: and the most part do write the Pedigree otherwise, as well of Lycurgus selfe, as of Ennomus. For they say, that Paracles the Sonne of Aristodemus begat Sons, and Sons begat Eurytion, and Eurytion begat Prytanis, and Prytanis begat Ennomus, and Ennomus begat Polydeutes of his first Wife, and Lycurgus of the second Wife, called Dianassa: yet Euthycidas another Writer, maketh Lycurgus the first of descent in the right line from Polydeutes, and the eleventh after Hercules. But of all his ancestors, the Noblest was Sons, in whose time the City of SPARTA subdued the IOOTES, made them slaves, and did enlarge and increase their Dominion, with the Lands and Possessions they had got by Conquest of the ARCADIANS. And it is said that Sons himself being on a time straightly beleiged by the CLITORIANS, in a hard dry ground, where no water could be found, offered them thereupon to restore all their Lands againe that he had gotten from them, if he and all his company did drinke of a fountaine that was there not farre off. The CLITORIANS did grant unto it, and Peace also was sworne between them. Then he called all his Souldiers before him, and told them, if there were any one amongst them that would refrain from drinking, he would resigne his Kingdome to him: howbeit there was not one in all his company that could (or would) forbear to drinke, they were so fore athirst. So they all dranke heartily except himselfe, who being the last that came downe, did no more but a little moyst his mouth without, and and so refreshed himself, the enemies selves standing by, and dranke not a drop. By reason whereof, he refused afterwards to restore their Lands he had promised, alledging they had not all drunke. But that notwithstanding, he was greatly esteemed for his acts, and yet his house was not named after his own Name; but after his Sonnes Name Eurytion, they of his house were called Eurytionides. The reason was, because his Sonne Eurytion, to please the people, did first let fall and give over the sole and absolute power of a King. Whereupon there followed afterwards marvellous disorder and dissolution, which continued a great time in the City of SPARTA. For the people finding themselves at liberty, became very bold and disobedient: and some of the Kings that succeeded, were hated even to death, because they would perforce use their ancient authority over the people. Other, either to win the love and good-wills of the people, or because they saw they were not strong enough to rule them, did give themselves to dissemble. And this did so much increase the peoples loose and rebellious mindes, that Lycurgus own Father being King, was slaine among them. For one day, as he was parting a fray between two that were fighting, he had such a wound with a kitchen-knife, that he died: and left his Realme to his eldest Sonne Polydeutes, who died also soon after, and without Heir of his body, as was supposed. Inasmuch as every man thought Lycurgus should be King: and so he tooke it upon him, until it was understood that his Brothers Wife was young with Childe. Which thing so soone as he perceived, he published openly, that the Realme belonged to the Childe that should be borne, if it were a Sonne. After this he governed the Realme, but as the Kings Lieutenant and Regent. The LACEDÆMONIANS call the Regents of their Kings that are left within age, Prodicos. Lycurgus Brothers Widow did send, and let him secretly understand, that if he would promise to marry her when he should be King, that she would come before her time, and either miscarry or destroy that she went with. Lycurgus detestably abhorring this brutish and savage unnaturalnesse of the woman, did not reject her offer made him, but seemed rather to be very glad, then to dislike of it. Nevertheless he sent her word againe, she should not need to try malteries, with drinckes and medicines to make her come before her time; for in so doing, she might bring her selfe in danger, and be cast away for ever. Howbeit he advised her to goe her full time, and to be brought abed in good order, and then he would finde meanes enough to make away the Childe that should be borne. And so with such persuasions he drew on this woman to her full time of delivery. But so soone as he perceived she was neere her time, he sent certaine to keepe her, and to be present at her labour: commanding them, that if she were brought abed of a Daughter, they should leave her with the woman; and if it were a Sonne, they should forthwith bring it to him, in what place soever he was, and what businesse soever he had in hand. It chanced that the came even about supper-time, and was delivered of a Sonne. As he was sitting at the table with other Magistrates of the City, his servants entred the Hall, and presented to him the little Babe, which he tenderly took in his armes, and said openly to them that were present: Behold my Lords of SPARTA, here is a King borne unto us. And speaking these words, he laid him down in the Kings place, and named him Charilaus, as much to say as the joy of the people. Thus he saw all the lookers on rejoycing much, and might heare them praise and extoll his sincerity, justice and vertue. By this meanes he reigned onely as King but eight moneths: from whenceforth he was taken and esteemed for just and sincere a man among the Citizens, that there were more that willingly obeyed him for his vertue, then for that he was the Kings Regent, or that he had the government of the whole Realme in his hands. Notwithstanding there were some that bare him displeasure and malice, who sought to hinder and disgrace his credit, and chiefly the friends and kindred of the Kings Mother, whose Power and Honour were thought much impaired by Lycurgus authority: inasmuch as a Brother of hers called Leonidas, entring boldly into great words with him on a day, did not sticke to say to his face, I know for a certainty one of these dayes thou wilt be King; meaning thereby to bring him in suspicion with the Citizens. Which thing thing though Lycurgus never meant, yet of a subtil and crafty wit, Leonidas thought by giving out such words, that if the young King happened to die in his minority naturally, it would be mistrusted that Lycurgus had secretly made him away. The Kings Mother also gave out such like speeches, which in the end did so trouble him, with the fear he had, what event might fall out thereof, that he determined to depart his Country, and by his absence to avoid the suspicion that therein might grow upon him any way. So he travelled abroad in the world as a stranger, until his Nephew had begotten a Sonne who was to succeed him in his Kingdom. He having with this determination taken his journey, went first of all into Creta, where he diligently observed and considered the manner of their living, the order of the government of their Commonweale, and ever kept company with the best, and ever was conferring with the most Learned. There he found very good Lawes in his judgement, which he noted of purpose to carry home to his Country, to serve when time should come. He found there other Lawes also; but of them he made no reckoning. Now there was one man that above the rest was reputed wise and skillfull in matters of State and Government, who was called Thales; with whom Lycurgus did so much by intreaty, and for familiar friendship, that he persuaded him to go with him unto SPARTA. This Thales was called the Poet Harper, whereupon he had that Title and Name; but in effect he sang all that the best and sufficientest Governours of the world could devise: for all his Songs were goodly Ditties, wherein he did exhort and persuade the people to live under obedience of the Law, in peace and concord one with the other. His words were set out with such tunes, countenance and accents, that were so full of sweetnesse, harmony and piercing, that inwardly it melted mens hearts, and drew the hearers of a love to like the most honest things, and to leave all hatred, enmity, sedition and division, which at that time reigned among them. So as it may be said, he it was that prepared the way for Lycurgus, whereby he afterwards reformed and brought the LACEDÆMONIANS unto reason. At his departing out of Creta, he went into Asia, with intent (as it is said) to compare the manner of life and policy of those of Creta (being then very straight and severe) with the superfluities and vanities of Ionia: and thereupon to consider the difference betweene their two manners and governments, as the Physician doth, who to know the whole and healthfull the better, doth use to compare them with the sick and diseased. It is very likely it was there, where he first saw Homers Works, in the hands of the heirs and successours of Cliophylus: and finding in the same, as well many rules of policy, as the great pleasure of Poets faining; he diligently copied it out, and made a volume thereof to carry into Greece. It is true, there was much fame abroad of Homers poesies among the Grecians, howbeit there were few of them brought together; but were scattered here and there in diverse mens hands, in pamphlets and pieces unsewed and without any order: but the first that brought them most to light among men, was Lycurgus. The EGYPTIANS say, that he was in their countrey also, and that having found there one notable Ordinance among other, that their souldiers and men of war were separated from the rest of the people, he brought the practise of it into SPARTA: where setting the Merchants, Artificers and Labourers every one apart by themselves, he did establish a noble Commonweale. So the EGYPTIAN Historiographers, and some others also of Greece do write. He was also in AFRICK, and in SPAIN, and as farre as INDIA, to conferre with the wise men there, that were called the Philosophers of INDIA. I know no man that hath written it, saying Aristocrates, that was Hipparchus sonne. The LACEDÆMONIANS wished for him often when he was gone, and sent diverse and many a time to call him home: who thought their Kings had but the honour and title of Kings, and not the vertue or majesty of a Prince, whereby they did excell the common people. But as for Lycurgus, they thought of him thus: that he was a man borne to rule, to command, and to give order, as having in him a certaine naturall grace and power, to draw men willingly to obey him. Moreover the Kings themselves were not unwilling to have him to returne home, because they hoped that his presence would somewhat bridle and restrain the people from their insolency and disobedience towards them. Whereupon Lycurgus returning home in this opinion and affection of men, it fell out that he was no sooner arrived, but he began to devise how to alter the whole government of the Commonweale, and throughout to change the whole course and order of the State: thinking that to make only certaine particular Lawes were to no purpose, but much like, as one should give some easie medicine, to purge an overthrowne body with all humours and diseases. Therefore he thought first that all grosse and superfluous humours were meet to be dissolved and purged, and then afterwards to give them a new form and order of government. When he had thus determined with himself, before he would take in hand to do any thing, he went to the City of DELPHES: where after he had sacrificed to Apollo, he consulted with him about his matters. From whom he returned with his glorious title by the Oracle of Pythia: O beloved of the gods, and rather god then man. Where when he craved grace of Apollo to establish good Lawes in his Country, it was answered him: that Apollo granted his petition, and that he should ordaine the best and perfectest manner of a Commonweale, that ever had or should be in the world. This answer did comfort him very much, and so he began to break his purpose to certain of the chiefe of the City, and secretly to pray and exhort them to helpe him, going first to those he knew to be his friends, and after by little and little he won others to him, who joined with him in his enterprise. So when he saw the time fit for the matter; he caused thirty of the chiefe men of the City in a morning to come into the market-place well appointed and furnished, to suppress those that would attempt to hinder their purpose. Hermippus the Historiographer rehearseth twenty of the chiefe: but he that above all others did most assist him in his doings, and was the greatest aid unto the stablishing of his Lawes, Laws, was called Arithmiadas. The King Charilaus hearing of this assembly, did fear there had been some conspiracy or infurrection against his person, and for his safety he fled into the Temple of Juno, and Chalceus, as much to say, as Juno's brazen Temple. Howbeit afterwards when he knew the troth, he waxed bold and came out of the Temple again, and he himself favoured the interprise, being a Prince of a noble minde, howbeit very soft by nature, as witnesseth Archelaus (that was then the other King of LACEDÆMON) by telling how Charilaus answered one that praised him to his face, in saying he was a good man. And how should I not (quoth he) be good, when I cannot be evil to the evil? In this change of the state, many things were altered by Lycurgus, but his chiefest alteration was, his Law of the erection of a Senate, which he made to have a regal power and equall authority with the Kings in matters of weight and importance, and was (as Plato saith) to be the healthful counterpoise of the whole body of the Commonweale. The other State before was ever wavering, sometime inclining to tyranny, when the Kings were too mighty: and sometime to confusion, when the people would usurpe authority. Lycurgus therefore placed between the Kings and the people, a Counsell of Senators, which was as a strong beane, that held both these extremes in an even balance, and gave sure footing and ground to either part to make strong the state of the Commonweale. For the 28. Senators (which made the whole body of the Senate) tooke sometime the Kings part, when it was needfull to pull down the fury of the people: and contrarily, they held sometimes with the people against the Kings, to bridle their tyrannical government. Aristotle saith, he ordained the number of Senators to be but eight and twenty, because two of thirty that joyned with him as afore, did for feare forsake him at his enterprise. Howbeit Sphermus writeth, that from the beginning, he never purposed to have more then eight and twenty to be the Senate. And perhaps he had great regard to make it a perfect number, considering it is compounded of the number of seven, multiplied by foure: and is the first perfect number next to six being equall to all parts gathered together. But as for me, my opinion is, he chose this number rather then any other, because he meant the whole body of the Counsell should be but thirty persons, adding to that number, the two Kings. Lycurgus tooke so great care to establish well this Counsell, that he brought an Oracle for it, from Apollo's Temple in DELPHES. This Oracle is called unto this day Retra, as who would say, the Statute-Oracle: wherof the answer was: When thou hast built a Temple unto Jupiter the Syllanian, and to Minerva, the Syllanian, and divided the people into lineages, thou shalt establish a Senate of thirty Counsellors, with the two Kings: and shalt assemble the people at times convenient, in the place betweene the bridge and the River CNACION. There the Senators shall propound all matters and breake up after their assemblies: and it shall not be lawfull for the people to speake one word. In those dayes the people were ever assembled betweene two Rivers, for there was no Hall to assemble a Counsell at large, nor any other place prepared for them. For Lycurgus thought no builded place meet for men to give good counsell in, or to determine causes, but rather a hinderance: (because in such places men be drawne to muse on vaine things, and their mindes be carried away with beholding the Images, Tables, and Pictures, commonly set up for ornament in such open places. And if it be in a Theater, then beholding the place where the playes and sports be made, they think more of them, then of any counsell. Again, if it be in a great hall, then of the faire embowed or vawted roofs, or of the fretted feelings curiously wrought, and sumptuously set forth, and tend not fill their businesse they come for. When the people were assembled in counsell, it was not lawfull for any of them to put forth matters to the counsell to be determined, neither might any of them deliver his opinion what he thought of any thing: but the people had only authority to give their assent (if they thought good) to the things propounded by the Senators, or the two Kings. Howbeit afterwards, the two Kings Polydorus and Theopompus, because the people did many times crosse and alter the determination of the Senate, by taking away or adding something to it, they did adde these words to the Oracle afore said: That if the people would not assent to any Ordinance of the Senate, then should it be lawfull for the Kings and Senate to breake up the counsell, and to frustrate all things done in the same: the wise advice of the Senate being encountered thus, and their meaning to the best, so perverted to the worse. These two Kings perfwaded the people, that at the very first, this addition came with the Oracle of Apollo as the Poet Tyrtamus maketh mention in the place, where he saith:

*From Delphos Ile, this oracle is brought
Of Pythia, into their countrey soile.*

*The Kings (even they to whom of right there ought

Shall be the chief, grave causes to decide

With Senators: whose sound advice is tride

And next to them the people shall fulfill

As much as seemes to please their princes will.

Lycurgus now having thus tempered the form of his common-weale, it seemed not withstanding to those that came after him, that this small number of thirty persons that made the Senate, was yet too mighty, and of too great authority. Wherefore to bridle them in a litle, they gave them (as Plato saith) a bit in their mouths, and that was the Ephores, which signifie as much as controullers: and were erected about a hundred and thirty years after the death of Lycurgus. The first which was chosen of these, was Elatus, and it was in the time of King Theopompus, whose wife on a day in her anger said: How through his negligence he would leave lesse to his successors; then he had received received of his predeceffors. To whom he answered againe, Not lesse, but more, for that it shall continue longer, and with a more surety. For, in losing thus their too absolute power that wrought them great envy and hatred among their Citizens, they did escape the danger and mischief that their neighbours the ARGIVES and MESSENIANS did feele: who would not give over the soveraigne authority which they had gotten once. This example maketh Lycurgus great wisdom and foresight manifestly knowne: who so will deeply consider the seditions and ill governments of the ARGIVES, and MESSENIANS (their neere neighbours and kinfmen) as well from the people, as from the Kings; who from the beginning had all things alike to the SPARTANS: and in dividing of their Lands a far better order then theirs. This notwithstanding they did not prosper long, but through the pride of their Kings, and the disobedience of their people, they entred into civil wars one against another, shewing by their disorders and misfortunes the special grace the gods did beare to SPARTA, to give them such a reformer, as did so wisely temper the state of their Commonweale, as we will shew hereafter. The second Law that Lycurgus made, and the boldest and hardest he ever took in hand, was the making of a new division of their Lands. For he saw so great a disorder and inequality among the inhabitants, as well of the Country, as of the City LACEDÆMON, by reason some (and the greatest number of them) were so poor, that they had not a handfull of ground, and other some being least in number were very rich, that had all: he thought with himself to banish out of the City all infolency, envy, covetousnes, and delicioufnes, and also all riches and poverty, which he took for the greatest, and most continual plagues of a City, or Commonweale. For this purpose, he imagined there was none so ready and necessary a meane, as to perswade his Citizens to suffer all the Lands, Possessions, and Inheritance of their Countrey, to runne in common together: and that they should make a new division equally in partition amongst themselves, to live from thenceforth as it were like brothers together, so that no one were richer then another, and none should seeke to goe before each other, any other way then in vertue onely: thinking there should be no difference or inequality among inhabitants of one City, but the reproaches of dishonesty, and the praises of vertue. Thus Lycurgus following his determination, did out of hand make a Law of the division of their Lands. For first he did divide all the Countrey of LACONIA, into thirty thousand equal parts, the which he did set out for those that inhabited about SPARTA: and of those Lands that joyned next to the City of SPARTA, that was the first metropolis of LACONIA, he made other nine thousand parts, which he divided to the naturall Citizens of SPARTA, who be those that are properly called SPARTANS. Howbeit some will say, he made but six thousand parts, and that King Polydorus afterwards did adde two other three thousand parts. Others say also, that Lycurgus of these nine thousand parts made but the halfe onely, and Polydorus the rest. Every one of these parts was such, as might yeeld unto the owner yearly, threecore and ten bushels of Barley for a Man, and twelve bushels for the Woman, and of Wine and other liquid fruits, much like in proportion, which quantity Lycurgus judged to be sufficient, to keep the body of a man in health, and to make him strong and lusty, without any further allowance. They say after this, as he returned home one day out of the fields, and came over the Lands where Wheate had been reaped not long before, and saw the number of sheaves lying in every focke together, and no one focke bigger then another: he fell a laughing, and told them that were with him, Me thinks all LACONIA is as it were an Inheritance of many Brethren, who had newly made partition together. He gave an attempt to have divided also moveables, and to have made a common partition betweene them, to the end he would have utterly taken away all inequality. But finding the Citizens tooke it very impatiently, that openly that which they had should be taken away, he went about to do it more secretly, and in a cunninger wise to take away that covetousnesse. For first of all he did forbid all Coine of Gold and Silver to be currant: and then he did set out certaine Coines of Iron, which he commanded only to be currant, whereof a great weight and quantity was but little worth. So as to lay up thereof the value of ten Minas: it would have occupied a whole cellar in a house, besides it would have needed a yoke of Oxen to carry it any where. Now Gold and Silver being thus banished out of the Countrey, many lewd parts and faults must needs cease thereby. For who would rob, steale, pick, take away, hide, procure, or hoord up any thing, that had no great occasion to desire, nor any profit to possesse, nor would be any pleasure to use or employ? For, the Iron they occupied for their Coine, they cast Vinegar upon it while it was red-hot out of the fire, to kill the strength and working of it to any other use: for thereby it was so eager and brittle, that it would bide no hammer, nor could be made, beaten, or forged to any other fashion. By this meane he banished also, all superfluous and unprofitable Sciences, which he knew he should not need to doe by any Proclamation: because they would fall away (or the most part of them) even of themselves, when the basenesse of the Money they should take for their work, should undoe them. For their Iron monies were not currant elsewhere in the Cities of GREECE, but every body made a jest of it there. By this occasion, the LACEDÆMONIANS could buy no forreigne wares nor merchandises, neither came there any Ship into their haven to trafficke with them, neither any fine curious Rhetorician did repaire into their Countrey to teach them eloquence, and the cunning craft of lying: nor yet came there to them any Wisard to tell them their Fortune, nor any Pander to keep any Brothell house; nor yet Goldsmith or Jeweller, to make or sell any toyes or trifles of gold or silver to set forth Women: considering all these things are used to be made to get Money, and to hoord up that they had not. After this sort, delicatenesse that wanted many things that entertained it, began by little and little to vanish away, and lastly, to fall off from themselves: when the most rich men have no more occasion then the poorest, and having no meane to shew her selfe openly in the world, was faine to remaine shut at home idly, as not able to doe her Master any service. Thereupon moveables and household stuff (which a man cannot be without, and must be daily occupied) as bedsteads, tables, chaires, and such like necessaries for a house, were excellently well made: and men did greatly praise the fashion of the LACONIAN Cup which they called Cothon, and especially for a Souldier in the wars, as Critias was wont to say. For it was made after such a fashion, that the color of it did let the eye to discern the foule and unwholsome water, which men are driven oft times to drinke in a Campe, and goeth many times against ones stomach to see it: and if by chance there was any filth or mud in the bottom, it would cleave and stick fast upon the ribs of the belly, and nothing came through the neck but cleane water to his mouth that dranke it. The reformer of their State was the cause of all this: because their Artificers tending now to superfluous works, were occupied about the making of their most necessary things. Further, now to drive away all superfluity and delicioufnesse, and to root out utterly desire to get and gather: he made another third Law for eating and drinking, and against feasts and banquets. First he willed and commanded the Citizens, that they should eate together all of one meate, and chiefly of those he had permitted by his Ordinance. Then he did expressly forbid them to eate alone, or apart, or secretly by themselves, upon rich tables and sumptuous beds, abusing the labour of excellent workmen, and the devices of lickerish Cooks, to cramme themselves in corners, as they do to fat up Beasts and Poultry, which doth not onely breed ill conditions in the minde, but doth marre the complexions of men, and the good state of their bodies, when they give themselves over to such sensuality and gluttony. Whereof it followeth in the end, that men must needs sleepe much, to helpe to digest the excessse of meates they have taken, and then must they goe to the hot-houles to bathe themselves, and spend long time about the ordinary attendance of their sickly bodies. This was a marvellous thing for him for to bring to passe, but much more, to make riches not to be stolten, and least of all to be covered, as Theophrastus said of him: which by this meane of making them eate together with all sobriety at their ordinary diet, was brought to passe. For there was no more meane to the rich, then to the poore, to use to play, or shew riches, fith both of them were forced to be together in one place, and to eate all of one meate: so as that which is commonly spoken, that Pluto the god of riches is blinde, was truly verified onely in the City of SPARTA, above all other places of the world. For there riches were laid on the ground like a corse without a foule, that moveth no whit at all: considering it was not lawfull for any man to eate at home secretly in his house before he came to their open Halls, nor might not come thither for a countenance onely to his meales, being already full and well fraught. For every mans eye was upon those especially which did not eate and drinke with a good stomach amongst them: and it was the use to reproach them as gluttons, and dainty mouthed men, which refused to eate as it were in common together. So as this was the Ordinance they say, that grieved most the rich above all that Lycurgus made, and whereat they were most mad and angry with him: in so much, as on a day, they all setting upon him to alter it, he was compelled to run out of the market-place, and getting ground of them, he recovered the liberties of a Church, before any could overtake him, saving one young man called Alcander, who otherwise had no ill nature in him, but that he was somewhat quick of his hand, and cholerick withall. Who following Lycurgus neerer then any other, did give him a blow overthwart the face with a staffe, and strake out one of his eyes, as Lycurgus turned toward him. Yet for all this, Lycurgus never bashed or made word at the matter, but did lift up his head to those that followed him, and shewed them his face all a gore-bloud, and his eye put out cleane: whereof they were so fore ashamed, that there was not a man that durst once open his mouth against him, but to the contrary, they seemed to pity him, and did deliver Alcander into his hands that had done the deed, to punish him as himselfe pleased. And so they all brought him to his house, and shewed they were right heartily sorry for his hurt. Lycurgus thanking them, returned them all backe againe, save that he made Alcander to goe with him into his house, where he never hurt him, nor gave him fowle word: but commanded him onely to waite upon him, and made his other ordinary servants to withdraw their waiting. This young man who now began to spie his own fault, did most willingly attend upon him, and never spake word to the contrary. When he had served him a certaine time, being very neere continually about him, he began to feeble and taste of his naturall liberality, and law of what affection and intention Lycurgus was moved to doe all he did: he perceived what was the severity of his ordinary life, and what his constancy was to endure labour without wearinesse. Alcander then began to love and honour Lycurgus from his heart, and told his Parents and Friends, how he was no such severe man as he seemed, but was of so kinde and gentle a nature to all men as might be. See I pray you how Alcander was transformed by Lycurgus, and his punishment also, which he should have received: for of a fierce, rash, and lewd conditioned youth he was before, he became now a very grave and wise man. But for memory of this his misfortune, Lycurgus built a Temple to Minerva, which he surnamed Opiiletide, because the DORIANS which dwell in those parts of PELOPONNESUS, do call the eye, Opiiletide. There are other Writers (as Dio Corides for one) which say Lycurgus had a blow with a staffe, but he had not his eye stricken out with it: and how contrariwise, he founded this Temple to Minerva, to give thanks for healing of his eye. Hereof it came, that ever since the SPARTANS have bene restrained to carry staves in any assembly of Counsell. But to returne to their common repasts, which the CRETANS call Andria, and the LACEDÆMONIANS Phiditia, either because they were were places wherein they learned to live soberly and straightly, (for in the GREEKE Tongue Phido is to save and spare) or else because their amity and friendship grew there towards one another, as if they would have called them Philitia, Feasts of Love, by changing D. into L. It may be also they added the first Letter as superfluous, and meant to call the places Editia, because they did eate and drinke there: They sate in their Halls by fiftene in a company, little more or lesse; and at the beginning of every moneth, every one brought a bushell of Meale, eight gallons of Wine, five pound of Cheele, and two pound and a halfe of Figgs for a Man, besides some little portion of their Money to buy certain fresh Cates. And over and above all this, every man when he did sacrifice in his house was bound to send the best and chiefeft things of his Sacrifice to the Halls to be eaten. Likewise if any man went on hunting, and killed any Venison, it was an order, he should send a piece of the flesh thither. Having these two lawfull causes, they might eate and drinke by themselves at home, either when they sacrificed any beast to the gods, or when they came late home from hunting: otherwise they were bound of necessity to meet in their Halls at meales, if they would eat any thing. This order they kept very straightly a great time: in so much as King Agis on a day, returning from the wars, where he had overthrowne the ATHENIANS, and being desirous to sup at home privately with the Queen his Wife, he sent to the Halls for his portion. But the Polemarchi, that be certain Officers assisting the King in the wars, did deny him. The next day Agis left off for spite, to do the accustomed Sacrifice they were wont to celebrate in the end of every war: whereupon they set a fine on his head, and condemned him to pay it. The young Children also went to these repasts, even as they should goe to Schooles to learne Gravity and Temperance, where they heard wise and grave discourses touching the government of a Commonweale, but not of Masters that were as hirelings. There they learned prettily to play upon Words, and pleasantly to sport one with another, without any broad speeches or uncomely jests; and at others hands to beare the same againe, without choler or anger. For this property have the LACEDÆMONIANS above all other, to take and give a mock without any offence: nevertheless if any mans nature could not beare it, he needed but pray the party to forbear his jesting, and so he left it straight. And it was ever an ordinary thing among them, that the eldest of the company told the rest that were come into the Hall to meale, with shewing them of the doore: Sirs, remember, there goeth not a word here out of this doore. Even so he that would be received to meale there in their company, must first of necessity be allowed and received in this sort, by all the rest. Every one of them took a little ball of bran or dow to wash their hands with, and without ever a word speaking, they threw it into a basin, which the servant that waited on them at the table did carry upon his head: he that was contented the other should be received in company, did cast in his ball as he did receive it; but if he misliked him, then he pressed it flat betwene his fingers, and threw it in. This ball of bran thus pressed flat, was as much as a Beane bored through, and was to them a signe of condemnation. If any one ball were found of this sort, the suiter was rejected: for they would not have any enter into their company that was not liked of all the rest. He that thus was rejected, they say he was discarded: for the basin wherein the little balls were carried, was called Caddos. The best dish they served at these meales, was that they call their black-broth: so that when they had that, the old men did eate no flesh, but left it all to the young men, and they by themselves did eate the broth. There was a King of PONTUS, that being desirous to taste of this black-broth, did buy of purpose a LACEDÆMONIAN Cook: but after he had once tasted thereof, he was very angry straight. The Cook then said unto him: And if please your grace, ere one shall finde this broth good, he must be washed first in the River EUROTAS. After they had eate and drunke thus soberly together, every one repaired home without any light: for it was not lawfull for them to go thither, nor any where else with light, because they should accustom themselves boldly to goe up and down the darke, and all about in the night. This was the order and manner of their meales. But here is specially to be noted, that Lycurgus would in no wise have any of his Lawes put in writing. For it is expressly set down in his Lawes they call Retra, that none of his Lawes should be written. For he thought that which should chiefly make a City happy and vertuous, ought thoroughly by education to be printed in mens hearts and manners, as to have continuance for ever: which he tooke to be love and good-will, as a farre stronger knot to tie them with, then any other compulsory Law. Which when men by use and custom, through good education, doe take in their childhood, it maketh every man to be a Law to himselfe. Furthermore, concerning buying and bargaining one with another, which are but trifles, and sometime are changed into one sort, and sometime in another, as occasion serveth: he thought it best not to constrain them to do it by writing, nor to establish customes that might not be altered, but rather to leave them to the liberty and discretion of men which had bene brought up in the same, both to take away, and to adde therein, as the case and time should require. But to conclude, he thought the chiefeft point of a good Law-maker or reformer of the Commonweale was, to cause men to be well brought up and instructed. One of his Ordinances therefore was expressly, that not one of his Lawes should be written. Another of his devices was, against superfluous charges and expences: which to avoid, he made a Law that all roofs of houses should be made onely with the axe, and all gates and doores with the sawe, and that without any other toole of occupation. Wherein he had the like imagination as afterwards Epaminondas had, when he said, speaking of his table: Such a boord never receiveth any treason. Even so thought Lycurgus, that such a built house would never receive curiositie or daintinesse. For no man is so madly disposed or simple witted, as to bring into so poore and meane houses, bedsteads with Silver feet, imbrodered coverlets, or counterpoints of purple filke, neither yet plate of gold nor of silver, nor such other like costly furniture and fineness, as those things require to waite upon them: because the beds must be answerable to the meanness of the house, the furnitures of the beds must be fitlike to the same, and all other household-stuffe, diet, meat and drinke agreeable to the rest. Hereof proceeded that, which Leontychidas the first King of that Name, said once: who supping on a time in the City of CORINTH, and seeing the roof of the Hall where he sat, sumptuously embowed and carved, he asked straight if the Trees did grow carved so in that Country. The third Law was, he did forbid them to make warre often with one enemy, lest the enemy forced to take often armes in hand, might in the end grow experter and valiantier then they. For this cause King Agislaus was greatly blamed who was a long time after: For by making often warres with the Country of BOEOTIA, he made the THEBANS in the end as expert and valiant Souldiers as the LACEDÆMONIANS. Whereupon Antalcidas seeing him hurt one day, said unto him: The THEBANS have nobly rewarded thee for their learning, sith thou hast made them expert Souldiers unwilling to learne the discipline of warre. These be the Lawes Lycurgus selfe called Retra, and signifies as much as Oracles, that the god Apollo had discovered to him. Now the education of Children, he esteemed the chiefest and greatest matter that a reformer of Lawes should establish. Therefore beginning afarre off, he first considered the state of Marriage and the generation of Children. For Aristotle saith, that Lycurgus did attempt to reforme Women, and did soone give it over againe: because he could do no good therein, by reason of the great liberty they had taken by the absence of their Husbands in the warres, compelled often so to be abroad, and that they did leave them Mistresses of their houses, and at their returne did honour them so much, and make of them so beyond measure, with calling of them Ladies and Mistresses: Howbeit this is true, that he had an eye to the rule and order of their life, as well as he had of Mens; and so reason did require. First of all, he willed that the Maidens should harden their bodies with exercise of running, wrestling, throwing the Barre, and casting the Dart, to the end that the fruit wherewith they might be afterwards conceived, taking nourishment of a strong and lusty body, should shoot out and spread the better: and that they by gathering strength thus by exercises, should more easily away with the pains of Child-bearing. And to take away from them their womannish daintinesse and fineness, he brought up a custome, for young Maides and Boyes to goe as it were a profection; and to dance naked at solemne Feasts and Sacrifices, and to sing certaine Songs of their owne making, in the presence and sight of young men. To whom by the way they gave many times pretty mocks of purpose, as pleasantly hitting them home, for things wherein before they had forgotten their duties: and sometimes also in their Song, for their virtues, witts or manners, they praised them which had deserved it. By this means they did set young mens hearts on fire, to strive to winne most praise and honour. For who so was praised of them for a valiant man, or whose worthy acts were sung by them, he thereby was encouraged to do the better another time: and the pretty girds and quippes they gave to others, were of no lesse force, then the sharpest words and admonitions that otherwise could be given them. This tooke place the rather, because it was done in the presence of the Kings, the Senators, and all the rest of the Citizens which came thither to see those sports. And though the Maids did shew themselves thus naked openly, yet was there no dishonesty seene nor offered, but all this sport was full of playes and toys, without any youthfull part or wantonnesse: and rather carried a shew of demurenesse, and a desire to have their best-made bodies seene and spied. Moreover, it somewhat lifted up their hearts, and made them noblier minded, by giving them to understand, that it was no lesse comelier for them, in their kinde and exercises to carry the Bell, then it was for men in their games and exercises to carry the prize. Hereof it came, that the Women of LACEDÆMON were so bold to say, and think of themselves that, which Gorgon the Wife of King Leonidas one day answered, being in talke with a strange woman that said to her; There be no Women in the world that command their Husbands, but you Wives of LACEDÆMON. Whereto the Queene straight replied: So be there no Women but we, which bring forth Men. Furthermore, these playes, sports and dances, the Maids did naked before young men, were provocations to draw and allure the young Men to marry: not as perswaded by Geometrical reasons, as saith Plato, but brought to it by liking and of very love. Those which would not marry he made infamous by Law. For it was not lawfull for such to be present, where those open games and pastimes were shewed naked. Furthermore the Officers of the City compelled such as would not marry, even in the hardest time of the winter, to environ the place of these sports, and to go up and downe stark naked, and to sing a certaine Song made for the purpose against them, which was; that justly were they punished, because that Law they disobeyed. Moreover, when such were old, they had not the honour and reverence done them; which old married men usually received. Therefore there was no man that misliked or reproved that, which was spoken to Democritus: albeit otherwise he was a noble Captaine. For, coming into a preference, there was a young man which would not vouchsafe to rise and do him reverence, nor to give him place for to sit down: And worthily, quoth he, because thou hast not gotten a Sonne, who may doe so much for me in time to come. Those which were desirous to marry any, were driven to take them away by force whom they would marry, not little young wenches I meane, which were not of age to be married; but lusty and strong Maides, of age to beare Children. And when one of them was stolen away in this sort, she that was privie thereto, and meant to make the marriage, came and shaved the hairs of her head that was married: then she put her into mans apparell, and gave her all things sute-like th the same, and laid her upon a mattresse all alone, without light or Candle. After this was done, the Bridegroom being neither drunk nor finelier apparelled then he was wont to be, but having supped soberly at his Ordinary, came home secretly to the house where the Bride was: and there untied his Wives girdle, tooke her in his arms, layed her upon a bed, and talked together a while, and afterwards faire and softly stole away to the place where he was wont to sleepe with other young men. And so from thenceforth, he continued alwaies to do the like, being all the day time with his Companions, and sleeping most of the night, unless he sometime stole to see his Wife; being afraid, and ashamed ever to be seene by any of the house where she was. And hereunto his young Wife did helpe for her part, to spie meanes and occasions how they might meete together, and not be seene. This manner endured a great while and untill some of them had Children, before they boldly met together, and saw each other on the day time. This secret meeting in this sort did serve to good purposes, not onely because it was some meane of continencie, and chastenesse, but also it kept their bodies in strength and better State to bring forth Children. It continued also in both parties, as still burning Love and a new desire of the one to the other, not as it were luke-warme, nor weary, as their commonly be which have their Bellies full of Love, and as much as they lust; but they ever parted with an Appetite one from another, keeping still a longing desire to devise how to meet againe. Now when he had stablished such a continencie, and so kinde a framed Honesty in Marriage, he tooke no lesse care to drive away all foolish jealousie therein, thinking it very good reason to beware there should be no violence, nor confusion in Marriage: and yet as reason would, they should suffer those which were worthy to get Children as it were in common, laughing, at the mad folly of them which revenge such things with Warre and Bloudshed, as though in that case men in no wise should have no fellowship together. Therefore a man was not to be blamed, being stepped in yeares, and having a young Wife, if seeing a faire young Man that liked him, and knowne with all to be of a gentle Nature, he brought him home to get his Wife with Child, and afterwards would avow it for his, as if himselfe had gotten it. It was Lawfull also for an Honest man that Loved another mans Wife, for that he saw her wife, shamefast, and bringing forth goodly Children, to intreat her Husband to suffer him to lye with her, and that he might also plow in that lusty ground, and cast abroad the seede of well favoured Children: which by this meane came to be Common in Bloud and Parentage, with the most Honourable and Honestest persons. For first of all, Lycurgus did not like that Children should be private to any man, but that they should be Common to the Commonweale: by which reason he would also, that such as should become Citizens, should not be begotten of every man, but of the most Honestest man onely. So Lycurgus thought also there were many foolish vaine toys and fancies, in the Laws and Orders of other Nations, touching Marriage: seeing they caused their Bitches and Mares to be limed and covered with the fairest Dogs and goodliest Italons that might be gotten, praying or paying the Masters and owners of the same: and kept their Wives notwithstanding shut up safe under locke and key, for feare lest other then themselves might get them with Childe, although they were tickely, feeble brained, and extreme old. As if it were not first of all, and chiefly a discommodity to the Fathers and Mothers, and likewise to those that bring them up, to have unperfect and feeble Children borne, as it were begotten of dry and withered men: and then to the contrary, what pleasure and benefit is it to those that have faire and good Children borne, as gotten of like seede and man? These things were done then by Natural and civill reason, nevertheless they say Women were so farre off from intreatie, as ever they were before: so as in old time, in SPARTA, men knew not what adultery meant. For proove whereof, the answer made by Geradas (one of the first ancient SPARTANS) unto a stranger, may be alledged, that asked him, what punishment they had for Adulterers. My friend, quoth he there be none here. But if there were; replied the stranger againe. Marry said he, then he must pay as great a Bull; as standing upon the top of the Mountaine Taygetus, may drinke in the River Eurotas. Ye marry: but how is it possible (quoth the stranger) to finde such a Bull? Geradas laughing, answered him againe: And how were it possible also to finde an Adulterer in SPARTA? And this is that which is found of Lycurgus Lawes touching Marriages. Furthermore, after the Birth of every Boy, the Father was no more Master of him, to cocker and bring him up after his will: but he himselfe carried him to a certaine place called Lefché, where the eldest men of his kindred being set, did view the Child: and if they found him faire, and well proportioned of all his Limmes and strong, they gave order he should be brought up, and appointed him one of the nine thousand parts of Inheritance for his education. Contrariwise, if they found him deformed, mishapen, or Leane, or Pale, they sent him to be thrown in a deep pit of water, which they Commonly called Apothetes, and as a man would say, the Common house of office: holding Opinion it was neither good for the Child, nor yet for the Commonweale, that it should live, considering from his Birth he was not well made, nor given to be strong, healthfull, nor lusty of Body all his Life long. For this cause therefore, the Nurse after their Birth did not wash them with water simply (as they do every where at that time) but with water mingled with wine: and thereby did they prove, whether the Complexion or temperature of their Bodies were good or ill. For they suppose, that Children which are given to have the falling-Sicknesse, or otherwise to be full of reumes and sicknesse, cannot abide washing with wine, but rather dry and pine away: as contrarily the other which are healthfull, become thereby the stronger and the lustier. The Nurses also of SPARTA use a certain manner to bring up their Children, without swadling, or binding them up in clothes with swadling-bands, or having on their heads Crof-clothes: so as they made them nimble of their limmes, better shaped and goodlier of Body. Besides that, they acquainted their Children to all kinde of meates, and brought them up without much tendance, so as they were neither fine nor licentious, nor fearfull to be left alone in the dark: neither were they cryers, wrallers, or unhappy Children, which be all tokens of base and cowardly natures. So that there were strangers, that of purpose bought Nurfes out of LACONIA, to bring up their Children: as they say Amici was one of them which nurfed out of LACONIA. But Pericles his Tutor, gave him afterwards a bondman called Zopyrus, to be his Master and Governour: who had no better property in him, than other common slaves. This did not Eurygus. For he did not put the education and government of the Children of SPARTA into the hands of hired masters or slaves bought with money: neither was it lawfull for the Father himselfe to bring up his owne Childe after his owne manner and liking. For so soone as they came to seven yeares of age, he tooke and divided them by companies, to make them to be brought up together, and to accustom them to play, to learne, and to study one with another. Then he chose out of every company one, whom he thought to have the best wit, and had most courage in him to fight, to whom he gave the charge and oversight of his owne company. The rest had their eyes waiting alwayes on him, they did obey his commandements willingly, they did abide patiently all corrections he gave them, they did such tasks and works as he appointed them: so that all their study was most to learne to obey. Furthermore, the old gray-headed men were present many times to see them play, and for the most part they gave them occasions to fall out, and to fight one with another, that they might thereby the better know and discern the naturall disposition of every one of them, and whether they gave any signes or tokens in time to come to become cowards or valiant men. Touching Learning, they had as much as served their turne: for the rest of their time they spent in learning how to obey, to away with paine, to endure labour, to overcome still in fight. According to their growth and yeares, they did change the exercises of their bodies: they did shave their heads, they went bare-legged, they were constrained to play naked together the most part of their time. After they were past twelve yeares of age, they wore no longer coats: and they gave them yearly but one filly gowne. This was the cause they were alwayes so salty and fluttrish, and they never used to bathe or noint themselves, saving onely at certaine dayes in the yeare, when they were suffered to taste of this refreshing. They lay and slept together upon beds of straw, which they themselves did make of the tops of reeds or canes that grew in the River of Euryotas: which they were forced to go gather and breake themselves with their hands, without any tooles or iron at all. In the winter, they did mingle thistle-downe with these, which is called Lycophomus, because that fluffe seemeth somewhat warme of it selfe. About this time, the favourers and likers of this pretty youth, which were commonly the lustiest and best disposed youths of the City, began to be offer in their company: and then the old men tooke the better regard unto them, and frequented more commonly the places of their daily exercises, and where their use was to fight together, helping them when they played, how one should mock another. This did their old men, not by way of paltine onely, but with such care and hearty love towards them, as if they had beene altogether their Fathers, Masters, and Governours, while they were boyes: inasmuch as there was never time nor place, where they had not alwayes some to admonish, reprove, or correct them, if they did a fault. Notwithstanding all this, there was ever one of the honestest men of the City, who had expressly the charge and governance of these boyes. He did divide them in Companies, and afterwards gave the oversight of them to such a one of the boyes as was discreetest, the manliest, the most hardy, and of the best courage amongst them. They called the children that were past infancy two yeares, Irene: and the greatest boyes Melirenes: as who would say, ready to go out of boyerie. This boy who was made Overseer of them, was commonly twenty yeares of age. He was their Captaine when they fought, and did command them as his servants when they were in the house: and willed them which were strongest and the most growne, to carry wood when they should prepare dinner or supper: and those which were least and weakest, to go gather herbes, which they must steale or lack them. So they went out to steale, some in Gardens, some at the Markets, other in the Halls where the Feasts were kept, and men did cate together, into the which they conveyed themselves as closely and cunningly as they could devise: for if they were taken with the manner, they were scourged terribly, because they were so grosse and negligent, and not fine and cunning in their faculty. They stole also all other kinde of meate, whatsoever they could get or lay hands on. They tried and sought all occasions how to take and steale meate handsomely, both when men were asleepe, or else that they were carelesse, or did not give good heed unto them. But he that was taken with the manner, had his payment roundly, and was punished with fasting besides: for they had but a slender pittance, because necessity should drive them to venter boldly, and wit should finde out all devices to steale finely. This was the chiefest cause, why they gave them so small a diet. The second cause was, that their bodies might grow up higher in height. For the vitall spirits not being occupied to concoct and digest much meate, nor yet kept downe, or spreade abroad by the quantity or over-burden thereof, do enlarge themselves into length, and shoote up for their lightnesse: and for this reason they thought the body did grow in height and length, having nothing to lett or hinder the rising of the same. It seemeth that the selfe-same cause made them fairer also. For the bodies that are leane and slender, do better and more easily yeeld to Nature, which bringeth a better proportion and forme to every member: and contrariwise, it seemeth these grosse, corpulent, and over-fed bodies do encounter Nature, and be not so nimble and pliant to her, by reason of their heavey substance. As we see it by experience, the children which women bring a little before their time, and be somewhat cast before they should have beene borne, be smaller and fairer also, and more pure commonly then other that go their time: because the matter whereof the body is formed, being more supple and pliant, is the easilier weilded by Nature, which giveth them their shape and forme. Touching the naturall Cause of this Effect, let us give place to other to dispute it that will, without our further deciding of the same. But to returne to the matter of the LACEDÆMONIANS children: They did robbe with so great care, and feare to be discovered, that they tell of one, which having stolen a little Fox, did hide him under his cloke, and suffered him with his teeth and claws to teare out all his belly, and never cried, for feare he should have beene betrayed, untill he fell downe dead in the place where he stood. This is not uncredible, by that we do see young boyes abide at this day: for we have seene divers, which have bidden whipping even to death, upon the Altar of Diana, furnamed Orbia: Now this under-Master, who had the charge of every Company of these boyes, used after supper (sitting yet at the Table) to bid one of them sing a Song: to another he put forth a question, who was to be well advised of his answer, as for example: Who is the honestest man in the City? or how thinkest thou by that such a one did? By this exercise they were enured from boyes state, to judge of things well or ill done, and to understand the life and Government of their Citizens. For which of them did not answer quickly and directly to these questions, Who is a good man: who is an honest Citizen: and who not: they thought it was a signe of a dull wit, and carelesse nature, not given to any vertue, for desire of honour and estimation. Furthermore this under-master was ever to waite for his answer, and to see it should be briefe and well knit up in words: otherwise his punishment that answered crossely, or to little purpose, was, that his Master bit him by the thumbe. This he did many times in the presence of the old men and Magistrates of the City, that they might see whether he punished them with reason or not, and according to their deserving. And though he did hurt him, they did not by and by reprove him, but when the children were gone away, then was he himselfe rebuked and punished, if he had corrected them too sore, or contrarily had favoured them too much. Moreover they did ascribe the good or ill opinion conceived of the children, unto every of their favourers and lovers, which did affect and entertaine them: in as much as they say, a young boy upon a time fighting with another, and a cry scaping out of his mouth, which his faint cowardly heart did yeeld, his favourer and lover was straight condemned by the Officers of the Cities to a fine. Albeit this love was a thing even incorporated into them, that the most honest and vertuouslest women loved the young Maides thus also: yet was there no jealousie nor suspition that grew hereof, but rather to the contrary, there grew a marvellous mutuall love and kindeesse betweene them, which lived in one selfe place. For either of them by all the means they could, did devise how to make the childre they loyed in common, the wisest, the gentlest, and the best conditioned above all other. They taught these children to speake in such fort, that their speech had ever in it a pleasant grace, and in few words comprehended much matter. For Lycurgus ordained, a great masse and weight of iron money, should be but little worth, and of a small value, as we have told you before; and contrarily: that speech in few words, without any affectation, should hold much deepe and grave matter, wherewith the children being acquainted, after long silence, should be briefe and pithy in their answers. For as the feede of incontinent men, which are too busie with every rage and colman hedge, can take no roote to bring forth fruite: even so immoderate speech, full of words and busie tattle, bringeth forth as little sence. Hereof it cometh, that the answers of the LACONIANS were so short and witty. As they say, King Agis answered on a day an ATHENIAN, who jesting at the Swords the LACEDÆMONIANS did weare, said they were so short, that these Tumblers and Juglers did swallow them downe in the sight of all the World: And yet, said Agis, we hurt our Enemies with them for all that. For mine owne opinion, I like well of the LACONIANS manner of speaking: which is not to speake much, but when they speake, to touch the matter effectually, and to make the hearers understand them. I thinke also that Lycurgus selfe, was short and quick in his talke. For so a man may conjecture by his answers which are written: as that which he made to one who earnestly prayed him to stablish a popular state in LACEDÆMON, that the best might have as great Authority as the highest. Begin (quoth he) to do it first in thine owne house. And as that also which he answered another who asked him, why he had appointed so small things, and so little of value to be offered to the gods? Because (quoth he) we should never cease to honour them. And as that which he spake another time, touching fights and frayes, which was: that he did never forbid his Citizens any of them, but those wherewith they use to give their hand, as you would say, to yeeld. Men finde also such like answers, in some of his Letters written to his Citizens, as when they asked him: How can we defend our selves against our Enemies? He answered: If ye be poore, and one do covet no more than another. And in another Letter that was sent, where he discourseth, whether it were requisite to inclose the City with Walls: he saith, Can that City be without Walls, which is environed with men, though it be uncompassed with stone? Neverthelesse it is hard to resolve, whether those Letters, and other such like that are shewed, be to be believed, or discredited to be his. But that long speech was much disliked, and reprovved among the LACEDÆMONIANS, it is manifestly to be seene by the words, which some amongst them have heretofore answered. As King Leonidas said one day, to one that discourseth with him many good things, but out of season: Friend, thou speakest many good words, but to little purpose. And Charilampus, Nephew to Lycurgus, being asked why his Uncle made so few Lawes: Because, said he, to men of few words, few Lawes will serve. And Archidamidas said thus to some which reproved Hecatemus the Orator, for that being bidden to supper at one of their Feasts, he spake not a word all supper time: He who can speak well, knoweth also when to speake. And where I have told before, that in their feate and quick answers commonly there was some pretty grace, it may be well seene and knowne by these that follow. Demaratus answered a busie fellow who troubled him too much with vaine importunate questions, asking him still : who was the honestest man of LACEDÆMON? Even he that is least like thy selfe. And Agis said to some which highly praised the ELIANS for their upright judgement, and just dealing in the games Olympickall. What wonder make ye of it (quoth he) if in five yeares space the ELIANS one day do good justice? And Theopompus likewise to a stranger, who as desirous to fiew his affection on he bare the LACEDÆMONIANS, told him how every body called him Philolacon (as to say) a lover of LACEDÆMON. It were more honesty for thee (said he) to be named Philopolites, a lover of her Citizens. And Plistonax the sonne of Pausanias, when an Oratour of ATHENS said the LACEDÆMONIANS were unlearned and ignorant : Thou sayest true, quoth he, for we onely of all the GRECIANS have learned none of your ill conditions. And Archidamidas, to one that demanded of him, what number of fighting men there might be of the SPARTANS : Enough said he, to drive away the wicked. We may conjecture also their manner of speaking, by their words in mirth, which they spake sometimes playing wif: for they did never use to speake vaine words at random, but it had alwayes some secret meaning in it, which required anothers good observation that would finde it. As he which was desired to go heare the Nightingale counterfeited naturally : I have (said he) heard the Nightingale it selfe. And another which having read this Inscription upon a Tombe :

*When as they had well quenched tyrannie Throughout their land, by worthy Warlike-power ;
Their hap was yet in wretched wife to die,
By scaling Selynnates strongest tower.*

They well deserved death, said he, that did but quench tyrannie : they should have quite consumed it with fire. And one younger boy to another, promising to give him such lardy Cocks of the game, as should die in the place where they fought. O give me not those (said he) which will dye, but those which with fighting will kill others. Another seeing men sitting in Couches and Litters as they went : God forbid (said he) that I should ever sit in a chaire, where I could not rise to my elders. Such were their answers and encounters. So that some had reason which said heretofore, to speake LACONIAN-like, was to be Philosopher-like : as you would say, more to exercise the minde, then the body. Besides all this, they did study to sing well, and to make goodly Dities and Songs. Then they spake most properly and featly. There was in their Songs also a certaine motion, I wote not what, which stirred up the hearers hearts, and did kindle desire in them to do notable feates. Their Tongue was plaine, without affectation : their matter grave and morall, containing for the most part the praise of those which were flaine in battell for the defence of their Country, as being happy men : and a shame to those that live, which for faint hearts refused to die, to leade a miserable and unfortunate life. Or else they sang how they were the pattersnes for time to come, or the right glory of the World, and the true representation of vertuous men ; as the Song would best become their ages which did sing. It shall not be impertinent for the better understanding hereof, to bring you here an example. For in their open Feasts, there were alwayes three dances, according to the difference of the three ages. The dance of the old men, thus began first for to sing :

Till crooked age did hold us back, and bade us do no more.*

The young men followed after, singing :

We yet are young, bold, strong, and ready to maintaine, That quarrell still, against all men that do on Earth remaine.

The third was of children, that came after and said :

*And we do hope as well, to passe you all at last,
And that the World shall witnesse be, ere many yeares be past.*

To conclude, who nearly will consider the works and makings of the LACON Poets (whereof some are yet extant) and will marke also the Notes and Tunes of the Pipe, after the sound and measure whereof they marched in arrays going to charge the Enemy : he shall finde that Terpander and Pindarus, had reason to joyne hardinesse with Musick. For Terpander speaking of the LACEDÆMONIANS, saith in a place :

*This is that Land where deeds of chivalry, Did flourish most, in many a Martiall feate :
Where Musick made her choyce of harmony,

And Pindarus speaking of them, also saith :

*There : grave advice, is found in aged braines :
There : gallant youths are lusty lads indeed,
Which can both sing, and daunce, in courtly traines :
Yet daunt their foes with many a doughty deed.*

By which testimonies it appeareth, the one and the other made, and described them to have loved Musick, and the Warres together. For as another LACON Poet saith :

*It fitteth well, and is a seemly thing,
For such as spend their time in feates of warre :
To have the skill, sweet Sonnets for to sing,

For this cause therefore in all their Warres, when they should give battell, the King did first sacrifice to

to the Muses, to put the Souldiers in minde (as it should seeme) of the Discipline and wisdom of the Muses that they had beene brought up in, to the end that when his Souldiers were in the most extreme danger, the Muses should present themselves before the Souldiers eyes, to prick them forwards to do some noble acts of worthy memory. In their time of Warre, they did tolerate their young men a little of their hard and old accustomed life, and suffered them then to trim their haire, to have brave Armour, to weare gay Apparell, and tooke as great delight therein, to see them gallant and lustie, as to behold young neighing and inorting horses ; desirous for to fight. And although from the beginning of their youth, they did use to weare long haire : yet were they never so carefull to combe and brush their heads, as when they should to the battell. For then they did noint themselves with sweete Oyles, and did shed their haire, remembring Lycurgus saying, who was wont to tell them ; that haire to them which were faire, did make them more faire, and to them that were foule, they made them more ugly and dreadful. The exercises also of their bodies, were more easie and gentle, and not so hard and freight in their Warres, as they were in peace : and generally, their whole manner of life was not then so straightly viewed, nor yet controlled. So as they onely were the men of the World, to whom Wars were made a rest from labour, which men ordinarily do endure, to make them the fitter for the Wars. Afterwards when their Army was set in battell ray, even in the face of the Enemies, the King did straight sacrifice a Goate unto the gods, and forthwith commanded all his Souldiers to put their Garlands of Flowers on their heads, and willed that the Pipes should sound the Song of Castor, at the noise and tune whereof, he himselfe began first to march forward. So that it was a marvellous pleasure, and likewise a dreadfull sight, to see the whole Battell march together in order, at the sound of the Pipes, and never to breake their pace, nor confound their rankes, nor to be dismayed nor amazed themselves, but to go on quietly and joyfully at the sound of their Pipes, to hazard themselves even to death. For it is likely, that such courages are not troubled with much feare, nor yet overcome with much fury : but rather they have an assured constancy and valiantnesse in good hope, as those which are backed with the assisting favour of the gods. The King marching in this order, had alwayes some about him, which had before time wonne the prizes in games and justes. And they say there was one of these on a time, that was offered a great summe of money at the games Olympickall, not to present himselfe at them : but he refused it, liking better with great paine to winne the prize, then for much money to lose his honour. Whereupon the one said unto him, LACONIAN : and what hast thou gotten now, to carry away the prize with so much sweat ? The LACONIAN answered him laughing : I shall fight in the battell, saith he, before the King. When they had once broken into their Enemies, they did still fiercely and fiercelier set upon them, and did never cease, untill their Enemies gave way and fled : and then they chased and followed them still, untill such time as their overthrow and flight had assured them of the victory. Then they quickly and quietly returned to their Campe, judging it to be no manhood, neither part of a noble minde, or of so worthy a Nation as the GRECIANS were, to kill and hew in pieces, men so scattered and out of order, having forsaken all the hope of victory. This fell out not onely honourable, but also very profitable for them. For they which were in battell against them, knowing they killed none but such as resisted stoutly, and how they did let other go which fled before them : they found it was more their benefit to flye, then to tarry and abide the strokes. Hippias the Sophister saith, that Lycurgus himselfe was a very good Captaine, and a great Souldier, as he that had beene in many foughten Fields : and Philostephanus ascribeth to him the device to put Horse-men in Troopes and Companies, which they called Oulames, whereof fifty men at Armes was a Troope, whose manner was to put themselves in squadrons. But Demetrius the Phalerian writeth otherwise, that Lycurgus was ever at the Warres, and that he made all his Lawes and Government in a full peace. But in my opinion, the intermission of Warres during the playes Olympickall, which they say he devised, doth shew in appearance that he was a gentle-natured man, and one that loved quietnesse and peace. Some notwithstanding (amongst whom Hermippus was one) say, he was not with Iphitus at the first beginning, when he ordained the Playes Olympickall, but that by chance he happened to come thither, passing by in his journey onely, and that he stayed there to see the Games : where he thought he heard the voyce of a man behinde him, saying, He marvelled much why he did not perfwade his Citizens also to be partners of this new device : and turning back to see who it was that spake to him, he saw no body. Whereupon he tooke a conceite that it was a speech from the gods : and went therefore presently to seeke out Iphitus, with whom he made all the Statutes and Orders of the Feast, which afterwards were farre more famous, better ordered, and more stately then before. But to returne againe to the LACEDÆMONIANS : their discipline and order of life continued still, after they were full grown men. For it was not lawfull for any man to live as he listed, but they were within their City, as if they had beene a Campe, where every man knoweth what allowance he hath to live withall, and what businesse he hath else to do in his Calling. To be short, they were all of this minde, that they were not borne to serve themselves, but to serve their Country. Therefore if they were commanded nothing else, they went continually to see what the children did, and to teach them somewhat which might profit the Common-weale, or else they went to learne of those which were their elders. For one of the best and happiest things which Lycurgus ever brought into his City, was the great rest and leisure which he made his Citizens to have, onely forbidding them that they should not professe any vile or base occupation : and they needed not also to be carefull to get great riches, in a place where Goods were nothing profitable nor esteemed. For the LOTES, which were made bond-men by the Wars, did till their Grounds, and yielded them a certaine Revenue every yeare. And as touching this matter, matter, they tell of a LACEDÆMONIAN, who being on a day at ATHENS where the Law was pleaded, did understand that a Citizen there was condemned for idleness, and how he went home to his house very sorrowfull, accompanied with his friends which were fory for him, and greatly lamented his ill hap: the LACEDÆMONIAN then prayed those which were about him, to shew him the man condemned for living nobly, and like a gentleman. I have alledged this, to shew how he thought it a vile and fervile thing to exercise any handy-craft, or to worke any thing by hand to get Money. For Suites in Law, a man may be well assured they were banished with the gold and silver from LACEDÆMON, considering now there was no more avarice nor covetousnesse there, nor yet poverty nor lack, but equality with abundance, and quiet life with sobriety. All other times but when they had Warres, they followed dancing, Feasts, Playes, banquets, hunting, or other exercises of body, and meetings to passe the time away. For the young men untill they came to thirty yeares of age, never went into the Market to buy any Provision or things for the house, but did their Fathers or their friends businesse: nay it was a shame for the oldest men, to haunt the Market too often. As to the contrary, it was honourable for them to be present at the Shew-place the most part of the day, where they diversely exercised their bodies, and likewise to be at the places of Assembly, there to spend time with walking together, and discourfing honestly one with another, without talking of any matter of gaine, traffick, or money. For all their talke (for the most part) was about the praising of some honest thing, or sporting-wise to reprove some dishonesty, which alwayes carried with it some gentle lesson or motion by the way. For Lycurgus was not such a foure man, as they never saw him laugh: but as Sofbins writeth, it was he that first sacrificed to the little god of laughter, which is at LACEDÆMON, because he would mingle their Feasts and Assemblies with mirth, as a pleasant sawe to ease the trouble of their strict and hard life. To be briefe, he did accustom his Citizens so, that they neither would nor could live alone, but were in manner as men incorporated one with another, and were alwayes in company together, as the Bees be about their Master-bee: still in a continuall love to serve their Countrey, to winne honour, and to advance the Common-weale. Which affection of theirs is plaine and easily seene to be imprinted in them by certaine of their Answers, as in that which Padaretus said on a time, being left out of the election of the number of the three hundred; Who departing home to his house merry and jocond as might be, said: It did him good to see there were three hundred found better in the City than himselfe. Pisistratides also being sent Ambassador with certaine other to the Lieutenants of the King of PERSIA, the PERSIAN Lords asked him, if they came of their owne desire, or whether they were sent from the whole State: If we obtaine, said he, it is from the State: if we be denied, then we come of our selves. And Argilemida the mother of Brasidas, asked some that went to visit her after they were returned home to LACEDÆMON from their journey to AMPHIPOLIS, if her sonne died like a man, and a worthy SPARTAN: and they straight commended him highly, saying: There was not left in all LACEDÆMON such a valiant man. She replied unto them, Say not so, my friends, I pray you: for Brasidas was indeede a valiant man, but the Countrey of LACONIA hath many more yet valiantier than he was. Now touching their Senate, Lycurgus was the first that erected it among them. The first that were thereof, were Lycurgus chiefe aiders and asslifers of that erection, as we have declared before: but afterwards he ordained, that when any of those first should happen to dye, they should chuse in his place the most honest reported man in the City, so he were threescore yeares old and above. This was the noblest glory that could be among men, when a man bare the bell and praise, not that he was swiftest among the swift, nor strongest amongst the strong, but that he among the honest was honestest. He had the reward of his vertue, as for liberty to speak, soveraigne authority to governe, and Princely power over the Common-weale, the honour, the life, and the goods of the whole Citizens: howbeit the election was made after this sort. The people first assembled in the Market-place, where there were some appointed and shut up thereabout in a house, from whence they could neither see, nor be seene of those that were assembled, but only they might heare the noise which they made there. For the people by their cry and shout, did declare whom they did chuse, and whom they did refuse of the Competitors, as they used to shew their liking by the like cry in other things. The Competitors were not brought in, and presented all together, but one after another in order, as by lot did fall out. He on whom the lot fell, passed through the midst of the Assembly of the people, and said never a word. The people straight that liked made a cry or shout aloud. The men appointed which were locked up, had Bookes or Tables in which they wrote and noted the greatnesse of the cry and shout the People made, as every Competitor passed by, not knowing nor seeing who he was. These hidden men did only set downe in their bookes, the first, the second, the third, and so many more, as by shoutes and cries they perceived did passe thus through the Assembly. They noted also in their said bookes, which of those had the greatest cry and shout of people at their passing through: and him they came and declared to be Senator chosen. Then he wearing a Garland of Flowers on his head, went to all the Temples of the gods in the City to give thanks, having a great traine of young men following, and praising of his vertues. There went also with him a marvellous company of women singing Songs of his praise, and how blessed he was that he had lived so vertuously. Then every one of his kinne prepared a Banquet for him at home at their houses, and as he entred the house, they said unto him, The City honoureth thee with this Banquet. That done, he repaired afterwards to the ordinary place of their eating, where he did in all things as he was accustomed, saving he was served now at his Table with a double allowance, whereof he reserved the one. After supper, all his kinswomen stood in the entry of

of the Hall where they had eaten: so he called her whom he loved best, and gave her his allowance he had saved, and said to her, This was given me in token I was this day rewarded for my vertue: and even so I give it thee for a like token of reward for thy vertue. Then was she brought home by all the Women there to her house, even in like sort as he was by the Men. Touching Burials, Lycurgus made a wife Order: For first of all, to cut off all superstition of burying places, he commanded they should bury the dead within the City, and that their graves should be round about their Temples, that young persons might have them alwayes in their eyes, and not be afraid to see a dead body, as it to touch a coarfe, or to passe by their graves, it should defile a man. Then did he forbid them to bury any thing with the coarfe, and willed they should only lap it up in a red cloth, with Olive leaves. It was not lawfull to grave the Name of any dead body upon his grave, but only of such a man as died in the warres, or of some holy woman professed into their Temples. Furthermore, the time appointed to mourne in, was very short: for it lasted not but eleven dayes; and on the twelfth day, they doe sacrifice to Proserpina, and so leave off their mourning. To conclude, he left nothing idle, or unworking in his Citizens: for to all necessary things which men cannot lack, Lycurgus joyned ever a certaine emulation of men; as to desire vertue, and to contemne vice: and furnished his City with many good precepts and examples, among which his Citizens being still borne and bred up, and having the same in every place before their eyes where they went, they came to passe in time to be framed after the very pattern and mould of vertue it selfe. For this cause did he not suffer any to trauell out of their Countrey, or to go abroad as he would: without speciall licence, for fear lest those which travelled abroad for their pleasure, should bring home strange fashions and manners, and a corrupt disordered life, which by little and little might get way, and bring an alteration and change of the whole state. Furthermore, he kept out of SPARTA all strangers, except those which had necessary businesse there, or were come thither for some profit to the countrey: not that he was afraid they should learne something whereby to love vertue, or that they should desire to follow his fashion and manner of government, as Thucydides was; but rather fearing they should teach his Citizens some naughty manners, or some ill favoured vice. For it must needs be, that strangers bring ever strange and new devices with them; which new devices bring with them also new opinions; and new opinions beget new affections and mindes, that many times are repugnant to the Law, and to the forme of the Commonweale established before, as discords doe many times in an harmony of musick, that before agreed very well together. Therefore he judged it a thing most necessary, to keepe his City free and safe from counterfeiting of any strangers manners or fashions, that were commonly as persons infected with some contagious sicknesse. Now in all we have spoken before, even to this place, there is no manner of token or shew of injustice, or lack of equity, wherewith some seeme to burden Lycurgus in his Lawes: by saying they were well made, to make men warlike and valiant, but not to be just and righteous. But concerning the Law they call Cryptia, as much to say, as their secret: if it were of Lycurgus institution, as Aristotle saith, it might have carried Plato into the like opinion that Lycurgus had of his Commonweale. This was the Law: The Governours which had the charge and oversight of the young men, at certaine appointed times, did chuse out those they thought to have the best discretion, and sent them abroad into the Countrey, some one way, some another way, who carried with them daggers, and some provision to feed them. These young Men being thus dispersed abroad in the Countrey, did hide themselves all the day close in secret places, and there they lay and tooke their rest: afterwards when night was come, they went to seek out the high wayes, and killed the first of the ILOTS that they met. Sometimes even in the broad day, they went into the Countrey to kill the strongest and stoutest of them: as Thucydides telleth in his history of the warres of PELOPONNESUS, where he saith: That a certaine convenient number of the ILOTS were crowned by a publike Proclamation of the SPARTANS: and being enfranchised for their good services they had done the Commonweale, they were carried to all the Temples of the gods for an honour. Within a while after, no man knew what was become of them, being about two thousand in number: so that never man heard tell neither then nor since, how they came to their Deaths. Howbeit Aristotle above all others saith, that the Ephores, so soone as they were placed in their Offices, made warre with the ILOTS, because they might lawfully kill them. And it is true, that in other things they did handle them very hardly. For they forced them sometimes to drinke wine without water out of measure till they had made them stark drunk. Then they brought them all into their Common-Halls where they did eat, to make their Children to behold them, and to see what beaustinesse it was for a man to be drunk. Likewise they made them sing songs, and dance dances, unfit for honest Men, and such as were full of derision and mockery; and did forbid them expressely to sing any honest songs. So it is reported, that in the journey the THEBANS made to LACONIA, many of the ILOTS were taken prisoners thereat, and when they were commanded to sing the Verses of Terpandor, or of Alcmon, or of Spondon the Laconian, they would not doe it: saying, they durst not sing them for their Masters. Wherefore he that first said in the Countrey of LACEDÆMONIA, He that is free is more free, and he that is bond, is more bond then in other places; knew very well the diversity between the liberty and bondage there, and the liberty and bondage of other Countries. But in my opinion, the LACEDÆMONIANS began to use these great outrages and cruelties, long time after the death of Lycurgus, and specially since the great earthquake that happened at SPARTA, at which time the ILOTS rose against them with the MESSENIANS, and did great mischief throw the Countrey, and put the City to the greatest distresse and danger that ever it had. cannot be perswaded, that ever Lycurgus invented or instituted, so wicked and mischievous an act, as that kinde of Ordinance was: because I imagine his nature was gentle and mercifull, by the clemency and justice we see he used in all his other doings, and was witness besides by open Oracle from the gods, for a just and wife man. Furthermore, they say of him, that when he saw the chiefeft points of his Government had taken deepe roote, and that the forme of his Commonweale went on, and was strong enough to maintaine and keepe it selfe on foote, like as Plato saith, that God rejoyced greatly after he had made the world, and saw the same turne and move, his first moving: even so Lycurgus taking singular pleasure and delight in his minde, to see his notable Lawes put in ure, and so well established and liked of by experience, fought yet to make them immortall, as neere as he could possible, by any forecast of man, that no alter-time whatsoever, might change or put them downe. To bring this to passe, he caused all the people to assemble, and told them he thought his civil policie and state of Commonweale was already sufficiently established, for vertuous and happy life: yet there was one matter behinde of greater importance then all the rest, which he could not yet declare unto them, untill he had first asked counsell of the Oracle of Apollo. And therefore in the meane time they should keepe and observe his Lawes and Ordinances inviolably, without changing, removing or staying any matter therein, untill he were returned from the City of DELPHES, and then they should doe that other thing behinde, if the god then so counselled him. They all promised him to doe it, and prayed him to make haste to goe on his journey. But before he departed, he made the Kings and Senators swear first, and consequently all the people after, that they would keepe his Lawes and Ordinances without changing or altering any thing, untill he did returne againe. This done, he went to the City of DELPHES, where so soone as he arrived, he sacrificed in the Temple of Apollo, and asked him; If the Lawes he had made were good to make a man live an happy life. Apollo made him answer, his Lawes were very good, and that his City keeping them, should be the most renowned of the world. Lycurgus caused this Oracle to be written, which he sent to SPARTA. After he sacrificed to Apollo againe: and then taking leave of his friends, and of his Sonne, he determined to die, because his Citizens should never be releafed of the Oath they had made betweene his hands. When he had this determination, he was come to the age, wherein a man hath strength enough to live longer; and yet was old enough also to die if he would. Wherefore finding himselfe happy to have obtained his desire, he willingly pined himselfe to death, by abstinence and lacke of meate. For he thought it meete, that the very death of great personages should bring benefit ever to the Commonweale, and that the end of their life should be no more idle or unprofitable, then the rest of their life before: nay rather, that it was one of their most meritorious acts, to have their death extolled for worthinesse. So he imagined, that his death would be the perfection and Crown of his felicity, after he had made and ordained so many good and notable Lawes, for the honour and benefit of his Countrey; and should be as a seale of confirmation of his Lawe, and the continuall preservative of his City, considering all his Citizens had sworne to keepe them all inviolably, untill he were returned. He was not deceived of his hope, for his City was the chiefeft of the world, in glory and honour of government by the space of five hundred yeares. For so long his City kept his Lawes without any change or alteration by any of the Kings successors, untill King Agis the Sonne of Archidamus began to raigne. For the creation of the Ephores, did not breake nor discontinue any of the Lawes of Lycurgus, but reduced them rather to a more straight and strict order: although it seemed at the first that the Ephores were ordained for the maintenance and defence of the liberty of the people, whereas indeed they did also strengthen the authority of the Kings and Senate. Now in the raigne of King Agis, Gold and Silver began first to creepe in againe to the City of SPARTA, by meanes of Lyfander. With Money there came in straight covetousnesse, and greedinesse to get and gather. And although Lyfander was not desirous to get it, nor would be corrupted for any money: yet he brought riches and covetousnesse into the Countrey, and filled the same with all finenesse, by bringing in great store of Gold and Silver from the warres, directly against the Lawes and Ordinances of Lycurgus. The which so long as they were in force and use, it appeared that the government of SPARTA seemed not to be a policie or Commonweale, but rather a certaine holy place and order of Religion. And even as the Poets feigne, that Heracles went through the world with his Club and Lyons skinne, punishing cruell robbers and unnaturall Tyrants; so in like case, with a little scrole of Parchment and a poore Cape, did the SPARTANS command and give Lawes to all the rest of GREECE, even with their good liking and consent. And they chased the Tyrants away, which usurped tyrannicall power over any of their Cities, and did decide all controversies, and oftentimes pacified their seditions, without sending out one Souldier, but only a simple poore Amittadour. At whose commandement, the people presently assembled like the Bees, which gather together about their King, so soone as they spie him: they did then so greatly reverence the good government and justice of the SPARTANS. Therefore I can but wonder much at those which say, the City of LACEDÆMON could obey well, but not command: and for prooffe they alledge words of King Theopompus, who answered one which said, that SPARTA was maintained, because the Kings could command well. Nay the rather (said he) because the Citizens can obey well. For men commonly disdain to obey those which are not wife in command: So that the faithfull obedience of the subjects, dependeth much upon the sufficient commandement of the wise Prince: For he that directeth well, must needs be well obeyed. For like as the art of a good rider, is to make his Horse gentle, and ready at commandement: even so the chiefeft point belonging to a Prince, is to teach his subjects to obey. Wherefore the LACEDÆMONIANS procured, procured, that not onely other people did willingly obey them, but also desired to be ruled and commanded by them. For they asked them, neither Ships nor Money, nor yet did send them any number of men of Warre to compell them, but only they sent one Citizen of SPARTA to governe them, to whom all the other people submitted themselves, and were holpen by him in their necessity, as fearing and reverencing him. In this wise the SICILIANS were holpen by Gylippus, the CHALCIDONIANS by Brasidas, and all the GRECIANS inhabiting ASIA, by Lyfander, Callicratidus, and by Agessians, who were called the reformers and directors of Princes, Peoples and Kings, unto whom they were sent here and there: but ever they had their eye upon the City of SPARTA, as upon the most perfect patterne to order mans life by, and to governe a Commonweale after. To this effect tended the merry word spoken in jest by Stratonicus: who said he did order the ATHENIANS to tend their Sacrifices, and the ELIANS to tend their Games: and if they made any fault therein, the LACEDÆMONIANS should be well whipped. That was merrily spoken, and in a jesting manner. But Antisthenes (the Philosopher and one of Socrates Scholars) seeing the THEBANS growne very haughty and glorious, after that they had conquered the LACEDÆMONIANS in the journey of LEUCTRES: Me thinketh, said he, these THEBANS here do like the Schoole-boys, which brag and rejoyce, when they have a little beaten their Master. But this was not Lycurgus meaning, to have his City to command many. But he thought the felicity of a City, as of a private man, consisted chiefly in the exercise of vertue, and in the unity of the Inhabitants thereof. He framed his Common-wealth to this end, that his Citizens should be nobly minded, content with their owne, and temperate in their doings, that thereby they might maintaine and keepe themselves long in safety. The self-same intention had Plato, Diogenes, and Zenon, in setting forth their Bookes, which they wrote of the Government of Common-wealths: and so had likewise many other great and learned men which have written of the same matter. Howbeit they onely left behinde them words, and written Bookes: but Lycurgus contrariwise, left no written Bookes nor Pamphlets, but established and left behinde him a royall forme of Government, which no man ever before had invented, nor never after could be followed. He hath made them plainly see a whole City live together, and governe it self philosophically, according to the true rules and precepts of perfect wisdom: which imagined that true wisdom was a thing hanging in the aire, and could not visibly be seene in the World. Whereby he hath worthily excelled in glory all those, which ever tooke upon them to write or establish the Government of a Common-wealth. And therefore saith Aristotle, that after his death they did him lesse honour in LACEDÆMONIA, then he had deserved: albeit they did him all the honour they possibly could devise. And yet they built a Temple for him, and made solemne Sacrifice to him every yeare, as unto a god. More, they say, that when the ashes of his body were brought to SPARTA, there fell straight lightning upon his Tombe where they were put, which they had not often seene to happen to other men of name after their decease, saving onely to the Poet Enripides, who dying in MACEDONIA, was buried neare the City of ARETHUSA. The which is some manifest argument, for such as love the Poet, to lay against them that somewhat deprave him, seeing this signe came to him after his death, which had happened before to a most well-beloved man of the gods. Some say, Lycurgus died in the City of CIRREHA. But Apollonhemis saith, he died in ELIDA. Timæus and Aristoxenus write, he ended his dayes in CRETA. And Aristoxenus saith further, that those of the Isle of CRETA do shew his grave in the place which they call PERGAMIA, by the broad high-ways side. He left one onely begotten sonne named Antiorus, who died without issue, so that his House and name failed with him. But his neare kinsmen and familiar friends, did set up a Company or Brotherhood in memory of him, which continued a long time: and the dayes wherein they assembled, were called the Lycurgides. There is another Aristocrates (the sonne of Hipparchus) who saith, that he being dead in CRETA, his friends burned his body, and afterwards threw his ashes into the Sea, according as he had prayed and requested them. For he feared, that if any part of him should at any time have beene brought to SPARTA, the Inhabitants would have said he was returned againe, and thereby would have thought themselves discharged of their oath, and might have lawfully altered the Lawes which he had appointed. And this is the discourse and end of Lycurgus life.

THE Historiographers differ marvellously of the time in which Numa Pompilius reigned King, albeit some will derive from him many noble houses descended in ROME. For one Clodius who wrote the Book intitled, The Table of Time, affirmeth, that the ancient Registers of the City of ROME were lost when it was taken and sacked by the GAULES: and that those which are extant at this day be not true, but were only made by men desirous to gratifie some, which have thrust in ancient Houses and families of the first ROMANES, that concern nothing them whom they meant to represent. On the other side, although the common Opinion be, that Numa was a familiar Friend and Scholar of Pythagoras the Philosopher, yet some say he was never learned, nor had any knowledge at all in the Greek Tongue. And yet maintaining that it is possible enough, that he was so well born, and had such perfection in all kinde of vertue, that he never needed any Master; and though he had needed, they had rather attribute the honour of the instructing of this King unto some other foreign person that was more excellent then Pythagoras. Others say, that Pythagoras the Philosopher was long time after the reign of Numa, and well nigh five ages after him. Howbeit others say, there was another Pythagoras born in SPARTA (who having won the prize in running at the games Olympickall, in the sixteenth Olympiad, and the third year of Numa's Reign) did come into ITALY, where he kept much about Numa, and did assist and help him in the governing and ordering of his Realm. By means whereof, there be many customes yet of the LACONIANS mingled with the ROMANS, which this second Pythagoras was said to have taught him. Nevertheless it is not confessed that Numa was born of the SABYNES, which they say are descended from the LACEDÆMONIANS. So it falleth out hard to agree certainly of the time when Numa was, and chiefly for such as will follow the roll or table of those which from Olympiades to Olympiades have won the prizes of games Olympickall: considering the roll or table that they have at this present, was very lately published by one Hippias an Eliau, who delivereth no reason or argument of necessity why it should be taken for an undoubted troth, which he in that sort hath gathered. Yet we will not leave to put in writing those things worthy of memory which we could gather by any means of King Numa, beginning at that place which we thought to be meetest. It was now since ROME was built seven and thirty years (for so long time reigned Romulus) when Romulus the fifth of the moneth of July (which they call the Nones of the goates) made a solemne sacrifice without the City, neare to a certain place commonly called the goate marsh. As all the whole Senate, with the most part of the people were present at this sacrifice, suddenly there arose in the ayr a very great tempest, and a marvellous dark thick cloud, which fell on the earth with such boisterous windes, storms, lightnings and thunder, that the poore common people being afraid of so fore a tempest, disperfed themselves suddenly, running ning here and there for succour, and therewithall King Romulus vanished away in such sort, that he was never after seen alive nor dead. This brought the Senators and Noblemen whom they called Patricians, into great suspicion. And there ran a foul tale among the common people, how they had long time born very impatiently to be subjects to a King, because themselves would have had and taken upon them some Sovereign authority, and that for this cause they had killed King Romulus. Adding somewhat more unto it, how a little before he had used them more roughly, and commanded them more straightly then he was wont or accustomed. Nevertheless they found the means to quench all those brutes and wurrings: by doing divine honour and sacrifice unto him, as one not dead, but passed to a better life. To confirm this, one of the noblest men among them called Proculus came in, and by Oath affirmed before all the people that he saw Romulus ascending up into Heaven, armed at all peeces, and that he heard a voice say, From thenceforth call him Quirinus. This being thus appeased there sprang up another trouble, to know whom they should choose in his place. For the strangers which were come then from other places to dwell in ROME, were not yet thoroughly joyned to the naturall born ROMANES; Inasmuch as the common people did not onely waver and stagger up and down in opinion, but the Senators also (that were many, and of diverse Nations) did enter into a suspicion one of another. These things notwithstanding they all agreed in this, that of necessity they must choose a King; Howbeit in the rest they differed much, not onely whom they should choose, but also of what Nation he should be. For those which were the first Founders and Builders of the City of ROME with Romulus, could in no wise abide nor suffer that the SABYNES (to whom they had divided part of their Lands, and a moiety of their City) should attempt and presume to command them whom they did receive and associate into their company and fellowship. The SABYNES alledged on the other side for them, a good reason, and such as carried great probability. Which was that never since the death of their King Tatius, they neither had in any thing disobeyed nor disquieted King Romulus, but had suffered him to reigne peaceably; and therefore Romulus being now deceased, reason would that the New King should be chosen of their Nation. And that albeit the ROMANES had received them into their City, they could not say therefore that in time of this association, they were lesse to be reckoned of in any thing then themselves. Further they added, that in joyning with them the ROMANES had doubly encreased their might and power, and had made a body of a people which deserved the honour and Title of a City. These were the causes of their contention. But to prevent that of this contention there might grow no confusion in the City if it should remain without any head to command: The Senators which were a hundred and fifty in number, gave counsel that every one of them by turnes, one after another, should carry the royall state of the King, and all the shewes and ornaments of his Majesty, and should doe the ordinary sacrifices of the King, and dispatch all causes six howres in the day, and six howres in the night, as the King before had used. Thus they thought it best to divide the rule, that one might have as much power as the other, as well in respect of themselves as also for regard of the people. For they imagined that the changing and removing thus of this regall dignity, and passing it from man to man, would cleane take away envy among them, and make every of them to rule temperately, and uprightly see, that in one and the self same day and night every of them should be a King and private person also. The ROMANES call this manner of Regiment in vacation Interregnum, as you would say, rule for the time. Now albeit their government was very modest and civill, yet they could not for all that keep themselves from falling into the suspicion and slander of the People; who gave it out straight, that this was a fine device of theirs, to change by this means the rule of the Realm into a few Noblemens hands, to the end that the whole authority and government of all publike causes should remain still in themselves, because it grieved them to be subject to a King. And in the end the two parts of the City came to this agreement, that the one part should choose one of the body of the other to be the King. This course they liked very well, as well for the pacification of present strife and dissention amongst themselves, as for procuring equality of affection, and stirring up a likenesse of good-will in the King that thus indifferently should be chosen, whereby he should love the one part for that they had chosen him, and likewise the other part for that he was of their Nation. The SABYNES were the first which referred the Election to the ROMANES choice, and the ROMANES thought it better to choose one of the Nation of the SABYNES, then to have a ROMANE chosen by the SABYNES. After they had consulted they determined amongst themselves, and did choose Numa Pompilius one of the body of the SABYNES to be King, who was none of the number of them which came to dwell at ROME, howbeit he was a man so famous for his vertue, that the SABYNES so soon as they named him did receive him more willingly then they who had chosen him. After they had thus published their Election the first and chiefeest persons of the one and the other side were chosen out to goe unto him. Now Numa Pompilius was borne in one of the chiefeest and best Cities which the SABYNES had; called Cures, whereupon the ROMANES and their followers the SABYNES were called afterward Quirites, and he was the Son of Pomponius a Nobleman, the youngest of four Brethren: being by the secret working of the gods born on the very day on the which ROME was founded by Romulus; which was the one and twentieth day of April. This man being naturally given and inclined unto all vertue, did yet encrease the same by study, and all kinde of good discipline, and by the exercise thereof, and of true patience and right Philosophy, he did marvellously adorn himself and his manners. For he did not onely cleare his soule and minde of all passions and vices commonly used in the world; but he conquered in himselfe all heats, violence and covetousnesse. And would neither seek nor usurpe that which was another mans; a thing at that time honoured among the most barbarous people; but thought that to be the true and right victory in man, first to conquer and command himself by judgement and reason, and then to subdue all covetousnesse and greedinesse. Having therefore this Opinion he would in no wife have in his house any superfluity of finenesse. He became to every man that would employ him (as well stranger as his own Countryman) a wife Counsellor and an upright Judge. He bestowed his leisure not to follow his own delight, or to gather goods together, but to serve the gods, and to behold their celestiall nature and power, as much as mans reason and understanding could comprehend. Thereby he got so great a name and reputation, that Tatius (which was King of ROME with Romulus) having but one onely daughter called Tatia, made him his Sonne in Law. Howbeit this Marriage put him in no such jollity, that he would dwell at ROME with his Father in Law, but rather kept at home at his own house in the Countrey of the SABYNES, there to serve and cherish his old Father with his wife Tatia; who for her part also liked better to live quietly with her husband being a private man, then to go to ROME where the might have lived in much honour and glory, by means of the King her Father. She died as it is reported 13. years after she was married: After her death Numa leaving to dwell in the City, was better contented to live in the Countrey alone, and solitary, and gave himself to walk much in the fields and woods consecrated to the gods, as one desirous of alone life, far from the company of men. Whereupon was raised (in my opinion) that which is spoken of him, and of the goddesse Egeria: That it was not for any strangenesse or melancholinesse of nature, that Numa withdrew himself from the conversation and company of men, but because he had found another more honourable and holy society of the Nymphs, and goddesse Egeria, who had done him (as they say) that honour, as to make him her husband: with whom as his beloved darling it is said he enjoyed happy daies, and by daily frequenting of her company, he was inspired with the love and knowledge of all celestiall things. Surely these devices are much like unto certain old Fables of the Phrygians, which they having learned from the Father to the Son, do love to tell of one Agis, of the Bythynians, of one Herodotus; of the ARCADIANS, of one Endymion, and of many other such like men, who in their lives were taken for Saints and beloved of the gods. Notwithstanding it is likely that the gods love neither birds, nor horse, but men, and have sometimes a liking to be familiar with perfect good men, and do not disdain sometime the conversation of such as be holy, religious, and devout. But to beleve the gods have carnall knowledge, and do delight in the outward beauty of creatures, that seemeth to carry a very hard beleef. Yet the wife EGYPTIANS think it probable enough and likely that the Spirit of the gods hath given original of generation to women, and do beget fruit of their bodies; howbeit they hold that a man can have no corporall company with any divine nature. Wherein they do not consider, that every thing that joyneth together doth deliver againe a like substance to that wherewith it was joyned. This notwithstanding, it is meet we should beleve the gods bear good will to men, and that of it doth spring their love, whereby men say, the gods love those whose manners they purifie and inspire with vertue. And they do not offend which feign that Phorbis, Hycynthus and Admetus were sometimes the lovers of Apollo, and also Hypolitus the SICYONIAN: of whom they report, that ever when he passed over the arme of the Sea which lieth between the Cities of SICYONA and of CIRRA, the god which knew he came, rejoiced, and caused Pythia the Prophetesse to pronounce these Heroical Verbes:

I know full well my dear Hypolitus Returns by Sea, my minde divineth thus.

It is said also that Pan was in love with Pindarus and his Verses, and that the gods honoured the Poets Hesiodus and Archilocus, after their death, by the Muses. They say moreover that Aesculapius lay with Sophocles in his life time, and at this day they do yet shew many tokens thereof; and after his death another god (as it is reported) made him to be honourably buried. Now if they grant that such things may be true, how can we refuse to beleve, that some gods have been familiar with Zaleucus, Miros, Zoroastes, Lycurgus, Numa, and such other like personages, which have governed Kingdomes and established Common-weales? And it is not unlike that the gods indeed did company with them, to inspire and teach them many notable things, and that they did draw near unto those Poets and plaiers of the harp that made and applied many dolefull and joyfull Ditties, at the least for their sport and pleasure onely, if ever they came near them. Nevertheless if any man be of other opinion, the way is open and large, as Bacchylides said, to think and say as he list. For my self, I doe finde that which is written of Lycurgus, Numa, and other such persons, not to be without likelihood and probability; who, having to govern rude, churlish, and stiffe-necked people, and purposing to bring in strange novelties into the governments of their Countreys, did feign wisely to have conference with the gods, considering this feigning fell to be profitable and beneficiall to those themselves, whom they made to beleve the same. But to return to our History: Numa was forty years old when the Ambassadors of ROME were sent to present the Kingdom unto him, and to entreat him to accept thereof. Proclus and Vesulus were the Ambassadors that were sent. One of the which the people looked should have been chosen for King, because those of Romulus side did favour much Proclus, and those of Tatius part favoured Vesulus. Now they used no long speech unto him, because they thought he would have been glad of such a great good fortune. But contrarily it was indeed a very hard thing, and required great perswasions, and much entreaty, to move a man which had alwaies lived quietly and at ease, to accept the regiment of a City, which as a man would say had been raised up and grown by wars and martiall deeds. Wherefore he answered them in the presence of his Father, and another of his his kinsmen called Martius in this sort: Change and alteration of mans life is ever dangerous; but for him that lacketh nothing necessary, nor hath cause to complaine of his present state, it is a great folly to leave his old acquainted Trade of life, and to enter into another new and unknown, if there were no other but this onely respect, that he leaveth a certainty to venture upon uncertainty. However there is further matter in this, that the dangers and perils of this Kingdome which they offer me, are not altogether uncertaine, if we will looke back what happened unto Romulus, who was not unsuspected to have laid wait to have had Tatius his Fellow and Companion murdered. And now after Romulus Death, the Senators selves are mistrusted to have killed him on the other side by Treason; And yet they say it, and sing it every where, that Romulus was the Son of a god; that at his Birth he was miraculously preserved, and afterwards he was as incredibly brought up: Whereas for my own part, I doe confesse, I was begotten by a mortal man, and was fostered, brought up, and taught by men, as you know: And these few qualities which they praise and commend in me, are conditions farre unmeet for a man that is to reign. I ever loved a solitary life, quiet and study, and did exempt my selfe from worldly causes. All my life time I have fought and loved peace above all things, and never had to doe with any warres. My conversation hath been to company with men which meet onely to serve and honour the gods, or to laugh and be merry, one with another, or else to spend their time in their private affairs, or otherwise sometime to attend their pastures and feeding of their cattell. Whereas Romulus (my ROMANE Lords) hath left you many warres begun, which peradventure you could be contented to spare; yet now to maintaine the same, your City had need of a martiall King, active, and strong of body. Your people moreover, through long custome, and the great encrease they are grown unto by feates of Armes, desire nought else perhaps but warres; and it is plainly scene they seek still to grow, and command their Neighbours: So that if there were no other consideration in it, yet were it a meere mockerie for me to go to teach a City at this present to serve the gods, to love Justice, to hate warres, and to fly violence; when it rather hath need of a conquering Captain, then of a peaceable King. These and such other like Reasons and Perswasions Numa alledged, to discharge himself of the Kingdome which they offered him. Howbeit the Ambassadors of the ROMANS most humbly besought and prayed him with all instance possible, that he would not be the cause of another new stir and commotion among them, seeing both parts in the City have given their consent and liking to him alone, and none other to be their King. Moreover, when the Ambassadors had left him upon this Suit, his Father and Martius his kinsman, began also privately to perswade him, that he should not refuse to go good and godly an offer: And albeit he was contented with his present state, and desired to be no richer then he was, nor coveted no Princely honour nor glory, because he sought onely most famous vertue; yet he must needs think that to rule well, was to doe the gods good service, whose will it was to employ the justice they knew in him, and not to suffer it to be idle. Refuse not therefore (quoth they) this royal dignity, which to a grave and wife man is a goodly field, to bring forth many commendable workes and fruits. There you may do noble service to the gods, to humble the hearts of these martiall people, and to bring them to be holy and religious; for they readily turn, and easily conforme themselves unto the nature of their Prince. They dearly loved Tatius although he was a stranger: they have consecrated a memory to Romulus with divine honours, which they make unto him at this day. And it may be that the people seeing themselves conquerors will be full enough of wars, and the ROMANS being now full of spoils and triumphs, will be glad to have a gentle Prince, and one that loveth justice, that they may thenceforth live in peace under good and holy Laws. And yet if it be otherwise that their hearts be still full of heat and fury to fight; Is it not better to turn this their desire to make wars some other way, when a man hath the bridle in his own hands to do it, and to be a mean in the mean time to joyn the Countrey, and all the Nations of the SABYNES in perpetual love and amity, with so mighty and flourishing a City? Besides all these perswasions and reasons there were many signs also (as they say) which promised him good luck, together with the earnest affection and liking of his own Countrey Citizens: Who so soon as they understood the coming and commission of the Ambassadors of ROME, they importunately desired him to goe thither, and to accept the offer of the Kingdom; that he might more straightly unite and incorporate them together with the ROMANS. Whereupon Numa accepted the Kingdom. Then after he had done sacrifice to the gods, he set forwards on his journey towards ROME, where the people and Senate went out to meet him with wonderfull desire to see him. The women at his entry went blessing of him and singing of his praises. They did sacrifice for him in all the Temples of the gods. There was neither man nor woman but seemed to be as joyfull and glad as if a new Realme and not a new King, had been come to the City of ROME. Thus was he brought with this open joy and rejoicing unto the Market-place, where one of the Senators, which at that time was regent, called Spurius Vettius, made them pronounce his open Election, and so by one consent he was chosen King, with all the voices of the people. Then were brought unto him the tokens of honour and dignity of the King. But he himself commanded they should be staid a while, saying, He must be confirmed King by the gods: Then he tooke the Wife men and Priests with whom he went up into the Capitoll, which at that time was yet called Mount Tarpeian. And there the chieft of the Southsayers called Augures turned him rowards the South, having his face covered with a veile, and stood behinde him, laying his right hand upon his head, and praying to the gods that it would please them to declare their wils by flying of birds, or some other token concerning this Election; and so the Southsayer cast his eyes all about, as farre as he could possibly discern. During all this time there was a marvellous silence in the market-place, although then an infinite number of people were assembled there together, attending with great devotion what the issue of this divination would be, until there appeared unto them on the right hand, good and lucky birds, which did confirm the election. Then Numa putting on his royall robes, came down from Mount Tarpeian into the market-place, where all the people received him with wonderful shouts of joy, as a man the most holy and best beloved of the gods, that they could have chosen. So having taken the Royal Seate of the Kingdome, his first Act was this, That he discharged the guard of the three hundred Souldiers which Romulus had alwaies about his person, called Celeres, saying, He would not mistrust them which trusted him, neither would he be King over people which should mistrust him. His second Act was, that he did adde to the two Priests of Jupiter and Mars, a third in the honour of Romulus who was called Flamen Quirinalis. For the ancient ROMANES also called their Priests instituted in the old time, Flamines, by reason of certain little narrow hats which they weare on their heads, as if they had called them Pilamines: for Pilos in Greek signifieth a hat. And at that time (as they say) there were many more Greek words mingled with the Latine, then there are at this day. For they called the mantles the Kings did wear Lanas. And Juba saith, that it is the very same which the GRECIANS call Chlana, and that the young boy which was a servant in the Temple of Jupiter, was called Camillus, as some of the GRECIANS doe yet call the god Mercury, because he is servant of the gods. Now Numa having done these things at his first entry into his Kingdom, still to win further favour and good will of the people, began immediatly to frame his Citizens to a certain civility, being as iron wrought to softnesse, and brought them from their violent and warlike desires to temperate and civil manners: For out of doubt ROME was properly that which Plato ascribeth to a City full of trouble and pride. For first it was founded by the most courageous and warlike men of the world, which from all parts were gathered there together in a most desperate boldnesse, and afterwards it encreased and grew strong by armes and continual wars, like as piles driven into the ground, which the more they are rammed in, the further they enter, and stick the faster. Wherefore Numa judging it no small nor light enterprise, to pluck down the haughty stomacks of so fierce and violent a people, and to frame them unto a sober and quiet life, did seem to work it by means of the gods, with drawing them on thereto by little and little, and pacifying of their hot and fierce courages to fight, with Sacrifices, Feasts, Dancings, and common Processions, wherein he celebrated ever himself. In the which, together with their devotion, there was mingled now and then pastime and pleasure, and sometimes he laid the terrour and fear of the gods before their eyes, making them beleve that he had seen strange Visions, or that he had heard Voices, by which the gods did threaten them with some great troubles and plagues, alwaies to pull down and humble their hearts unto the feare of the gods. This was the cause why they thought afterwards that he had learned his wisdom of Pythagoras the Philosopher; because the greatest part of the Philosophy of the one, and of the government of the other, consisted in such Ceremonies and divine Studies. They report also that Numa did put on the outward shew and semblance of Pythagoras holinesse, as following his intention and example. For Pythagoras (as they say) made an Eagle so tame and gentle, that she would stoop and come down to him by certain voices, as she flew in the ayre over his head; And that passing through the Assembly of the games Olympickall, he shewed her thigh of gold, and many other pretty feats and deeds they tell of, which seemed to be wonderfull, and for which Timon Phliasi hath written these Verses of him:

Pythagoras Which loved to dwell in dignity,
And hath an heart to glory bent, and past in policy.
Much like a man which sought, by charming to enchant, Did use this art, to win mens mindes, which unto him did haunt:
His grave and pleasant tongue, in sugred speech did flow, Whereby he drew most mindes of men, to bent of his owne bow.

Even so the feigned fable of Numa, which he so cunningly disguised, was about the love of a goddess, or some Nymph of the Mountaine: with whom he seemed to have certaine secret meetings and talke, whereof we have spoken before. And it is said, he much frequented the Muses in the woods. For he would say, he had the most part of his revelations of the Muses, and he taught the ROMANES to reverence one of them above all the rest, who was called Tacita, as ye would say, Lady Silence. It seemeth he invented this, after the example of Pythagoras, who did so specially command and recommend silence unto his Schollers. Again, if we consider what Numa ordained concerning Images, and the representation of the gods, it is altogether agreeable unto the doctrine of Pythagoras: who thought that God was neither sensible nor mortall, but invisible, incorruptible, and onely intelligible. And Numa did forbid the ROMANES also to beleve, that God hath ever forme or likeness of beast or man. So that in those former times, there was in ROME no Image of God, either painted or graven: and it was from the beginning a hundred threecore and ten yeares, that they had built Temples and Chappels unto the gods in ROME, and yet there was neither Picture nor Image of God within them. For they tooke it at the first for a sacrilege, to present heavenly things by earthly formes, seeing we cannot possibly any way attaine to the knowledge of God, but in minde and understanding. The very Sacrifices which Numa ordained, were altogether agreeable and like unto the manner of serving of the Gods, which the Pythagorians used. For in their Sacrifices they spilt not the blood, but they did theirs commonly with a little Meale, a little shedding of Wine and Milke, and with such other light things. Such as affirme that those two men did much company and were familiar together, doe lay further proofes and arguments for the same. The first is this: that the ROMANES did make Pythagoras a free-man of the City of ROME; as Epicharmus the Comickall Poet an ancient Writer (and sometimes one of Pythagoras Schollers) saith in a Book he wrote and dedicated unto Antenor. The other proofe is: that Numa having had foure Children, called one of them Mamercus, after Pythagoras Sonnes Name; from whom, they say, is descended the house of the Emilians, which is the Noblett of the Patricians: for the King gave him the Name of Emilius, because of his sweet tongue and pleasant voice. Furthermore, I my selfe have heard say many times in ROME, that the ROMANES having received an Oracle, which commanded them to set up Images in their City. to the wisest and valiantest man that ever was among the GRECIANS, caused two Statues of Brasse to be set up in their market-place, the one of Pythagoras, the other of Alcibiades. Howbeit to strive about this matter any further, seeing there are so many doubts, methinketh it were but vaine. Moreover they attribute to Numa, the first erection of the Colledge Pontificall: and say, he himselfe was the first Pontifex that ever was. But touching the Name of Pontifex, some will say they were so called, because they chiefly were Ordained and appointed for the service of the Almighty: for this word Potens in the ROMAINE tongue, betokeneth mighty. Other thinke this Name was given to them by their founders, as to exempt persons out of the world: who enjoyed them to do all the service and sacrifices to the gods they could possibly, and yet notwithstanding, if they had any other lawfull let or impediment thereof, they were not straight condemned for omitting the same. Howbeit the most part doe bring out another derivation of this Name, wherein me thinks there is little reason. As that they should be called Pontifices, because they had the charge and maintenance of the Bridge. For that which the GRECIANS call Gephyran, the LATINES call Pontem: that is, a Bridge. And to say truly, the charges of repairing the Bridge, belongeth to the Bishops: as well as the keeping of the most holy and unchangeable Ceremonies. For the ROMANES thought it not only a thing unlawfull, but tooke it for a most damnable and wicked act, to destroy or breake the Bridge of wood, which was onely joynted together (as they say) with pinnes of wood, and without any Iron at all, by the Commandment of an old Oracle. But the stone Bridge was built long time after the Raigne of Numa, and in the time of the Raigne of his Nephew Martius. Now the first and chiefe of these Bishops, which they call the great Pontifex, hath the place, Authority, and Dignity of the high-Priest and Master of their pontificall Law: who should be careful, not onely about all publicke sacrifices and Ceremonies, but also about such as were private, and to see that no man privately should breake the ancient Ceremonies, nor bring in any new thing into Religion, but rather every man should be taught by him, how, and after what sort he should serve and honour the gods. He also hath the keeping of the holy Virgins which they call Vestales. For they doe give Numa the first foundation and consecrating of them, and the institution also of keeping the immortal fire with honour and reverence, which these Virgins have the charge of: Either for that he thought it meet to commit the substance of fire (being pure and cleane) unto the custody of cleane and uncorrupt Maids: or else because he thought the nature of fire (which is barren, and bringeth forth nothing) was fittest and most proper unto Virgins. For in GREECE, where they kept continual fire likewise (as in the Temple of Apollo in DELPHES, and at ATHENS) the Maidens do not keepe the same, but old Women which are past Marriage. And if this fire chance to faile, as they say in ATHENS the holy Lamp was put out in the time of the Tyranny of Aristion: and in the City of DELPHES it was put out, when the Temple of Apollo was burnt by the MEDES: and at ROME also, in the time of the wars that the ROMANES had against the King Mithridates: and in the time of the civill warres, when Alter, fire, and all were burnt and consumed together: they say that it must not be lighted againe with other common fire, but must be made anew, with drawing cleane and pure flame from the beames of the Sunne, and that they do in this manner. They have a hollow vessell made of a piece of a triangle, having a corner right, and two sides alike: so that from all parts of his compasse and circumference, it falleth into one point. Then they set this vessell right against the beames of the Sunne, so that the bright Sunne beames come to assemble and gather together in the center of this vessell, where they do pierce the ayre so strongly, that they set it on fire: and when the put to it any drie matter or substance, the fire taketh it straight, because the beame of the Sunne, by meanes of the Reverberation, putteth that dry matter into fire, and forceth it to flame. Some thinke that these Vestall Virgins keepe no other thing but this fire, which never goeth out. Other say, there are other Holy things also, which no body may lawfully see but they: whereof we have written more largely in the life of Camillus, at the least so much as may be learned and told. The first Maidens which were vowed and put into this order of Religion by Numa, were (as they say) Gegania and Verenia: and after them, Canuleia and Tarpeia. Afterwards King Servius increased the number with two other, and that number of foure continueth unto this day. Their rule and order set down by King Numa was this: that they should vow chastity for the space of thirty yeares. In the first ten yeares they learne what they have to do: the next ten yeares following, they do that which they have learned: and the last ten yeares, they teach young novices. After they have passed their thirty yeares, they may lawfully marry if they be disposed, and take them to another manner of life, and leave their Religion. But as it is reported, there have been very few of them which have taken this liberty, and and fewer also which have joyed after they were professed, but rather have repented themselves, and lived ever after a very grievous and sorrowfull Life. This did so fray the other Vestalls, that they were were better contented with their vowed chastitie : and so remained Virgins, untill they were old or else died. He gave them also great privileges and prerogatives : as, to make their Will and Testa-ment in their Fathers life time : to do all things without any Gardian or Overseer, as Women which have three Children at a Birth. When they go abroad, they carry Maces before them to honour them. And if by chance they meete any offender in their way going to execution, they save his life: howbeit the professed Vestall must affirme by Oath, that she met him unawares, and not of set pur-pose. If any man presume under their chaire, whereupon they are carried thorough the City, he shall die for it. Also when they themselves do any fault, they are corrected by the great Bishop, who sometimes doth whip them naked (according to the nature and quality of their offence) in a dark place and under a curten. But she that hath deflowered her Virginity, is buried quick by one of the gates of the City, which they call Collina gate : where within the City there is a Mount of earth of a good length, and with the LATINES is said to be raised. Under this forced Mount, they make a little hollow vault, and leave a hole open, whereby one may goe downe : and within it there is set a little bed, a burning Lampe, and some victuals to sustaine life withall. As a little Bread, a little Water, a little Milke, and a little Oyle, and that for Honours sake : to the end they would not be thought to famish a body to Death, which had been consecrated by the most Holy and devout Cere-monies of the world. This done, they take the offender, and put her into a Litter, which they cover strongly, and close it up with thicke leather, in such sort, that no body can so much as heare her voice, and so they carry her thus shut up through the market place : Every one draweth backe, when they see this Litter as farre off, and doe give it place to passe by : and then follow it mournfully with heavy looks, and speake never a word. They doe nothing in the City more fearfull to be-hold, then this : neither is there any day wherein the people are more forrowfull, then on such a day. Then after she is come to the place of this vawt, the Sergeants straight unloose the fast bound Coverings : and the chief Bishop after he hath made certaine secret prayers unto the gods, and lift his hands up to Heaven, taketh out of the Litter, the condemned Vestall mustied up close, and so putteth her upon the Ladder, which conveyeth her downe into the vawt. That done, he with-draweth, and all the Priests with him : and when the silly offendour is gone downe, they straight plucke up the Ladder, and cast abundance of earth in at the open hole, so that they fill it up to the very top of the Arch. And this is the punishment of the Vestals which defile their Virginity. They thinke also it was Numa that built the round Temple of the goddesse Vesta, in which is kept the everlasting fire : meaning to represent not the forme of the earth, which they say is Vesta, but the figure of the whole world, in the midst whereof (according to the Pythagoreans opinion) remain-eth the proper seate and abiding place of fire, which they call Vesta, and name it the Unity. For they are of Opinion, neither that the Earth is unmoveable, nor yet that it is set in the midst of the world, neither that the Heaven goeth about it : but say to the contrary, that the Earth hangeth in the ayre about the fire, as about the center thereof. Neither will they grant, that the Earth is one of the first and chiefest parts of the world : as Plato held Opinion in that age, the Earth was in another place then the very midst, and that the center of the world, as the most honourablest place, did appertaine to some other of more worthy substance then the Earth. Furthermore, the Bishops office was to shew those that needed to be taught, all the rites, manners, and customes of buriall : whom Numa taught not to beleve that there was any corruption or dishonesty in burials, but rather it was to worship and honour the gods of the Earth, with usuall and Honourable Ceremonies, as those which after their Death receive the chiefest service of us they can. But above all other in burials, they did specially honour the goddesse called Libitina, that is said, the chief Governour and preserver of the rites of the Dead : or be it Proserpina, or Venus, as the most Learned men among the ROMANES do judge, who not without cause do attribute the Order of the begin-nings and end of mans Life, to one selfe God, and power Divine. Numa Ordained also, how long time every body should Mourn in black. And for a Child from three yeares to ten yeares of age, that died : he Ordained they should mourne no more moneths then it had lived yeares, and not to adde a day more. For he commanded, that the longest time of Mourning should be but ten moneths onely, and so long time at the least he willed the Women should remaine widdowes, after the decease of their Husbands : or else she that would Marry within that time, was bound by his Order to sacrifice a whole Bullock. Numa also erected many other Orders of Priests : of two sorts whereof I will onely make mention. The one shall be the Order of the SALII, and the other of the FECIALES : for me thinkes, both the one and the other doth manifestly shew the great holinesse, and singular devotion which he had in him. The FECIALES are properly those, which the GRECIANS call IRENOPHYLACES, as who would say, peace-keepers. And in my judgement, they had their right Name according to their Office, because they did pacifie quarrels with reason by way of Order, and did not suffer (as much as in them lay) that any matter should be tried by violence, until they were past all hope of any peace. For the GRECIANS call it properly Irenen, when both parties agree, and decide their controversie with reason, and not with sword. Even so those which the ROMANES called the Feciales, went many times in perfon to those that did the ROMANES injury, and sought to perswade them with good reason, to keep promise with the ROMANES, and to offer them no wrong. But if they would not yeeld to reason whom they sought to perswade, then they called the gods to the witnesse thereof, and prayed them, that if they did not most earnestly incense the ROMANES, to pursue that most justly appertained unto their right, that all evils and mischiefs of the warres might fall upon themselves and on their Countrey.

This

This done, they did threaten open warres against such enemies. And if the FECIALES would not consent to open warres, and did happen to speake against them, it was not lawfull in that case, nei-ther for private person, nor for the King himselfe to make any warres : But like a just Prince, he must have leave by their sufferance to make the warres. Then did he confider and consult, by what meanes he might best procure and prosecute the same. Concerning this matter, they judge that the ill hap which came to the ROMANES, when the City of ROME was taken and sacked by the GAULES, chanced justly for breaking of this holy institution. For at that time the barbarous peo-ple besieged the City of the CLUSINIANS : and Gabinus Ambustus was sent Ambassadour unto them, to see if he could make peace betweene them. The barbarous people gave him an ill answer : whereupon Fabius thinking his embassie had been ended, and being somewhat hot and rash in de-fence of the CLUSINIANS, gave defiance to the valiantest GAULE there, to fight with him man to man. Fortune favoured him in this challenge ; for he slew the GAULE, and stripped him in the field. The GAULES seeing their mad slaine, sent immediately an Herald to ROME to accuse Fabius, how against all right and reason he began warres with them, without any open Proclamation made before. The FECIALES being then consulted with thereabout, did declare, he ought to be delivered into the hands of the GAULES, as one that had broken the Law of Armes, and had de-served it : but he made friends to the people which favoured him very much, and by their meanes escaped his delivery and punishment. Neverthelesse, the GAULES within short time after, came before ROME with all their power ; which they tooke, sacked and burnt every whit, saving the Ca-pitol, as we have written more amply in the life of Camillus. Now concerning the Priests that were called Salij, they say he did institute them upon this occasion : In the eight yeare of his raig-ne, there came a pestilent disease through all Italy, and at the length it crept also into ROME : Whereat every man being greatly afraid and discouraged, they say there fell from Heaven a Target of Cop-per, which lighted betweene the hands of Numa. They tell hereof a wonderfull tale, which the King himselfe affirmed he heard of the Nymph Egeria, and the Muses ; to wit, that this Target was sent from Heaven, for the health and preservation of the City : and therefore he should keepe it carefully, and cause eleven other to be cast and made, all like unto the same in fashion and greatnesse, to the end that if any would enterprife to steale it, he should not know which of them to take for the right Target. Moreover he said, he was commanded to consecrate the place to the Muses (in the which he did oftentimes company with them) and also the fields which were neare thereabouts : and like-wise to give the Fountaine that sprang in that place, unto the Vestals professed, that every day they might draw water at that Well, to wash the Sanctuary of their Temple. The successe hereof proved his words true, for the sicknesse ceased incontinently. So he assembled all the chiefe Craft-men then in ROME, to prove which of them would take upon him to make one like unto that. Every man despaird to performe it. Howbeit one called Veturius Mamurium (the excellentest Workman that was in those dayes) did make them all so suit-like, that Numa himselfe did not know the first Target, when they were all laid together : So he ordained the Priests Salij, to have the custody of these Targets, to see them safe kept. They were called Salij, not after the name of Salian boyne in SAMOTHRACIA, or in MANTINEA, as some have untruly alledged, who first invented the manner of dancing all armed : but they were so called, of their fashion and manner of dancing and leaping. For in the Moneth of March, they goe skipping and leaping up and down the City with those Targets on their armes, apparelled in red Cassocks without sleeves, and girded about with broad leather sword girdles, studded with Copper, having Helms of Copper on their heads, and striking upon their Targets with short Daggers, which they carry in their hands. Moreover, all their dancing consisteth in moving of their feet : for they handle them finely, making turnes above ground and beneath, with a sodaine measure, and a marvellous force of agility. They call these Targets Aneylia, because of their fashion, which is not altogether compasse : for they are not all round as other common Targets be, but they are cut with circles wreathed about, both the ends bowing in many foldes, and one so neere another, that altogether they come to a certaine wreathed forme, which the GRECIANS call Aneylon. Or else they are so called, because Ancon signifieth an elbow, upon which they carry them. All these derivations are written in the History of Juba, who in any case will have this word Aneylia to be drawne out of the Greek tongue. And it may be also they were so called, because the first came from above, which the GRECIANS call Anacathen : or else for healing the sick, which is called Acefsis ; or else for ceasing of the drynesse, which in Greek is called Anch-môn Lyssis : or for the ending of all diseases and evils, for which cause the ATHENIANS call Castor and Pollex. Anacus : if they lust to give this word his derivation from the Greek tongue. Now the reward which Mamurium the Goldsmith had for making of these Targets was, that the Salij unto this day doe make mention of him in their Song, which they sing going through the City, and dancing of their dance all armed. Howbeit some thinke they say not Veturius Mamurium, but veterem memo-riam, ancient memory. But Numa after he had ordained and instituted these orders of Priests, built his Palace neare unto the Temple of Vesta, which holdeth his Name Regia at this day, that is to say, the Kings Palace : In which he remained most part of his life, studying either to sacrifice to the gods, or to teach the Priests what they should doe, or how with them he should best contemplate all hea-venly things. It is true that he had another house on the hill, which they call at this day, Quirinal, the place whereof is yet to be seene. But in all these Sacrifices, Ceremonies and Processions of the Priests, there were alwayes Hushers that went before, crying to the people, Keepe silence, and tend upon Divine Service. For they say the Pythagoreans thought it good, that men should not worship the the gods, nor make prayers to them in passing by, or doing any other thing: but they thought it meet, that men should of purpose goe out of their houses, to serve and pray unto them. Even so King Numa thought it not meet, that his subjects should come to see and heare Divine Service negligently, as it were for a fashion, and onely to be rid of it, as heeding another thing: but he would have them set aside all other businesse, and employ their thoughts and hearts only upon the principall service of Religion and devotion towards the gods. So that during Service time, he would not have heard any noyse, any knocking, bouncing, or any clapping, as they commonly heare in all Artificers shops of occupation, whereof at this day they see some signes and tokens remaining in their Sacrifices at Rome. For all the time the Augur beholdeth the flying of the Birds, or that he is doing any Sacrifice, the Vergers cry aloud; Hoc age, which meaneth, Tend this. And it is a warning to those that are present, to call their wits home, and to thinke on that which is in hand. Also there are many of his Orders like the Precepts of the Pythagoreans: For as they did warne men, not to sit upon a little bushell, nor to cut fire with a Sword, nor to looke behind them when they goe abroad: to sacrifice to the Celestial gods in odd number, and to the gods of the Earth in an even number, of which Precepts they would not have the common people to have any knowledge or understanding. Even so there are many Institutions of Numa, the reasons of whereof are hidden and kept secret: as not to offer Wine to the gods of the Vine never cut, and not to sacrifice unto them without Meale: and to turne a turne about when they doe reverence to the gods, and to sit downe after they have worshipped them. And as touching the two first Ordinances, it seemeth that by them he did recommend clemency and humanity, as being a part of the devotion towards the gods. But as for the turning which he willett them to make that worship the gods, they say it presenteth the turning which the Element maketh by his moving. But me thinketh it should rather come of this: for that the Temples being set to the East, he that worshippeth entering into the Temple, sheweth his back to the West, and for this cause turneth towards that part, and afterwards returneth againe towards God; doing the whole turne, and ending the consummation of his Prayer, by this double adoration which he maketh before and behinde. Unlesse peradventure that he meant secretly to signifie, and give them to understand by this turning and changing of their looke, that which the EGYPTIANS figured by their wheelles: in shewing thereby, that these worldly things were never constant and in one state: and therefore, that we should take it thankfully, and patiently beare it, in what sort soever it pleased God to change or alter our life: And where he commanded that they should sit after they had worshipped God: they said it was a token of a good hope unto them that prayed that their prayers should be exalted, and that their goods should remaine safe, and stick by them. Other say, that this ease and sitting, is a separating them from doing: and therefore he would they should sit in the Temples of the gods, to shew they had done that which they had in hand before, to the end to take of the gods the beginning of another. And it may well be also that it was referred to the thing we spake of a little before: That Numa would accustom his people, not to serve the gods, nor to speake to them at all, as they passed by, or did any other thing, or were in haste: but would have them pray unto the gods when they had time and leisure, and all other businesse at that time set apart. By this good instruction and training them unto Religion, the City of Rome by little and little came to be so tractable, and had the great power of King Numa in such admiration, that they tooke all to be as true as the Gospel that he spake, though it had no more likelihood of troth, then tales devised of pleasure. Furthermore, they thought nothing incredible, or unpossible to him, if he would have it. And for prooffe hereof, there goeth a tale of him, that he having bidden a great company of the Citizens of Rome to come and sup with him, caused them to be served with plaine grosse meat, and in very poore and homely vessels: And when they were set, and began to fall to their meate, he cast out words sodainly unto them, how the goddesse with whom he accompanied, was come to see him even at that instant, and that sodainly the Hall was richly furnished, and the Tables covered with all sorts of excellent fine and delicate meates. Howbeit this farre passed all the vanity of lying, which is found written of him about his speaking with Jupiter. The hill Aventine was not at that time inhabited, nor inclosed within the walls of Rome, but was full of Springs and shadowed groves, whither commonly repaired to solace themselves, the two gods, Picus and Fannus, which otherwise might be thought two Satyres, or of the race of the Titanians: saving it is said, that they went through all Italy, doing the like wonders and miracles in physicke, charmes and art magick, which they report of those the Grecians call Idæes Daityles. There they say that Numa tooke them both, having put into the Spring both Wine and Honey, where they used to drinke. When they saw that they were taken, they transformed themselves into divers formes, disguising and disfiguring their naturall shape, into many terrible and fearefull sights to behold. Nevertheless in the end, perceiving they were so fast, as to escape there was no reckoning: they revealed unto him many things to come, and taught him the purifying against lightning and thunder, which they make yet at this day with Onions, Haire and Pilchers. Other say, he was not taught that by them, but that they fetched Jupiter out of Heaven with their conjuring and magick: whereat Jupiter being offended, answered in choler, that he should make it with heads: But Numa added straight, of Onions: Jupiter replied, of Men. Then Numa asked him againe, to take a little away the cruelty of the commandement; What Haires? Jupiter answered, quicke Haires: And Numa put too Pilchers also. And it is reported that this was the goddesse Egeria, that taught Numa this subtilty. This done, Jupiter returned appeased: by reason whereof the place place was called Illicium. For Ileos in the Greeke tongue signifieth appeased and favourable: and this purifying was afterwards made in that sort. These tales not onely vaine, but full of mockery also, doe shew us yet plainly the zeale and devotion men had in those times towards the gods, unto which Numa through custome had won them. And as for Numa himselfe, they say that he so firmly put all his hope and confidence in the helpe of the gods, that one day when he was told his enemies were in Armes against him, he did but laugh at it, and answered, And I doe sacrifice. It is he (as some say) that first built the Temple to Faith and Terme, and which made the ROMANS understand that the most holy and greatest Oath they could make, was to swear by their faith, which they keepe yet at this day. But Terme which signifieth bounds, is the god of confines or borders, unto whom they do sacrifice both publicly and privately, upon the limits of inheritance, and now they sacrifice unto him live Beasts. Howbeit in old time they did sacrifice unto him without any bloud, through the wife Institution of Numa, who declared and preached unto them, that this god of bounds was sincere and upright, without bloud or murther, as he that is a witnesse of justice and keeper of peace. It was he which in my opinion did first limit out the bounds of the Territory of Rome, which Romulus would never do, for feare left in bounding out his own he should confesse that which he occupied of other mens. For bounding and measuring, to him that will keepe it justly, is a bond that bridleth power and desire, but to him that forceth not to keepe it, it is a prooffe to shew his injustice. To say truly, the Territory of Rome had no great bounds at the first beginning, and Romulus had got by conquest the greatest part of it, and Numa did wholly divide it unto the needy Inhabitants to releve them, and to bring them out of poverty (which carrieth men headlong into mischief, and discourageth them to labour) to the end that plowing up the said Land, they should also plow up the weeds of their own barrenesse, to become civil and gentle. For that is no exercise nor occupation in the world which so suddenly bringeth a man to love and desire quietnesse, as doth husbandry and tillage, and yet to defend a mans own, there is in it courage and hardinesse to fight. But greedy desire, violently to take from others, and unjustly to occupy there is none of theirs, is never in right husbandmen. And therefore Numa having brought in husbandry amongst his Subjects, as a medicine and meane to make them love quietnesse, was desirous to inure them to this trade of life, the rather to make them humble and gentle of condition, then to encrease them in riches. He divided all the Territory of Rome into certain parts which he called Pagors, as much to say, as villages: And in every one of them he ordained comptrollers and visitors, which should survey all about, and he himselfe sometimes went abroad in person, conjecturing by their labour the manners and nature of every man. Such as he found diligent he advanced them unto honour, and gave them countenance and authority; Others which he saw slothfull and negligent, by rebuking and reproving of them, he made them amend. But amongst all his Ordinances which he made, one above all the rest carried the praise, and that was, that he divided his people into sundry occupations. For the City of Rome seemed yet to be made of two Nations, as we have said before; and to speak more properly, it was made of two Tribes. So that it could not, or would not for any thing be made one, being altogether impossible to take away all factions, and to make there should be no quarrels nor contentions between both parts. Wherefore he considered that when one will mingle two bodies or simples together, which for their hardnesse and contrary natures cannot well suffer mixture; then he breaks and beats them together as small as may be. For so being brought into a smaller and lesser powder, they would incorporate and agree the better. Even so he thought it was best to divide the people also into many small parts; by means whereof they should be put into many parties, which would more easily take away the first and the greatest part, when it should be divided and separated thus into sundry sorts. And this division he made by arts and occupations; as Minstrels, Goldsmiths, Carpenters, Diers, Shoemakers, Tawers, Tanners, Bell-founders, and pot-makers, and so forth through other craftes and occupations. So that he brought every one of these into one body, and company by it selfe, and ordained unto every particular mystery or craft, their Feasts, Assemblies, and Services, which they should make unto the gods, according to the dignity and worthinesse of every occupation: And by this meane he first tooke away all faction, that neither side said, nor thought any more, those are SABINES, these are ROMANS, these are of Tatius, these are of Romulus. Incomuch as this division was an incorporating, and an uniting of the whole together. Among other his Ordinances, they did much commend his reforming his reforming of the Law, that gave liberty unto Fathers to sell their children. For he did except children already married, so they were married with their Fathers consent and good-will, judging it to be too cruell and over hard a thing, that a woman who thought she had married a Free-man, should finde her selfe to be the wife of a bondman. He began also to mend a little the Calendar, not so exactly as he should have done, nor yet altogether ignorantly. For during the Reign of Romulus they used the moneths confusedly, without any order or reason, making some of them twenty daies and lesse, and others 35 daies and more, without knowing the difference between the course of the Sunne and the Moon: and onely they observed this rule that there was 360 daies in the year. But Numa considering the inequality stood upon eleven daies, for that the twelve Revolutions of the Moon are run in 354 daies, and the Revolution of the Sun in 365 daies, he doubled the 11 daies, whereof he made a moneth, which he placed from two years to two years after the moneth of February, and the ROMANS called this Moneth put between Meridinum, which had 22 daies. And this is the correction that Numa made, which since hath had a farre better amendment. He did also change the order of the Moneths. For March which before was the first, he made it now the third, and January the first, which under Romulus was the eleventh, and February the twelfth and last. Yet many are of opinion, that Numa added these two January and February. For the ROMANS at the beginning had but ten months in the year, as some of the barbarous people make but three months for their year. And the ARCADIANs amongst the GRECIANS have but four months for their year. The ACARNANIANs have six to the year; And the EGYPTIANs had first but one month to their year, and afterwards they made four months for their year. And this is the cause why they seem (albeit they inhabit a new country) to be nevertheless the ancientest people of the world; For that in their Chronicles they reckon up such infinite number of years as those which count the Months for the years. And to prove this true, that the ROMANS at the beginning had but ten months in the year, and not twelve, it is easie to be judged by the name of the last, which they call at this day December. And that the month of March was also the first, may be conjectured by this, for the fifth month after that is may be called Quintilis, the sixth Sextilis, and so the other in order following the numbers. For if January and February had then been the first, of necessity the month of July which they call Quintilis, must have been named September; considering also that it is very likely that the month which Romulus had dedicated unto Mars, was also by him ordained to be the first. The second was April, so called of the name Aphrodite, that is to say, Venus, unto whom they make open sacrifice in this Month. And on the first day of the fame, women doe wash themselves, having a garland of myrtle upon their heads. Howbeit some other say, that it was not called after the name of Aphrodite, but it was onely called Aprilis, because then is the chiefeft force and strength of the Spring, at which season the earth doth open, and the seeds of plants and hearbes begin to bud and shew forth, which the word it selfe doth signifie. The month following next after this, is called May, after the name of Mia the mother of Mercury, unto whom the * Month is consecrated. The month of June is so called also, because of the quality of that season, which is as the youth of the year. Although some will say that the Month of May was named of this word Maiores, which signifieth as much as the elders; and the Month of June of Juniores, which signifies the younger men. All the other following were named in old time by the numbers according to their order, Quintilis, Sextilis, September, October, November, and December. But Quintilis was after called Julius, of the name of Julius Caesar, who slew Pompeius; and Sextilis was named Augustus of Octavius Caesar his Successor in the Empire, who was also furnamed Augustus. It is true also that Domitian would they should call the two months following (which are September and October) the one Germanicus, and the other Domitianus; But that held not long: For so soon as Domitian was killed, the months recovered their ancient names again. The two last months onely have ever continued their names, without changing or altering. But of the two which Numa added, or at the least translated, the month of February doth signifie as much as purging, or at least the derivation of the word foundeth near it. In this month they do sacrifice of plants, * and do celebrate the Feast of the LUPERCALS, in which there are many things agreeable and like to the sacrifices made for purification. And the first which is January was called after the name of Janus. Wherefore methinks that Numa tooke away the month of March from the first place, and gave it unto January; because he would have peace preferred before warre, and civil things before martiall. For this Janus (were he King or demigod) in the former age was counted very civil and politick: For he changed the life of men which before his time was rude, cruell, and wilde, and brought it to be honest, gentle, and civil. For this cause they doe paint his Image at this day with two faces, the one before and the other behinde, for thus changing the lives of men. And there is in ROME a Temple dedicated unto him, which hath two doors, that be called the doors of war; for the custome is to open them, when the ROMANS have any warres in any place, and to shut them when they be at peace. To have them shut it was a rare thing to see, and happened very seldome, by reason of the greatnesse of their Empire, which on all sides was environed with barbarous Nations, whom they were compelled to keepe under with force of armes. Notwithstanding it was once shut up in the time of Augustus, after he had slain Anony; and once before also in the year when Marcus Attilius and Titus Manlius were Consuls. But that continued not long, for it was opened againe incontinently, by reason of warres that came upon them soone after. Howbeit during the Reign of Numa, it was never one day opened, but remained shut continually by the space of three and forty years together. For all occasions of warres were then utterly dead and forgotten, because at ROME the people were not onely through the example of justice, clemency, and the goodness of the King, brought to be quiet, and to love peace, but in the Cities thereabouts there began a marvellous change of manners, and alteration of life, as if some gentle aire had breathed on them, by some gracious and healthfull winde blowne from ROME to refresh them. And thereby bred in mens mindes such a hearty desire to live in peace, to till the ground, to bring up their children, and to serve the gods truly, that almost through all ITALY there was nothing but Feasts, Plays, Sacrifices and Banquets. The people did traffique and frequent together without fear or danger, and visited one another, making great cheer; as if out of the springing Fountain of Numa's wisdom many pretty brookes and streams of good and honest life had run over all ITALY, and had watered it; and that the mildnesse of his wisdom had from hand to hand been disperfed through the whole world; Inomuch as the over-excessive speeches the Poets accustomed doe use were not sufficient enough to expresse the peaceable reign of that time.

Numa builded Temples to Faith and Terme.

Numa made the bounds of the Territory of Rome.

There :

There, Spiders weave, there cobwebs day and night
In harnesses, which wont to serve for warre:
There canker'd drust doth fret the steel full bright Of trenchant blades, well whet in many a jarre.
There, mighty Spears for lack of use are eaten,
With rotter wormes; And in that country there,
The braying trompe doth never seem to threaten Their quiet ears with blasts of bloody fear.
There, in that land, no drowsie sleep is broken With hot alarms, which terrors do betoken.

For during all King Numa's Reign it was never heard that ever there were any warres, civil dissention, or innovation of government attempted against him, nor yet any secret enmity or malice borne him, neither any conspiracy once thought on to reign in his place. And whether it was for feare of displeasing the gods (which visibly seemed to take him into their protection) or for the reverent regard they had unto his vertue, or for his prosperous and good successe all the time he reigned, I cannot tell: howbeit he fought to keepe men still pure and honest, from all wickednesse, and laid most open before the eyes of the whole world, a clear example of that which Plato long time after did affirm; and say, concerning true government; which was, That the only meane of true quietnesse and remedy from all evil (which ever troubleth men) was, when by some divine ordinance from above there meeteth in one person the right Majesty of a King, and the minde of a wise Philosopher, to make vertue governeesse and ruler over vice. For indeed happy is a wise man, and more happy are they, which may hear the grave counsell and good lessons of such a mouth: and there (me thinks) needeth no force, no compulsion, no threats, nor extremity to bridle the people. For men seeing the true image of vertue in their visible Prince, and in the example of his life, do willingly grow to be wise, and of themselves do fall into love, liking, and friendship together, and do use all temperance, just dealing, and good order one towards another, leading their life without offence, and with the commendation of other, which is the chief point of felicity, and the most happy good that can light unto men. And he by nature is best worthy to be a King, who through his wisdom and vertue can graffe in mens manners such a good disposition, and this Numa above all other seemed best to know and understand. Furthermore touching his wives and children, there are great contraries among the Historiographers. For some of them say, he never married other wife then Tatia, and that he never had any children but one onely daughter, and she was called Pompilia. Other write to the contrary, that he had four Sons, Pompo, Pinus, Calpus, and Mamercus, of every one of the which (by succession from the Father to the Son) have descended the noblest races and most ancient houses of the ROMANS. As the house of the Pomponians, of Pompo: the house of the Pinarians of Pinus: the house of the Calphurnians of Calpus: and the house of the Mamercians of Mamercus. All which Families by reason of their progenitor have kept the surname of Reges Kings. There are three other Writers which do reprove the two first: saying, that they did write to gratifie the families, making them falsely to defend of the noble race of King Numa. Moreover it is said, he had his daughter Pompilia, not by Tatia, but by his other wife called Lucretia, whom he married after he was made King. Howbeit they all agree, that his daughter Pompilia was married unto one Martius, the Son of the same Martius, which perswaded him to accept the Kingdom of ROME. For he went with him to ROME to remaine there, where they did him the honour to receive him into the number of the Senators. After the death of Numa, Martius the Father stood against Tullus Hostilius for the succession of the Realme, and being overcome, he killed himself for sorrow. But his Son Martius, who married Pompilia, continued still at ROME, where he begot Ancus Martius, who was King of ROME, after Tullus Hostilius, and was but five years old when Numa died. Whose death was not sudden: For he died consuming by little and little, as well through age as also through a lingring disease that waited on him to his end, as Piso hath written; and Numa at his death was little more then fourscore years old. But the pompe and honour done unto him at his Funerals, made his life yet more happy and glorious. For all the people, his neighbours, friends, kinsmen, and allies of the ROMANS came thither, bringing crownes with them, and other publike contributions to honour his Obsequies. The noble men selves of the City (which were called Patricians) carried on their shoulders the very bed on which the corpse lay, to be conveyed to his grave. The Priests attended also on his body, and so did all the rest of the people, women and children in like case, which followed him to his Tomb, all bewailing and lamenting his death, with tears, sighs, and mournings; not as a King dead for very age, but as they had mourned for the death of their dearest kinsman, and nearest friend that had died before he was old. They burnt not his body, because (as some say) he commanded the contrary by his Will and Testament: but they made two coffins of stone, which they buried at the foot of the Hill called Janiculum. In the one they laid his body, and in the other the holy Books which he had written himselfe, much like unto those which they that made the Lawes among the GRECIANS did write in Tables. But because in his life time he had taught the Priests the substance of the whole contained in the fame, he willed the holy Tables which he had written, should be buried with his body. For he thought it not reasonable that so holy matters should be kept by dead letters and writings, but by mens manners and exercises. And he followed herein they say, the Pythagoreans, who would not put their works in writing, but did printe the knowledge of them in their memories, whom they knew to be worthy men, and that without any writing at all. And if they had taught any manner of person the hidden rules and secrets of Geometry, which had not been worthy of them, then they said the gods by manifest tokens would threaten to revenge such sacrilege and impiety, with some great destruction and misery. Therefore seeing so many things agreeable, and altogether like between Numa and Pythagoras, I easily pardon those which maintain their opinion, that Numa and Pythagoras were familiarly acquainted and conversant together. Valerius Antias the Historian writeth, there were twelve Books written concerning the office of Priests, and twelve other containing the Philosophy of the GRECIANS. And that four hundred years after (in the same year when Publius Cornelius and Marcus Bibulus were consuls) there fell a great rage of waters and rain, which opened the earth, and discovered these coffins: and the lids and covers thereof being carried away, they found the one altogether void, having no manner of likelihood, or token of a body that had lain in it: and in the other they found these Books, which were delivered unto one named Petilius (at that time Prætor) who had the charge to reade them over, and to make the report of them. But he having perused them over, declared to the Senate that he thought it not convenient the matters contained in them should be published unto the simple people, and for that cause they were carried into the market-place, and there were openly burnt. Surely it is a common thing that happeneth unto all good and just men, that they are farre more praised and esteemed after their death then before, because that envy doth not long continue after their death, and oftentimes it dieth before them. But notwithstanding the misfortunes which chanced afterwards unto the five Kings which reigned at ROME after Numa, have made his honour shine with much more noble glory then before. For the last of them was driven out of his Kingdom, and died in exile after he was very old; and of the other four, none of them died their naturall death, but three of them were killed by treason. And Tullius Hosilius which reigned after Numa, deriding and contemning the most part of his good and holy Institutions, and chiefly his devotion towards the gods, as a thing which made men lowly and faint-hearted; did as soon as ever he came to be King, turne all his Subjects hearts to the wars. But this mad humour of his, continued not long. For he was plagued with a strange and most grievous disease that followed him, which brought him to change his minde, and did farre otherwise turne his his contempt of Religion into an over-fearfull superstition, which did nothing yet resemble the true Religion and devotion of Numa, and besides he infected others with his contagious error, through the inconvenience which happened unto him at his death. For he was stricken and burnt with lightning.

THE COMPARISON OF LYCURGUS with NUMA.

Hus having written the Lives of Lycurgus and Numa, the matter requireth, though it be somewhat hard to doe, that we comparing the one with the other, should set out the difference betweene them. For in those things wherein they were like of condition, their deeds doe shew it sufficiently. As in their temperance, their devotion to the gods, their wisdom in governing, and their discrete handling of their people, by making them beleieve that the gods had revealed the Lawes unto them, which they established. And now to come unto their qualities, which are diversly and severally commended in either of them: Their first quality is, that Numa accepted the Kingdom, and Lycurgus gave it up. The one received it, not seeking for it: and the other having it in his hands did restore it again. The one being a stranger and a private man; was by strangers elected and chosen their Lord and King. The other being in possession a King, made himselfe againe a private person. Sure it is a goodly thing to obtain a Realme by justice: but it is a goodlier thing to esteeme justice above a Realme. Vertue brought the one to be in such reputation, that he was judged worthy to be chosen a King: and vertue bred so noble a minde in the other, that he esteemed not to be a King. Their second quality is, that like as in an Instrument of musick, the one of them did tune and wrest up the slack strings which were in SPARTA: so the other slackened, and set them lower, which were too high mounted in ROME. Wherein Lycurgus difficulty was the greater: For he did not perswade his Citizens, to pluck off their armour and curates, nor to lay by their swords; but only to leave their gold and silver, to forsake their soft beds, their fine wrought tables, and other curious rich furniture, and not to leave off the travell of warres, to give themselves onely unto feasts, sacrifices and playes: but to the contrary, to give up banquetting and feasting, and continually to take pains in the warres, yielding their bodies to all kinde of pains. By which means, the one for the love and reverence they did beare him, easily perswaded all that he would: and the other by putting himself in danger, and being hurt also, obtained not without great travell and adventure, the end of his intended purpose and desire. Numa his muse was so gentle, loving and courteous, that the manners of his Citizens, which before were furious and violent, were now so tractable and civill, that he taught them to love peace and justice. And to the contrary, if they will compell me to number amongst the Lawes and Ordinances of Lycurgus, that which we have written touching the ELLOTES, which was a barbarous cruell thing: I must of force confesse that Numa was much wiser, more gentle and civill in his Lawes, considering that even unto those which indeed were borne slaves, he gave some little taste of honour and sweetness of liberty, having ordained, that in the feasts of Saturnus, they should sit downe at meate at their Masters own table. Some hold opinion, that this custome was brought in by King Numa: who willed that those, which through their labour in tillage brought in much fruit, should have some pleasure thereof to make good cheere with the fruits of the same. Other imagin, that it is yet a token and remembrance of the equality which was amongst men in the world in Saturnus time, when there was neither master nor servant, but all men were alike equall, as brethren or kinsmen. To conclude, it seemeth either of them tooke a direct course, thought best to themselves, to frame their people unto temperance, and to be contented with their owne. But for their other vertues, it appeareth that the one loved warre best, and the other justice: unlesse it were that men would say, that for the diversity of the nature or custome of their people (which were almost contrary in manners) they were both compelled to use also contrary and divers meanes from other. For it was not of a faint heart, that Numa took from his people the use of armes, and desire to be in warres: but it was to the end they should not doe any wrong to others. Neither did Lycurgus also study to make 3355.

Anno Mundi,

Anno Christi, 593.

Solons lineage.

DIDYMU$ the Grammarians, in a little Booke that he wrote, and dedicated unto Asclepiades, touching the Tables of the Lawes of Solon, alledgeth the words of one Philocles, in which he speaketh against the common opinion of those that have written, that Solons Father was called Euphorion. For all other Writers agree, that he was the sonne of Execestides, a man but reasonably to live, although otherwise he was of the Noblest and most ancient House of the City of ATHENS. For of his Fathers side, he was descended of King Codrus; and for his Mother Hermistides Ponticus writeth, she was cousin germaine unto Pyssistratus mother. For this cause even from the beginning there was great friendship betweene them, partly for their kinned, and partly also for the courtesie and beauty of Pyssistratus, with whom it is reported Solon on a time was in love. Afterwards they fortun'd to fall at jarre one with the other, about matter of State and Governement: yet this square bred no violent inconvenience betweene them, but they reserved in their hearts still their ancient amity, which continued the memory of their love, as a great fire doth a burning flame. That Solon was no stayed man to withstand beauty, nor any great doer to prevaile in love, it is manifest to all, as well by other Poeticall Writings that he hath made, as by a Law of his owne: wherein he did forbid Bondmen to perfume themselves, or to be lovers of children. Who placed this Law among honest matters, and commendable: as allowing it to the better sort, and forbidding it to the basest. They say also that Pyssistratus selfe was in love with Charmus, and that he did set up the little Image of Love, which is in ACADEMIA, where they were wont to light the holy Candle. But Solons Father (as Hermippus writeth) having spent his Goods in liberality and deeds of courtesie, though he might easly have bene relieved at divers mens hands with Money, he was yet ashamed to take any, because he came of a House which was wont rather to give and relieve others, then to take themselves: so being yet a young man, he devised to trade Merchandize. Howbeit other say, that Solon travelled Countreys, rather to see the World, and to learne, then to traffique, or gaine. For sure he was very desirous of knowledge, as appeareth manifestly: for that being now old, he commonly used to say this Verse:

*I grow old, learning still.
Also he was not covetously bent, nor loved Riches too much: for he said in one place:
Whoso hath Goods and Gold enough at call, Great herds of Beasts, and flocks in many a fold, Both Horse and Mule, yea store of Corne, and all That may content each man above the mould:
No richer is, for all those heaps and hoards,
Then he which hath sufficiently to feede,
And clothe his corps, with such as God affords.

ment of riches

For to behold the faire and heavenly face Of some sweete Wife, which is adorn'd with grace, Or else some childe, of beauty faire and bright, Then hath he cause (indeede) of deepe delight.

And in another place also he saith:

*Indeed I do desire, some Wealth to have at will:
But not unlesse the same be got, by faithfull dealing still.
For sure who so desires by wickednesse to thrive:
Shall finde that justice from such goods, will justly him deprive.*

Howbeit, as an honest man is not to busie himselfe overmuch in scraping together of superfluous and unnecessary goods; so nothing letteth but that he may have a care to store himselfe with such things as he shall have neede of.

In those dayes no state was discommended, as saith Hesiodus, nor any Art or Science made any difference betweene men: but Merchandize they thought an honourable state, as that which delivered meanes to traffique into strange and farre Countreys, to get acquaintance with States, to procure the love of Princes, and chiefly to gather the experience of the World. So that there have bene Merchants, which heretofore have bene Founders of great Cities: as he which built MARSILIA, after he had obtained the friendship of the GAULS, dwelling by the River of Rhossine. And they say also, that Thales Milesius the wife did traffique Merchandize, and that Hippocrates the Mathematick did even so: and likewise that Plato travelling into EGYPT, did beare the whole charges of his journey, with the gaine he made of the sale of oyle he carried thither. They remember also that Solon learned to be lavish in expence, to fare delicately, and to speake wantonly of pleasures in his Poems, somewhat more licentiously then became the gravity of a Philosopher: onely because he was brought up in the trade of Merchandize, wherein for that men are marvellous subject to great losses and dangers, they seeke other whiles good cheere to drive these cares away, and liberty to make much of themselves. Yet it appeareth by these Verses, that Solon accounted himselfe rather in the number of the poore, then of the rich.

*Rich men (oft times) in lowdest lives do range,
And often seene, that vertuous men be poore:
Yet would the good their goodnesse never change With low estate, although their wealth be more.
For vertue stands alwayes both firme and stable;
When riches poore, and seldome are durable.*

Poverty with vertue better
then riches.

This Poetry at the beginning he used, but for pleasure, and when he had leisure, writing no matter of importance in his Verses. Afterwards he did set out many grave matters of Philosophy, and the most part of such things as he had devised before, in the Governement of a Common-weale, which he did not for History or memories sake, but onely of a pleasure to discourse: for he sheweth the reasons of that he did, and in some places he exhorteth, chideth, and reproveth the ATHENIANS. And some affirme also he went about to write his Lawes and Ordinances in Verse, and do recite his Preface, which was this:

*Vouchsafe O mighty Jove, of Heaven and Earth high King:
To grant good fortune to my Lawes and bests in every thing.
And that their glory grow, in such triumphant Wife,
As may remaine in fame for aye, which lives and never dyes.*

He chiefly delighted in Morall Philosophy, which treated of Governement and Common-weales: Solon delighted in Morall, but not in naturall Philosophy.

*The clattering hails, and softly falling snow
Do breed in aire, and fall from clouds on hie.
The dreadful claps, which thunderbolts do throw,
Do come from Heaven, and lightnings bright in skie.
The sea it selfe by boisterous blasts doth rore,
Which (were it not provoked so full sore)
Would be both calme and quiet for to pass, As any Element that ever was.*

So in effect there was none but Thales alone of all the seven wise men of GREECE, who searched further the contemplation of things in common use among men, than he. For setting him apart, all the others got the name of wisdom, onely for their understanding in matters of State and Governement. It is reported that they met on a day all seven together in the City of DELPHES, and another time in the City of CORINTH, where Periander got them together at a Feast that he made to the other fixe. But that which most increased their glory, and made their fame most spoken of, was the sending back againe of the three-footed stooles when they all had refused it, and turned it over one to another with great humanity. For the tale is, how certaine Fisher-men of the Isle of CO, cast their Nets into the Sea, and certaine strangers passing by, that came from the City of MILETUM, did buy their draught of Fish at adventure, before the Net was drawne. And when they drew it up, there came up in the Net a three-footed stooles of masse Gold, which men say, Hellen (as she did returne from TROY) had throwne in that place, in memory of an ancient Oracle she called then unto unto her minde. Thereupon the strangers and Fisher-men first fell at strife about this three-footed stooles, who should have it: but afterwards the two Cities tooke part of both sides, on their Citizens behalfe. Insomuch as Warres had like to have followed betweene them, had not the Prophetesse Pythia given a like Oracle unto them both: That they should give this three-footed stooles unto the wisest man. Whereupon the men of Co, sent it first to Thales in the City of MILETUM, as being willing to grant that unto a private person, for which they had made Warres with all the MILESIANS before. Thales said, he thought Bias a wiser man then himselfe: and so it was sent unto him. He likewise sent it againe unto another, as a wiser man. And that other, sent it also unto another. So that being thus posted from man to man, and through divers hands, in the end it was brought backe againe unto the City of MILETUM, and delivered into the hands of Thales the second time: and last of all was carried unto THEBES, and offered up unto the Temple of Apollo Ismenian. Howbeit Theophrastus writeth, that first it was sent to the City of PRIENA, unto Bias: and then unto Thales, in the City of MILETUM, by Bias consent. And after that it had passed through all their hands, it was brought againe unto Bias: and lastly it was sent to the City of DELPHES. And thus much have the best and most ancient Writers written: saying that some say in stead of a three-footed stooles, it was a cup that King Croesus sent unto the City of DELPHES. Other say, it was a piece of Plate which Buthycles left there. They made mention also of another private meeting betwixt Anacharsis and Solon, and of another betweene him and Thales, where they recite, that they had this talke. Anacharsis being arrived at ATHENS, went to knock at Solon's gate, saying that he was a stranger which came of purpose to see him, and to desire his acquaintance and friendship. Solon answered him, that it was better to seeke friendship in his owne Countrey. Anacharsis replied againe: Thou then that art at home, and in thine owne Countrey, begin to shew me friendship. Then Solon wondering at his bold ready wit, entertained him very courteously, and kept him a certaine time in his house, and made him very good cheere, at the sellesame time wherein he was most busie in governing the Common-weale, and making Lawes for the state thereof. Which when Anacharsis understood, he laughed at it: to see that Solon imagined with written Lawes, to bridle mens covetousnesse and injustice. For such Lawes, said he, do rightly resemble the Spiders Cobwebs: because they take hold of little Flies and Gnats which fall into them, but the rich and mighty will breake and runne thorow them at their will. Solon answered him, that men do justly keepe all covenants and bargaines which one make with another, because it is to the hinderance of either party to breake them: and even so, he did so temper his Lawes, that he made his Citizens know, it was more for their profit to obey law and justice, then to breake it. Nevertheless afterwards, matters proved rather according to Anacharsis comparison, then agreeable to the hope that Solon had conceived. Anacharsis being by hap one day in a common Assembly of the People at ATHENS, said that he marvelled much, why in the consultations and meetings of the GRECIANS, wife men propounded matters, and fooles did decide them. It is said moreover, that Solon was sometime in the City of MILETUM at Thales house, where he said that he could not but marvel at Thales, that he would never marry to have children. Thales gave him never a word at that present: but within few dayes after he suborned a stranger, which said that he came but newly home from ATHENS, departing from thence but ten dayes before. Solon asked him immediately, What newes there? This stranger whom Thales had schooled before, answered: None other there, saving that they carried a young man to buriall, whom all the City followed: for that he was one of the greatest mens sonnes of the City, and the honestest man withall, who at that present was out of the Countrey, and had bene a long time (as they said) abroad. O poore unfortunate Father, then said Solon: and what was his name? I have heard him named, said the stranger, but I have forgotten him now; saving that they all said, he was a worthy wife man. So Solon still trembling more and more for feare, at every answer of this stranger: in the end he could hold no longer, being full of trouble, but told his name himselfe unto the stranger, and asked him againe, if he were not the Son of Solon which was buried. The very same, said the stranger. Solon with that like a madde man straight began to beate his head, and to say, and do, like men impatient in affliction, and overcome with sorrow. But Thales laughing to see this pageant, staid him, and said: Lo, Solon, this is it that keepeth me from marrying, and getting of children; which is of such a violence, that thou feelest it hath now overcome thee, although otherwise thou art strong, and able to wrestle with any. Howbeit for any thing he hath said unto thee, be of good cheere man, for it is but a tale, and nothing so. Hermippus writeth, that Patacus (he which said he had Alops soule) recited this story thus. Nevertheless it lacketh judgement, and the courage of a man also, to be affraid to get things necessary, fearing the losse of them: for by this reckoning he should neither esteeme honour, goods, nor knowledge when he hath them, for feare to lose them. For we see that vertue it selfe, which is the greatest and sweetest riches a man can have, decayeth oft times through sicknesse, or else by physick and potions. Furthermore Thales selfe, although he was not married, was not therefore free from this feare, unlesse he would confesse that he neither loved friends, kinsmen, nor Countrey: howbeit Thales had an adopted sonne, called Cybius, which was his Sisters Sonne. For our soule having in it a naturall inclination to love, and being borne as well to love, as to feede, to reason, or understand, and to remember: having nothing of her owne whereupon the might bestow that naturall love, borroweth of other. As where there is a house of inheritance without lawfull heires, many times strangers, and base borne children, do creepe into the kinde affection of the owner, and when they have once wonne and possessed his love, they make him ever after to be kinde and tender over them. So that that ye shall see many times men of such a hard and rough nature, that they like not of them that move them to marry, and get lawfull children: and yet afterwards are ready to die for feare and sorrow, when they see their bastards (that they have gotten of their slaves or Concubines) fall sicke or dye, and do utter words farre unmeet for men of noble courage. And some such there be, that for the death of a Dog, or their Horse, are so out of heart and take such thought, that they are ready to go into the ground, they looke so pitifully. Other some are cleane contrary, who though they have lost their children, forgone their friends, or some Gentleman deare unto them, yet no sorrowfull word hath come from them, neither have they done any unseemly thing: but have passed the rest of their life like wife, constant and vertuous men. For it is not love but weaknesse, which breedeth these extreme sorrowes, and exceeding feare, in men that are not exercised, nor acquainted to fight against fortune with reason. And this is the cause that plucketh from them the pleasure of that they love and desire, by reason of the continuall trouble, feare and griefe they feele, by thinking how in time they may be deprived of it. Now we must not arme our selves with poverty, against the griefe of losse of Goods: neither with lacke of affection, against the losse of our friends: neither with want of Marriage, against the death of Children: but we must be armed with reason against misfortunes. Thus have we sufficiently enlarged this matter. The ATHENIANS having now sustained a long and troublesome Warre against the MEGARIANS, for the possession of the Isle of SALAMINA, were in the end weary of it, and made proclamation, straightly commanding upon paine of death, that no man should presume to preferre any more to the Councell of the City, the title or question of the possession of the Isle of SALAMINA. Solon could not beare this open shame, and seeing the most part of the lustiest youths desirous still of Warre, though their tongues were tied for feare of the Proclamation, he fained himselfe to be out of his wits, and caused it to be given out that Solon was become a foole: and secretly he had made certaine lamentable Verses, which he had cunne without booke, to sing abroad the City. So one day he ranne suddenly out of his house with a Garland on his head, and got him to the Market-place, where the People straight swarmed like Bees about him: and getting him upon the stone where all Proclamations are usually made, out he singeth these Elegies he had made, which began after this sort:

*Here present my selfe (an Herald) in this case, Which come from Salamina Land, that noble worthy place.
My minde in pelling prose, shall never be exprest, But sung in Verse Heroicall, for so I thinke it best.*

This Elegie is intituled SALAMINA, and containeth an hundred Verses, which are excellently well written. And these being openly sung by Solon at that time, his friends incontinently praised them beyond measure, and specially Pythistratus: and they went about perswading the People that were present, to credit that he spoke. Hereupon the matter was so handled amongst them, that by and by the Proclamation was revoked, and they began to follow the Warres with greater fury then before, appointing Solon to be Generall in the same. But the common tale and report is, that he went by Sea with Pythistratus unto the Temple of Venus, surnamed Coliade: where he found all the women at a solemne Feast and Sacrifice, which they made of custome to the goddess. He taking occasion thereby, sent from thence a trusty man of his owne unto the MEGARIANS, which then had SALAMINA: whom he instructed to feigne himselfe a revolted Traytor, and that he came of purpose to tell them, that if they would but go with him, they might take all the chiefe Ladies and Gentlewomen of ATHENS on a sudden. The MEGAREANS easily believed him, and shipped forthwith certaine Souldiers to go with him. But when Solon perceived the Ship under saile coming from SALAMINA, he commanded the women to depart, and in stead of them he put lusty bearded Springalls in their Apparell, and gave them little short Daggers to convey under their Cloakes, commanding them to play and dance together upon the Sea side, untill their Enemies were landed, and their Ship at anchor; and so it came to passe. For the MEGARIANS being deceived by that they saw as farre off, as soone as ever they came to the shore side, did land in heapes, one in anothers neck, even for greedinesse, to take these women: but not a man of them escaped, for they were slaine every mothers sonne. This stratagem being finely handled, and to good effect, the ATHENIANS tooke Sea straight, and coasted over to the Isle of SALAMINA: which they tooke upon the sudden, and won it without much resistance. Other say that it was not taken after this sort: but that Apollo Delphicus gave Solon first such an Oracle:

*Thou shalt first winne by Vowes and Sacrifice,
The helpe of Lords and demy-gods full bright:
Of whose dead bones, the dust engraven lyes,
In western soyle, Asopia that high.*

By order of this Oracle, he one night passed over to SALAMINA, and did Sacrifice to Periphrasus, and to Cicbris, demy-gods of the Countrey. Which done, the ATHENIANS delivered him five hundred men, who willingly offered themselves: and the City made an accord with them, that if they tooke the Isle of SALAMINA, they should beare greatest Authority in the Common-weale. Solon imbarke his Souldiers into divers Fisher-boats, and appointed a Galliot of thirty Ores to come after him, and he anchored hard by the City of SALAMINA, under the point which looketh towards the Isle of NEGREPONT. The MEGARIANS which were within SALAMINA, having by chance heard some inkling of it, but yet knew nothing of certainty, ranne presently in hurly burly to arme them, and manned out a Ship to descry what it was. But they fondly coming within danger, were taken by Solon, who clapped the MEGARIANS under hatches fast bound, and in their roomes

put aboard in their Ship the choicest Souldiers he had of the ATHENIANS, commanding them to let their course direct upon the City, and to keepe themselves as close out of sight as could be. And he himselfe with all the rest of his Souldiers landed presently, and marched to encounter with the MEGARIANS, which were come out into the Field. Now whilst they were fighting together, Solons men whom he had sent in the MEGARIANS Ship, entred the Haven and wanne the Towne. This is certainly true, and testified by that which is shewed yet at this day. For to keepe a memoriall hereof, a Ship of ATHENS arriveth quietly at the first, and by and by those that are in the Shippe make a great shout, and a man armed leaping out of the Shippe, runneth shouting towards the Rocks called Sciradion, which is as they come from the firme Land: and hard by the same is the Temple of Mars, which Solon built there after he had overcome the MEGARIANS in battell, from whence he sent backe againe those Prisoners that he had taken (which were saved from the slaughter of the Battell) without any ranfome paying. Neverthelesse, the MEGARIANS were sharply bent still to recover SALAMINA againe. Much hurt being done and suffered on both sides: both parts in the end made the LACEDÆMONIANS judges of the quarrell. But upon judgement given, common report is, that Homers Authority did Solon good service, because he did adde these Verses to the number of Ships, which are in the Iliads of Homer, which he rehearsed before the Judges, as if they had beene indeede written by Homer:

*Ajax that Champion stout, did leade With him in charge, Twelve Ships from Salamina soyle, which he had left at large,
And even these self-same Ships, in battell did he cast,
And place in order for to fight, With Enemies force at last,
In that same very place, Whereas it seemed then,
The Captains which from Athens came, imbattell'd had their men.*

Howbeit the ATHENIANS selves thinke, it was but a tale of pleasure: and say that Solon made it appeare to the Judges, that Phileus, and Euryfides (both Ajax Sons) were made free Denizens of ATHENS. Whereupon they gave the Isle of SALAMINA unto the ATHENIANS, and one of them came to dwell in a place called Brauron, in the Countrey of ATTICA: and the other in a Towne called MILETUM. And for due prooffe thereof, they say there is yet a certaine Canton or Quarter of the Countrey of ATTICA, which is called the Canton of the Phileides, after the name of this Phileus, where Pythistratus was borne. And it is said moreover, that Solon (because he would thoroughly convince the MEGARIANS) did alledge that the SALAMINIANS buried not the dead after the MEGARIANS manner, but after the ATHENIANS manner. For in MEGARA they bury the dead with their faces to the East: and in ATHENS their faces are towards the West. Yet Hereas the Megarian denyeth it, saying, that the MEGARIANS did bury them also with their faces towards the West: alledging moreover, that at ATHENS every Corse had his owne Beere or Coffin by it selfe, and that at MEGARA they did put three or foure Corses together. They say also there were certaine Oracles of Apollo Pythias, which did greatly helpe Solon, by which the god called SALAMINA, JONIA. Their strife was judged by five Arbitrators, all SPARTANS borne: that is to say, Critolaidas, Amompharetus, Hypsechidas, Anaxilus, and Cleomeneus. Solon undoubtedly wonne great glory and honour by this Exploit, yet was he much more honoured and esteemed, for the Oracion he made in defence of the Temple of Apollo, in the City of DELPHES: declaring that it was not meete to be suffered, that the CYRRHÆIANS, should at their pleasure abuse the Sanctuary of the Oracle, and that they should ayde the DELPHIANS in honour and reverence of Apollo. Whereupon the Councell of the Amphictyons, being moved with his words and perswasions, proclaimed Warres against the CYRRHÆIANS, as divers others do witness, and especially Aristotle, in the Story he wrote of those that wanne the Pythian Games, where he ascribeth unto Solon the honour of that determination. Neverthelesse Hermippus saith, Solon was not made Generall of their Army, as Euanthes Samian hath written. For Æschines the Orator wrote no such thing of him: and in the Chronicles of the DELPHIANS they finde, that one Alcmeon, and not Solon, was the Generall of the ATHENIANS. Now the City of ATHENS had a long time bene vexed and troubled through Cylon his heinous offence, ever since the yeare that Megacles (Governour of the City of ATHENS) did with faire words handle so the Confederates of the Rebellion of Cylon, which had taken Sanctuary within the liberties of the Temple of Minerva: that he perswaded them to be wife, and to present themselves before the Judges, holding by a threed, which they should tye about the Base of the Image of the goddesse where she stood, because they should not lose their liberty. But when they were come to the place of the honourable goddesse so called, (which be the Images of the Furies) coming downe to present themselves before the Judges, the threed brake of it selfe. Then Megacles, and other Officers his Companions, laid hold on them presently, saying, that it was a manifest signe that the goddesse Minerva refused to save them. So those they tooke, and all they could lay hands on were immediately stoned to death without the City: the rest which tooke the Altars of refuge, were slaine there also. And none were saved, but such as had made meanes to the Governours Wives of the City, to intreate for them: which from that time forth were ever hated of the people, and commonly called the abjects and excommunicates. Who being the Issues of the Rebels that rose with Cylon, chanced to rise againe in credit, and growing to great Authority, they never left quarrelling and fighting continually with the off-spring of Megacles. These factions were greatest and highest in Solons time: who being of Authority, and seeing the People thus divided in two parts, he stepped in betweene them, with the chieft men of ATHENS, and did so perswade and intreate those whom they called the abjects and excommunicates, that that they were contented to be judged. So three hundred of the chieftest Citizens were chosen Judges to heare this matter. The accuser was Myron Phlyeion. This matter was heard and pleaded, and by sentence of the Judges, the excommunicates were condemned. Those that were alive, to perpetuall exile: and the bones of them that were dead, to be digged up, and throwne out of the Confinnes of the Territory of ATHENS. But whilst the City of ATHENS was occupied with these uprores, the MEGARIANS wisely caught hold of the occasion delivered, and set upon the ATHENIANS, tooke from them the Haven of NISÆA, and recovered againe out of their hands the Isle of SALAMINA. Furthermore, all the City was possessed with a certaine superstitious feare: for some said, that Spirits were come againe, and strange sights were seene. The Prognosticators also said, they perceived by their Sacrifices the City was defiled with some abominable and wicked things, which were of necessity to be purged and throwne out. Hereupon they sent into CRETA for Epimenides Phæstian, whom they reckoned the seventh of the wise men, at the least such as will not allow Periander for one of the number. He was a holy and devoute man, and very wise in celestiall things, by inspiration from above: by reason whereof, men of his time called him the new Curetes, that is to say, Prophet: and he was thought the Sonne of a Nymph called Balte. When he was come to ATHENS, and growne in friendship with Solon, he did helpe him much, and made his way for establishing of his Lawes. For he acquainted the ATHENIANS to make their Sacrifices much lighter, and of lesse cost: and brought the Citizens to be more moderate in their mourning, with cutting off certaine severe and barbarous Ceremonies, which the most part of Women observed in their mourning: and he ordained certaine Sacrifices which he would have done immediately after the Obsequies of the dead. But that which exceeded all the rest, was, that by using the Citizens unto holinesse and devotion, daily Sacrifices, Prayers unto the gods, purging of themselves, and humble Offerings: he wanne mens hearts by little and little, to yeeld them more conformable to Justice, and to be more inclined to concord and unity. It is reported also that Epimenides when he saw the Haven of Munychia, and had long considered of it: told those about him, that men were very blinde in foreseeing things to come. For if the ATHENIANS (said he) knew what hurt this Haven would bring them, they would eate it (as they say) with their teeth. It is said also that Thales did prognosticate such a like thing, who after his death commanded they should bury his body in some vile place, of no reckoning, within the Territory of the MILESIANS, saying, that one day there should be the place of a City. Epimenides therefore being marvellously esteemed of every man for these causes, was greatly honoured of the ATHENIANS, and they offered him great Presents of Money and other things, but he would take nothing, and onely prayed them to give him a bough of the holy Olive: which they granted him, and so he returned shortly home into CRETA. Now that this sedition of Cylon was utterly appeased in ATHENS, for that the Excommunicates were banished the Countrey, the City fell againe into their old troubles and dissensions about the Government of the Common-weale: and they were divided into so divers parts and factions, as there were people of sundry places and Territories within the Countrey of ATTICA. For there were the people of the Mountaines, and the people of the Valleys, and the people of the Sea Coast. Those of the Mountaines tooke the common peoples part for their lives. Those of the Valley, would a few of the best Citizens should carry the sway. The Coast-men would that neither of them should prevaile, because they would have had a meane Government, and mingled of them both. Furthermore, the Faction betwene the poore and rich, proceeding of their inequality, was at that time very great. By reason whereof the City was in great danger, and it seemed there was no way to pacifie or take up these controversies, unlesse some Tyrant happened to rise, that would take upon him to rule the whole. For all the common people were so fore indebted to the rich, that either they ploughed their Lands, and yeilded them the sixth part of their Crop: (for which cause they were called Hectemorii and Servants) or else they borrowed Money of them at usury, upon gage of their bodies to serve it out. And if they were not able to pay them, then were they by the Law delivered to their Creditors, who kept them as Bond-men and Slaves in their houses, or else they sent them into strange Countreys to be sold: and many even for very poverty were forced to sell their owne Children (for there was no Law to forbid the contrary) or else to forsake their City and Countrey, for the extreme cruelty and hard dealing of these abominable Usurers their Creditors. Insomuch that many of the lustiest and stoutest of them, banded together in companies, and encouraged one another, not to suffer and beare any longer such extremity, but to choose them a stout and trusty Capitaine, that might set them at liberty, and redeeme those out of captivity, which were judged to be Bond-men and Servants, for lack of paying of their debts at their dayes appointed: and so to make againe a new division of all Lands and Tenements, and wholly to change and turne up the whole State and Government. Then the wisest men of the City, who saw Solon onely neither partner with the rich in their oppression, neither partaker with the poore in their necessity, made suite to him, that it would please him to take the matter in hand, and to appease and pacifie all these broyles and sedition. Yet Phanias Lesbian writeth, that he used a subtilty, whereby he deceived both the one and the other side, concerning the Common-weale. For he secretly promised the poore to divide the Lands againe: and the rich also, to confirme their Covenants and Bargaines. Howsoever it fell out, it is very certaine that Solon from the beginning made it a great matter, and was very scrupulous to deale betweene them: fearing the covetousnesse of the one, and arrogancy of the other. Howbeit in the end he was chosen Governour after Philombrotus, and was made reformer of the rigour of the Lawes, and the temperer of the State and Common-weale, by consent and agreement of both parties. The rich accepted him, because he was no begger: the poore did also like him, because he was an honest man. They say say moreover, that one word and sentence which he spake, (which at that present was rife in every mans mouth) that equality did breede no strife, did as well please the rich and wealthy, as the poore and needy. For the one fort conceived of this word Equality, that he would measure all things according to the quality of the man: and the other tooke it for their purpose, that he would measure all things by the number, and by the polle onely. Thus the Captaines of both Factions perswaded and prayed him, boldly to take upon him that Sovereigne Authority, fithens he had the whole City now at his commandment. The Neuters also of every part, when they saw it very hard to pacifie these things with Law and Reason, were well content that the wisest, and honestest man, should alone have the Royall Power in his hands. Some say also that there was such an Oracle of Apollo:

*Sit thou at helme, as Governour to steere,
To guide our course, and rule the rowling Ship:
For thou shalt see, full many Athenians there, Will take thy part, and after thee will trip.*

Solon refused to be a tyrant.

Timondas and Pittacus tyrants. Solons answer for tyranny.

But his familiar friends above all rebuked him, saying he was to be accounted no better then a beast, if for feare of the name of Tyrant, he would refuse to take upon him a Kingdome: which is the most iust and honourable state, if one take it upon him that is an honest man. As in old time, Timondas made himselfe King of those of NEGREPONT, with their consent: and as Pittacus was then presently of those of METELIN. Notwithstanding, all these goodly reasons could not make him once alter his opinion. And they say that he answered his friends, that Principality and Tyranny, was indeed a goodly place: howbeit there was no way for a man to get out, when he was once entred into it. And in certaine Verses that he wrote to Phocus, thus he said:

*I neither blush, nor yet repent my selfe,
That have preserv'd my native soyle alwaies,
And that therein (to boord up trash and pelfe)
No Tyrants thought could once eclipse my praise.
No might could move my minde to any wrong,
Which might be blot the glory of my name:
For so I thought, to live in honour long,
And farre excell all other men of fame.*

Hereby appeareth plainly, that even before he was chosen reformer of the State, to stablish new Lawes, he was then of great countenance and Authority. But he himselfe writeth, that many said of him thus, after he had refused the occasion of usurping of this tyranny:

*Sure Solon was a foole, and of a basifull minde,
That would refuse the great good hap, which gods to him assign'd.
The prey was in his hands, yet durst he never draw
The net therefore: but stood abasht, and like a dastard daw.
For had not that so beene, he would (for one dayes raigne, To be a King in Athens Towne) himselfe (all quicke) have staine.
And eke subverted quite his Family withall, So sweete it is to rule the royl, yclad in Princely pall.*

Thus brought the common rumour to taber on his head. Now, notwithstanding he had refused the Kingdome, yet he waxed nothing the more remisse nor soft therefore in governing, neither would he bow for feare of the great, nor yet would frame his Lawes to their liking that had chosen him their reformer. For where the mischief was tolerable, he did not straight plucke it up by the rootes: neither did he so change the State, as he might have done, left if he should have attempted to turne upside downe the whole Governement, he might afterwards have beene never able to settle and stablish the same againe. Therefore he onely altered that, which he thought by reason he would perswade his Citizens unto, or else by force he ought to compell them to accept, mingling as he said, foure with fixete, and force with justice. And herewith agreeth his Answer that he made afterwards unto one that asked him, if he had made the best Lawes he could for the ATHENIANS? Yea sure, saith he, such as they were to conceive. And this that followeth also, they have ever since observed in the Athenian Tongue: to make certaine things pleasant, that be hatefull, finely conveying them under colour of pleasing names. As calling Whores, Lemans: Taxes, Contributions: Garrisons, Guards: Prisons, Houses. And all this came up first by Solons invention, who called clearing of debts, Seisachtheian: in English, discharge. For the first change and reformation he made in Government was this: he ordained that all manner of debts past should be cleare, and nobody should aske his debtor any thing for the time past. That no man should thenceforth lend Money out to usury, upon Covenants for the body to be bound, if it were not repayed. Howbeit some write (as Androtion among other) that the poore were contented that the interest onely for usury should be moderated, without taking away the whole debt: and that Solon called this easie and gentle discharge, Seisachtheian, with crying up the value of money. For he raised the pound of silver, being before but threecore and threene Drachmes, full upon an hundred: so they which were to pay great summes of Money, payed by tale as much as they ought, but with lesse number of pieces then the Debt could have beene payed when it was borrowed. And so the Debtors gained much, and the Creditors lost nothing. Neverthelesse the greater part of them which have written the same, say, that this crying up of the Money, was a generall discharge of all Debts, Conditions and Covenants upon the same: whereto the very Poems themselves, which Solon wrote, do seeme to agree. For he glorrieth, and breaketh forth in his Verses, that he had taken away all bawkes and marks that separated mens Lands through the Countrey of ATTICA: and that now he had set at liberty, that which before was in bondage. And that of the Citizens of ATHENS, which for lack of payment of their debts had beene condemned for Slaves to their Creditors, he had brought many home againe out of strange Countries, where they had beene so long, that they had forgotten to speake their naturall Tongue: and other which remained at home in captivity, he had now set them all at good liberty. But while he was in doing this, men say a thing thwarted him, that troubled him marvellously. For having framed an Edict for clearing all debts, and lacking onely a little to grace it with words, and to give it some pretty Preface, that otherwise was ready to be proclaimed: he opened himself somewhat to certaine of his familiars whom he trusted (as Conon, Clinias, and Hipponicus) and told them how he would not meddle with Lands and Possessions, but would onely cleare and cut off all manner of debts. These men before the Proclamation came out, went presently to the Money-men, and borrowed great fums of Money of them, and laid it out straight upon Land. So when the Proclamation came out, they kept the Lands they had purchased, but restored not the Money they had borrowed. This foule part of theirs made Solon very ill spoken of, and wrongfully blamed: as if he had not onely suffered it, but had beene partaker of this wrong and injustice. Notwithstanding he cleared himself of this slanderous report, losing five Talents by his owne Law. For it was well known that so much was due unto him, and he was the first that following his owne Proclamation, did clearly release his debtors of the same. Other say he was owing fifteene Talents, and among the same, Polyzelus the Rhodian is one that affirmeth it. Notwithstanding they ever after called Solons friends, Graecopides, cutters of debts. This Law neither liked the one nor the other sort. For it greatly offended the rich for cancelling their bonds: and it much more misliked the poore, because all Lands and Possessions they gaped for, were not made againe common, and every body alike rich and wealthy, as Lycurgus had made the LACEDAMONIANS. But Lycurgus was the eleventh descended of the right Line from Hercules, and had many yeares beene King of LACEDAMON, where he had gotten great authority, and made himself many friends: all which things together, did greatly help him to execute that, which he wisely had imagined for the order of the Common-weale. Yet also, he used more perswasion then force, a good witnesse thereof the losse of his eye: preferring a Law before his private injury, which hath power to preserve a City long in union and concord, and to make Citizens to be neither poore nor rich. Solon could not attaine to this, for he was borne in a popular state, and a man but of meane wealth: Howbeit he did what he could poffible, with the power he had, as one seeking to win no credit with his Citizens, but onely by his counsell. Now, that he got the ill will of the greater part of the City, by his Proclamation which he made, he himselfe doth witnesse it, saying:

*Even those which earst, did beare me friendly face,
And spake full faire, wherever I them met:
Can now begin, to looke full grim of grace,
And were (like foes) in force against me set.
As if I had done them some spight or scorne, Or open wrong, which were not to be borne.*

Neverthelesse he saith immediately after, that with the same Authority and Power he had, a man possibly

Could not controll the Peoples mindes: Nor still their braines, which wrought like windes.

But shortly after, having a feeling of the benefit of this Ordinance, and every one forgetting his private quarrell: they all together made a common Sacrifice, which they called the Sacrifice of Seisachtheia, or discharge, and chose Solon generall reformer of the Law, and of the whole state of the Common-weale, without limiting his power, but referred all matters indifferently to his will: as the Office of State, common Assemblies, voices in Election, Judgements in Justice, and the Body of the Senate. And they gave him also full power and authority, to lesse and taxe any of them, to appoint the number, what time the Sesse should continue, and to keepe, confirme, and disannull at his pleasure, any of the ancient Lawes and Customes then in being. To begin withall, he first tooke away all Dracoms bloody Lawes, saving for murder, and man-slaughter, which were too severe and cruell. For almost he did ordaine but one kinde of punishment for all kinde of faults and offences, which was death. So that they which were condemned for idleness, were judged to dye. And petty larceny, as robbing mens Hortyards and Gardens of Fruit, or Herbes, was as severely punished, as those who had committed Sacrilege or murder. Demades therefore encountered it pleasantly, when he said: that Dracoms Laws were not written with inke, but with bloud. And Draco himself being asked one day, why his punishments were so unequal, as death for all kinds of faults, he answered: Because he thought the least offence worthy so much punishment: and for the greatest, he found none more grievous. Then Solon being desirous to have the chief Offices of the City to remaine in rich mens hands, as already they did, and yet to mingle the authority of Government in such sort, as the meaner people might beare a little sway, which they never could before: he made an estimate of the Goods of every private Citizen. And those which he found yearly worth 500 bushells of Corn, and other liquid fruits and upwards, he called Pentacostomedimes: as to say, five hundred bushell men of revenue. And those that had 300 bushells a yeare, and were able to keepe a horse of service, he put in the second degree, and called them Knights. They that might dispend but two hundred bushells a yeare, were put in the third place; and and called Zengites. All other under those, were called Thetes, as ye would say, Hirelings, or Craftsmen living of their labour : who he did not admit to beare any Office in the City, neither were they taken as free Citizens; saving they had voices in elections, and Assemblies of the City, and in Judgements, where the People wholly judged. This at the first seemed nothing, but afterwards they felt it was to great purpose, for hereby the most part of private quarrels and strife that grew among them, were in the end laid open before the People. For he suffered those to appeale unto the People, which thought they had wrong judgement in their causes. Furthermore, because his Lawes were written somewhat obscurely, and might be diversly taken and interpreted, this did give a great deale more authority and power to the Judges. For, considering all their controversies could not be ended and judged by expresse Law, they were driven of necessity always to run to the Judges, and debated their matters before them. Infomuch as the Judges by this meane came to be somewhat above the Law : for they did even expound it as they would themselves. Solons selfe doth note this equall division of the publick Authority, in a place of his Poemes, where he saith :

*Such power have I given, to common Peoples hand, As might become their meane estate, With equity to stand :
And as I have not pluckt, from them their dignity, So have I not too much increas'd their small authority.
Unto the rich likewise, I have allowed no more,
Then Well might seeme (in just conceit) sufficient for their store.
And so I have for both provided in such wise,
That neither shall each other Wrong, nor seeme for to despise.*

Yet considering it was meete to provide for the poverty of the common sort of people, he suffered any man that would, to take upon him the defence of any poore mans case that had the wrong. For if a man were hurt, beaten, forced, or otherwise wronged, any other man that would might lawfully sue the offender, and prosecute Law against him. And this was a wife Law ordained of him, to custome his Citizens to be sorry for anothers hurt, and so to feele it, as if any part of his owne body had been injured. And they say he made an answer on a time agreeable to this Law. For, being asked what City he thought best governed, he answered : That City where such as receive no wrong, do as earnestly defend wrong offered to other, as the very wrong and injury had beene done unto themselves. He erected also the Councell of the Areopagites, of those Magistrates of the City, out of which they did yearly chuse their Governour : and he himselfe had beene of that number, for that he had beene Governour for a year. Wherefore perceiving now the People were growne to a stomack and haughtinesse of minde because they were cleare discharged of their debts, he set up for matters of State, another Councell of an hundred, chosen out of every Tribe, whereof foure hundred of them were to consult and debate of all matters, before they were propounded to the People : that when the great Councell of the People at large should be assembled, no matter should be put forth, unlesse it had beene before well considered of, and digested, by the Councell of the foure hundred. Moreover, he ordained the higher Court should have the chiefe authority and power over all things, and chiefly to see the Law executed and maintained : supposing that the Common-weale being seled, and stayed with these two Courts (as with two strong Anker-holds) it should be the lesse turmoiled and troubled, and the People also better pacified and quiered. The most part of Writers hold this opinion, that it was Solon which erected the Councell of the Areopagites, as we have said, and it is very likely to be true, for that Dracon in all his Lawes and Ordinances made no manner of mention of the Areopagites, but alwaies speaketh to the Ephetes (which were Judges of life and death) when he spake of murder, or of any mans death. Notwithstanding, the eighth Law of the thirteenth Table of Solon saith thus, in these very words : All such as have beene banished or detected of naughty life, before Solon made his Lawes, shall be restored againe to their Goods and good name, except those which were condemned by order of the Councell of the Areopagites, or by the Ephetes, or by the Kings in open Court, for murder, and death of any man, or for aspiring to usurpe tyranny. These words to the contrary seeme to prove and testifie, that the Councell of the Areopagites was, before Solon was chosen reformer of the Lawes. For how could offenders and wicked men be condemned, by order of the Councell of the Areopagites before Solon, if Solon was the first that gave it authority to judge? unlesse a man will say peradventure, that he would a little helpe the matter of his Lawes which were obscure and darke, and would supply that they lacked, with expounding of the same by them. Those which shall be found attainted and convicted of any matter, that hath beene heard before the Councell of the Areopagites, the Ephetes, or the Governours of the City, when this Law shall come forth, shall stand condemned still; and all other shall be pardoned, restored and set at liberty. Howsoever it is, sure that was his intent and meaning. Furthermore among the rest of his Lawes, one of them indeed was of his owne device : for the like was never stablished elsewhere. And it is that Law, that pronounceth him defamed, and unhoneft, who in a civill uprore among the Citizens, sitteth still a looker on, and a neuter, and taketh part with neither side. Whereby his minde was, as it should appeare, that private men should not be onely carefull to put themselves and their causes in safety, nor yet should be carelesse for other mens matters, or thinke it a vertue not to meddle with the miseries and misfortunes of their Countrey, but from the beginning of every sedition that they should joine with those that take the justest cause in hand, and rather to hazard themselves with such, then to tarry looking (without putting themselves in danger) which of the two should have the victory. There is another Law also, which at the first sight methinketh is very unhoneft and fond : That if any man according to the Law hath matched with a rich Heire and Inheritor, and of himselfe is impotent, and unable to do the Office of a Husband, she may lawfully lye with any whom she liketh, of her Husbands nearest Kinfmen. Howbeit some affirme, that it is a wife made Law for those, which knowing themselves unmeete to entertaine Wedlock, will for covetousnesse of Lands, marry with rich Heires and Possessioners, and minde to abuse poore Gentlewomen under the colour of Law : and will thinke to force and restraine Nature. For, seeing the Law suffereth an Inheritor or Possessioner thus ill bestowed, at her pleasure to be bold with any of her Husbands Kin, men will either leave to purchase such Marriages, or if they be so carelesse that they will needs marry, it shall be to their extreme shame and ignominy, and so shall they deservedly pay for their greedy covetousnesse. And the Law is made well also, because the Wife hath not scope to all her Husbands Kinfmen, but unto one choise man whom she liketh best of his Houfe : to the end that the Children that shall be borne, shall be at the least of her Husbands bloud and kinned. This also confirmeth the same, that such a new married Wife should be shut up with her Husband, and eate a Quince with him : and that he also which marieth such an Inheritor, should of duty see her thrice a Moneth at the least. For although he get no Children of her, yet it is an honour the Husband doth to his Wife, arguing that he taketh her for an honest Woman, that he loveth her, and that he esteemeth of her. Besides, it taketh away many milkinges and displeasures which oftentimes happen in such cases, and keepeth love and good will waking, that it die not utterly betweene them. Furthermore, he tooke away all Joynters and Dowries in other Marriages, and willed that the Wives should bring their Husbands but three Gowns onely, with some other little Moveables of small value, and without any other thing as it were : utterly forbidding that they should buy their Husbands, or that they should make Merchandize of Marriages, as of other Trades to gaine, but would that Man and Woman should marry together for Issue, for pleasure, and for love, but in no case for money. And for prooffe hereof, Dionysius the Tyrant of SICILIE, one day answered his Mother (which would needes be married to a young man of SYRACUSA) in this sort : I have power (saith he) to breake the Lawes of SYRACUSA, by having the Kingdome : but to force the Law of Nature, or to make Marriage without the reasonable compasse of age, that passeth my reach and Power. So it is not tolerable, and much lesse allowable also, that such disorder should be in well ordered Cities, that such uncomely and unfit Marriages should be made, betweene couples of unequall yeares : considering there is no meete nor necessary end of such Matches. A wife Governour of a City, or a Judge and reformer of Lawes and manners, might well say to an old Man that should marry with a young Maide, as the Poet saith of Philotes :

At these young yeares, for to be married now?*

And finding a young man in an old rich womans house, getting his living by riding of her errands, and waxing fat, as they say the Partridge doth, by treading of the Hens : he may take him from thence, to bestow him on some young Maide that shall have need of a husband. And thus much for this matter. But they greatly commend another Law of Solons, which forbiddeth to speake ill of the dead. For it is a good and godly thing to thinke; that they ought not to touch the dead, no more than to touch holy things : and men should take great heed to offend those that are departed out of this World : besides, it is a token of wisdom and civility, to beware of immortall enemies. He commanded also in the self-same Law, that no man should speake ill of the living, specially in Churches, during Divine Service, or in Councell-chamber of the City, nor in the Theaters whilst Games were a playing : upon paine of three silver Drachmes to be payed to him that was injured, and two to the common Treasury. For he thought it too much shamelesse boldnesse, in no place to keepe in ones choler; and moreover, that such lacked civility and good manners : and yet altogether to suppress and smother it, he knew it was not onely a hard matter, but to some natures impossible. And he that maketh Lawes, must have regard to the common possibility of men, if he will punish little, with profitable example, and not much without some profit. So was he marvellously well thought of, for the Law that he made touching Wills and Testaments. For before, men might not lawfully make their Heires whom they would, but the Goods came to the Children or Kinned of the Testator. But he leaving it at liberty, to dispose their Goods where they thought good, so they had no Children of their owne : did therein prefer friendship before kinned, and good will and favour before necessity and constraint, and so made every one Lord and Master of his owne Goods. Yet he did not simply and alike allow of all sorts of gifts, howsoever they were made, but those onely which were made by men of sound memory, or by those whose wits failed them not by extreme sicknesse, or through Drunkenes, medicines, Poysonings, charms, or other such violence and extraordinary meanes, neither yet through the inticements and perswasions of women. As thinking very wisely, there was no difference at all betweene those that were evidently forced by constraint, and those that were compassed and wrought by subornation at length to do a thing against their will, taking fraud in this case equall with violence; and pleasure with sorrow, as passions with madnesse, which commonly have as much force the one as the other, to draw and drive men from reason. He made another Law also, in which he appointed women their times to go abroad into the fields, their mourning, their Feasts and Sacrifices, plucking from them all disorder and wilfull liberty, which they used before. For he did forbid that they should carry out of the City with them above three Gownes, and to take Victuals with them above the value of an halfe penny, neither Basket nor Pannier above a cubite high : and specially he did forbid them to go in the night, other then in their Coach, and that a Torch should be carried before them.

He did forbid them also at the Buriall of the dead, to teare and spoile themselves with blows, to make lamentations in Verfes, to weepe at the Funerals of a stranger not being their kinsman, to sacrifice an Oxe on the grave of the dead, to bury above three Gownes with the Corfe, to go to other mens Graves, but at the very time of burying the Corfe: all which, or the most part of them, are forbidden by our Lawes this day. Moreover, those Lawes appoint a penalty upon such women as offend in the fame, to be distrained for, by certaine Officers expressly named, to comptroll and reform the abuses of women, as womanish persons and faint-hearted, which suffer themselves to be overcome with such passions and fondnesse in their mourning. And perceiving that the City of ATHENS began to replenish daily more and more, by mens repairing thither from all parts, and by reason of the great assured safety and liberty that they found there: and also considering how the greatest part of the Realme became in manner Heathy, and was very barren, and that men traffiquing the Seas, are not wont to bring any Merchandize to those which can give them nothing againe in exchange: he began to practise that his Citizens should give themselves unto Crafts and Occupations, and made a Law, that the Sonne should not be bound to relieve his Father being old, unlesse he had set him in his youth to some Occupation. It was a wise part of Lycurgus (who dwelt in a City where was no resort of strangers, and had so great a Territory, as could have furnished twice as many people, as Euripides saith, and moreover on all sides was environed with a great number of Slaves of the Ionians, whom it was needfull to keepe still in labour and worke continually) to have his Citizens always occupied in exercises of feates of Armes, without making them to learne any other Science, but discharged them of all other miserable Occupations and handy-Crafts. But Solon framing his Lawes unto things, and not things unto Lawes, when he saw the Countrey of ATTICA so leane and barren, that it could hardly bring forth to sustaine those that tilled the ground onely, and therefore much more impossible to keepe so great a multitude of idle people as were in ATHENS: thought it very requisite to set up Occupations, and to give them countenance and estimation. Therefore he ordained, that the Councill of the Areopagites, should have full Power and Authority to enquire how every man lived in the City, and also to punish such as they found idle People, and did not labour. But this was thought too severe and straight a Law which he ordained, (as Heraclides Ponticus writeth) that the Children borne of common Harlots and Strumpets should not be bound to relieve their Fathers. For he that maketh no account of Marrimony, plainly sheweth that he tooke not a Wife to have Children, but onely to satisfie his lust and pleasure: and so such a one hath his just reward, and is disappointed of the reverence that a Father ought to have of his Children, since through his owne fault the birth of his Childe falleth out to his reproach. Yet to say truly, in Solons Lawes touching Women, there are many absurdities, as they fall out ill favouredly. For he maketh it lawful for any man to kill an Adulterer taking him with the Fact. But he that ravisheth or forcibly taketh away a free Woman, is onely condemned to pay a hundred Silver Drachmes. And he that was the Pandor to procure her, should onely pay twenty Drachmes; unlesse he had bene a common Strumpet or Curtizan: for such do justifie open access to all that will hire them. Furthermore, he doth forbid any person to sell his Daughters or Sisters, unlesse the Father or Brother had taken them abusing themselves before Marriage. Methinketh it is farre from purpose and reason, with severity to punish a thing in one place, and over-lightly to passe it over in another: or to set some light Fine on ones head for a great fault, and after to discharge him, as it were, but a matter of sport. Unlesse they will excuse it thus, that money being very hard and scant at that time in ATHENS, those Fines were then very great and grievous to pay. For in setting out the charges of Offerings which should be made in Sacrifices, he appointed a Weather to be a convenient Offering, and he setteth a bushell of Corne at a Silver Drachme. More he ordained, that they which wonne any of the Games at ATHENS, should pay to the common Treasury an hundred Drachmes. And those that wonne any of the Games Olympicall, five hundred Drachmes. Also he appointed that he which brought a he-Woolfe, should have five Drachmes, and him one Drachme for a reward of a she-Woolfe. Whereof as Demetrius Valerian writeth, the one was the price of an Oxe, and the other of a Mutton. For, touching the rates he ordained in the sixteenth Table of his Lawes meete for burnt Sacrifices, it is likely he did rate them at a much higher price, then ordinarily they were worth: and yet notwithstanding, the price which he setteth, is very little in comparisn of that which they are worth at this day. Now it was a custome ever amongst the ATHENIANS to kill their Woolves, because all their Countrey lay for Pasture, and not for Tillage. Some there be that say, the Tribes of the People of ATHENS have not bene called after the names of the children of Ion, as the common opinion hath bene: but that they were called after their divers Trades and manners of living, which they tooke themselves unto from the beginning. For, such as gave themselves unto the Warres, were called Opilites: as who would say, men of Armes. Those that wrought in their Occupations, were called Ergades: as much to say, as men of Occupation. The other two which were Husbandmen, and followed the Plough, were called Telecontes: as you would say, labouring men. And those that kept Beasts and Cattell, were called Egicoves: as much to say, as Heardmen. Now, forasmuch as the whole Province of ATTICA was very dry, and had great lack of water, being not full of Rivers, running Streames, nor Lakes, nor yet stored with any great number of Springs, inasmuch as they are driven there to use (through the most part of the Countrey) Water drawne out of Wells made with mens hands: he made such an order, that where there was any Well within the space of an Hippicon, that every body within that Circuit, might come and draw Water onely at that Well, for his use and necessity. Hippicon is the distance of foure furlongs, which is half a mile: and

and those that dwell further off, should go seeke their water in other places where they would. But if they had digged ten yards deepe in the ground, and could finde no water in the bottome, in this case, they might lawfully go to their next neighbours Well, and take a pot full of Water containing six gallons, twice a day: judging it great reason that necessity should be holpen, but not that idleness should be cherished. He appointed also the spaces that should be kept and observed by those that would fet or plant Trees in their Ground, as being a man very skillfull in these matters. For he ordained, that whosoever would plant any kinde of Trees in his Ground, he should fet them five foote asunder one from another: but for the Fig-tree and Olive-tree specially, that they should in any case be nine foote asunder, because these two Trees do spread out their branches farre off, and they cannot stand neare other Trees but they must needs hurt them very much. For besides that they draw away the sap that doth nourish the other Trees, they cast also a certaine moisture and steame upon them, that is very hurtfull and incommodious. More he ordained, that whosoever would dig a pit or hole in his ground, should dig it as far off from his neighbours pit, as the pit he digged was in depth to the bottome. And he that would fet up a Hive of Bees in his Ground, he should fet them at the least three hundred foote from other Hives set about him before. And of the Fruits of the Earth, he was contented they should tranport and sell onely Oyle out of the Realme to strangers, but no other Fruite or Graine. He ordained that the Governour of the City should yearly proclaim open curses against those that should do to the contrary, or else he himselfe making default therein, should be fined at an hundred Drachmes. This Ordinance is in the first Table of Solons Lawes, and therefore we may not altogether discredit those which say, they did forbid in the old time, that men should carry Figs out of the Countrey of ATTICA, and that from thence it came that these pick-thanks, which bewray and accuse them that transported Figs, were called Sycophantes. He made another Law also against the hurt that Beasts might do unto men. Wherein he ordained, That if a Dog did bite any man, he that ought him should deliver to him that was bitten, his Dog tied to a log of Timber of foure cubits long: and this was a very good device, to make men safe from Dogs. But he was very straight in one Law he made, that no stranger might be made Denizon and Free-man of the City of ATHENS, unlesse he were a banished man for ever out of his Countrey, or else that he should come and dwell there with all his Family, to exercise some Craft or Science. Notwithstanding, they say he made not this Law so much to put strangers from their freedom there, as to draw them thither, assuring them by this Ordinance, they might come and be free of the City: and he thought moreover, that both the one and the other would be more faithfull to the Common-weale of ATHENS. The one of them, for that against their wills they were driven to forsake their Countrey: and the other sort, for that adviledly and willingly they were contented to forsake it. This also was another of Solons Lawes, which he ordained for those that should feast certaine daies at the Town-house of the City, at other mens cost. For he would not allow that one man should come often to Feasts there. And if any man were invited thither to the Feasts, and did refuse to come, he did set a Fine on his head, as reproving the miserable niggardinesse of the one, and the presumptuous arrogancy of the other, to contemne and despise common order. After he had made his Lawes, he did stablish them to continue for the space of an hundred yeares, and they were written in Tables of Wood called Axones, which were made more long then broad, in the which they were graven: whereof there remaine some Monuments yet in our time, which are to be seene in the Towne Hall of the City of ATHENS. Aristotle saith, that these Tables were called Cyrbes. And Crasinus also the Comical Poet saith in one place, of Solon and Dracon: that Cyrbes was a Vessell or Pan wherein they did fry miller or hirse. Howbeit others say, that Cyrbes properly were the Tables, which contained the Ordinances of the Sacrifices: and Axones were the other Tables, that concerned the Common-weale. So, all the Councels and Magistrates together did sweare, that they would keepe Solons Lawes themselves, and also cause them to be observed of others thoroughly and particularly. Then every one of the Thebomothetes (which were certaine Officers attendant on the Councill, and had speciall charge to see the Lawes observed) did solemnly sweare in the open Market place, near the stone where the Proclamations are proclaimed: and every of them both promised, and vowed openly to keep the same Lawes, and that if any of them did in any one point break the said Ordinances, then they were content that such offender should pay to the Temple of Apollo, at the City of DELPHES, an Image of fine gold, that should weigh as much as himself. Moreover, Solon seeing the disorder of the Moneths, and the moving of the Moone, which followed not the course of the Sun, and used not to rise and fall when the Sun doth, but oft times in one day it doth both touch and passe the Sun: he was the first that called the change of the Moone, Ene cai néas, as much to say, as old and new Moone. Allowing that which appeared before the conjunction, to be of the Moneth past: and that which shewed it selfe after the conjunction, to be of the Moneth following. And he was the first also (in my opinion) that understood Homer rightly, when he said: Then beginneth the Month when it endeth. The day following the change, he called Neomenia, as much to say, as the new Moneth, or the new Moone. After the twentieth day of the Moneth which they called Scada, he reckoned not the rest of the Moneth, as increasing, but as in the wane: and gathered it by seeing the light of the Moone decreasing, untill the thirtieth day. Now after his Lawes were come abroad, and proclaimed, there came some daily unto him, which either praised them, or misliked them, and prayed him either to take away, or to adde something unto them. Many againe came and asked him, how he understood some sentences of his Lawes: and requested him to declare his meaning, and that it should be taken. Wherefore considering that it were to no purpose to refuse to do it, and againe that it would get him much envie and ill will to yeeld thereunto: he determined (happen what would) to winde himselfe out of these briers, and to flye the groanings, complaints, and quarrels of his Citizens. For he faith himselfe:

So, to convey himselfe a while out of the way, he tooke upon him to be Master of a Ship in a certaine voyage, and asked license for ten yeares of the ATHENIANS to go beyond Sea, hoping by that time the ATHENIANS would be very well acquainted with his Lawes. So went he to the Seas, and the first place of his arrivall was in EGYPT, where he remained a while, as he himselfe faith.

Solons travell.

By Canope, falls into the Sea banks.*

He went to his booke there, and did confer a certaine time with Psenophis Heliopolitan, and Sonchis Saitan, two of the wisest Priests at that time that were in EGYPT: whom when he heard rehearse the Story of the Illes ATLANTIDES as Plato writeth, he proved to put the same into Verfe, and did send it abroad through GREECE. At his departure out of EGYPT, he went into CYPRUS, where he had great courtlesie and friendship of one of the Princes of that Country, called Philocyprus, who was Lord of a pretty little City which Demophon (Thefeus sonne) caused to be built upon the River of Clarie, and was of a goodly strong situation, but in a very leane and barren Countrey. Whereupon Solon told him, it would do better a great deale to remove it out of that place, into a very faire and pleasant Valley that lay underneath it, and there to make it larger and statelier then it was: which was done according to his perswasion. And Solons selfe being present at it, was made Overseer of the Buildings, which he did helpe to devise and order in good fors, as well in respect of pleasure, as for force and defence: inso much as many people came from other places to dwell there. And herein many other Lords of the Countrey did follow the example of this Philocyprus, who to honour Solon, called this City SOLES, which before was called ÆPIA. Solon in his Elegies maketh mention of this foundation, directing his words unto Philocyprus, as followeth:

Clarins.

Æpis called Soler.

*So grant the gods, that thou, and thine off-spring, May clime to great and passing Princely state:
Long time to live, in Soles flourishing.
And that they grant, my ship and me good gate,
When I from hence by Seas shall take my way:
That with her harpe, dame Venus do vouchsafe To waite me still, untill she may convey My selfe againe, into my Countrey safe.
Since I have bene, the onely meane and man, Which here to build, this City first began.*

And as for the meeting and talke betwixt him and King Cresus, I know there are that by distance of time will prove it but a fable, and devised of pleasure: but for my part I will not reject, nor condemne so famous an History, received and approved by so many grave testimonies. Moreover it is very agreeable to Solons manners and nature, and also not unlike to his wisdom and magnanimity: although in all points it agreeth not with certaine tales (which they call Chronicles) where they have busily noted the order and course of times, which even to this day, many have curiously sought to correct, and could yet never discusse it, nor accord all contrarieties and manifest repugnances in the same. Solon at the desire and request of Cresus, went to see him in the City of SARDIS. When Solon was come thither, he seemed to be in the self-same taking that a man was once reported to be: who being borne and bred upon the maine Land, and had never seene the Sea neither farre nor neare, did imagine every River that he saw had bene the Sea. So Solon passing alongit Cresus Palace, and meeting by the way many of the Lords of his Court richly apparelled, and carrying great traines of Serving-men, and Souldiers about them: thought ever that one of them had bene the King, untill he was brought unto Cresus selfe. Who was passing richly arrayed, what for precious Stones and Jewels, and for rich coloured Silkes, layed on with curious Goldsmiths worke, and all to shew himselfe to Solon in most stately, sumptuous, and magnificent manner. Who perceiving by Solons repaire to his presence, that he shewed no manner of signe, nor countenance of wondering, to see so great a state before him, neither had given out any word neare or likely to that which Cresus looked for in his owne imagination, but rather had delivered speeches for men of judgement and understanding to know, how inwardly he much did mislike Cresus foolish vanity and basemind: then Cresus commanded all his Treasuries to be opened, where his Gold and Silver lay: next, that they should shew him his rich and sumptuous Wardrobes, although they needed not: for to see Cresus selfe, it was enough to discerne his nature and condition. After he had seene all over and over, being brought againe unto the presence of the King: Cresus asked him, if ever he had seene any man more happy then himselfe was? Solon answered him, I have: and that was one Tellus a Citizen of ATHENS, who was a marvellous honest man, and had left his children behinde him in good estimation, and well to live: and lastly, was most happy at his death, by dying honourably in the field, in defence of his Countrey. Cresus hearing this answer, began to judge him a man of little wit, or of grosse understandings, because he did not thinke, that to have store of Gold and Silver, was the onely joy and felicity of the World, and that he would preferre the life and death of a meane and private man as more happy, then all the riches and power of so mighty a King. Notwithstanding all this, Cresus yet asked him againe: What other man beside Tellus he had seene happier then himselfe? Solon answered him, that he had seene Cleobis and Bison, which were both brethren, and loved one another singularly well, and their mother in such fort: that upon a solemne Festivall day, when she should go to the Temple of Juno in her Coach drawne with Oxen: because they tarried too long ere they could be brought, they both willingly yoked themselves by the necks, and drew their Mothers Coach instead of the Oxen, which marvellously joyced her, and she was thought most happy of all other, to have borne two such Sonnes. Afterwards when they had done Sacrifice to the goddesse, and made good cheare at the Feast of this Sacrifice, they went to bed: but they rose not againe the next morning, for they were found dead without suffering hurt or sorrow, after they had received so much glory and honour. Cresus then could no longer bide in his patience, but breaking out in choler, said unto him: Why, dost thou reckon me then in no degree of happy men? Solon would neither flatter him, nor further increase his heate, but answered him thus: O King of LYDIANS, the gods have given us GRECIANS all things in a meane, and amongst other things chiefly, a bafe and popular wisdom, not Princely nor noble: which considering how mans life is subject to infinite changes, doth forbid us to trust or glory in these worldly Riches. For time bringeth daily misfortunes unto man, which he never thought of, nor looked for. But when the gods have continued a mans good fortune to his end, then we thinke that man happy and blessed, and never before. Otherwise, if we should judge a man happy that liveth, considering he is ever in danger of change during life: we should be much like to him, who judgeth him the victory before hand, that is still a fighting, and may be overcome, having no surety yet to carry it away. After Solon had spoken these words, he departed from the Kings presence, and returned back againe, leaving King Cresus offended, but nothing the wiser, nor amended. Now Æsop that wrote the Fables, being at that time in the City of SARDIS, and sent for thither by the King, who entertained him very honourably: was very sorry to see that the King had given Solon no better entertainment: so by way of advice he said unto him: O Solon, either we must not come to Princes at all, or else we must seeke to please and content them. But Solon turning it to the contrary, answered him: Either we must not come to Princes, or else we must needs tell them truly, and counsell them for the best. So Cresus made light account of Solon at that time. But after he had lost the Battell against Cyrus, and that his City was taken, himselfe become Prisoner, and was bound fast to a Gibbet, over a great stacke of Woode, to be burnt in the sight of all the PERSIANS, and of Cyrus his Enemy: he then cried out as lowde as he could, thrice together: O Solon! Cyrus being abashed, sent to aske him, whether this Solon he onely cried upon in his extreme misery, was a god or man. Cresus kept it not secret from him, but said: he was one of the wise men of GREECE, whom I sent for to come unto me on a certaine time, not to learne any thing of him which I stood in need of, but onely that he might witness my felicity, which then I did enjoy: the losse whereof is now more hurtfull, then the enjoying of the fame was good or profitable. But now (alas) too late I know it, that the Riches I possessed then, were but words and opinion, all which are turned now to my bitter sorrow, and to present and remediable calamity. Which the wife GRECIAN considering then, and foreseeing afarre off by my doings at that time, the instant misery I suffer now: gave me warning I should marke the end of my life, and that I should not too farre presume of my selfe, as puffed up then with vaine glory of opinion of happinesse, the ground thereof being so slippery, and of so little surety. These words being reported unto Cyrus, who was wiser then Cresus, and seeing Solons saying confirmed by so notable an example: he did not onely deliver Cresus from present perill of death, but ever after honoured him so long as he lived. Thus had Solon glory, for saving the honour of one of these Kings, and the life of the other, by his grave and wise counsell. But during the time of his absence, great seditions rose at ATHENS amongst the Inhabitants, who had gotten then severall heads amongst them: as those of the Valley had made Lycurgus their head. The Coast-men, Megacles, the Sonne of Alcmeon. And those of the Mountaines, Pyssistratus: with whom all Artificers and Craft-men living of their handy-labour were joyned, which were the stoutest against the rich. So that notwithstanding the City kept Solons Lawes and Ordinances, yet was there not that man but gaped for a change, and desired to see things in another state: either parties hoping their condition would mende by change, and that every of them should be better then their Adversaries. The whole Common-weale broyling thus with troubles, Solon arrived at ATHENS, where every man did honour and reverence him: howbeit he was no more able to speake aloud in open Assembly to the People, nor to deale in matters as he had done before, because his age would not suffer him: and therefore he spake with every one of the heads of the severall Factions apart, trying if he could agree and reconcile them together again. Whereunto Pyssistratus seemed to be more willing then any of the rest, for he was courteous, and marvellously faire spoken, and shewed himselfe besides, very good and pitifull to the poore, and temperate also to his Enemies: further, if any good quality were lacking in him, he did so finely counterfeit it, that men imagined it was more in him, then in those that naturally had it in them indeed. As to be a quiet man, no medler, contented with his owne, aspiring no higher, and hating those which would attempt to change the present state of the Common-weale, and would practise any innovation. By this Art and fine manner of his, he deceived the poore common people. Howbeit Solon found him straight, and saw the marke he shot at: but yet hated him not at that time, and sought still to win him, and bring him to reason, saying oft times, both to himselfe and to others: That whoso could pluck out of his head the Worme of Ambition, by which he aspired to be the chieftest, and could heale him of his greedy desire to rule : there could not be a man of more vertue, or a better Citizen then he would prove. About this time began Thespis to set out his Tragedies, which was a thing that much delighted the People for the rareness thereof, being not many Poets yet in number, to strive one against another for victory, as afterwards there were. Solon being naturally desirous to heare and learne; and by reason of his age seeking to passe his time away in Sports, in Musick, and making good Cheare more then ever he did : went one day to see Thespis, who plaid a part himself, as the old fashion of the Poets was, and after the Play was ended, he called him to him, and asked him : if he were not ashamed to lye so openly in the face of the World. Thespis answered him, that it was not materiall to do or say any such things, considering all was but in sport. Then Solon beating the ground with his staffe he had in his hand : but if we commend lying in sport (quoth he) we shall finde it afterwards in good earnest, in all our bargaines and dealings. Shortly after Pyffistratus having wounded himself, and bloudied all his body over, caused his men to carry him in his Coach into the Market-place, where he put the People in an uprore, and told them that they were his Enemies that thus trayterously had handled and arrayed him, for that he stood with them about the governing of the Common-weale : insomuch as many of them were marvellously offended, and mutined by and by, crying out, it was shamefully done. Then Solon drawing neare, said unto him : O thou Sonne of Hippocrates, thou dost illfavouredly counterfeit the person of Homers Ulysses : for thou hast whipped thy selfe to deceive thy Citizens, as he did teare and scratch himselfe, to deceive his Enemies. Notwithstanding this, the common People were still in uprore, being ready to take Armes for Pyffistratus : and there was a generall Counsell assembled, in the which one Ariston spake, that they should grant fifty men, to carry Halbards and Mases before Pyffistratus for guard of his person. But Solon going up into the Pulpit for Orations, stoutly inveiged against it : and perswaded the People with many reasons, like unto these he wrote afterwards in Verse :

*Each one of you (O men) in private acts Can play the foxe, for slye and subtil craft :
But when you come, yf ore (in all your faults)
Then are you blinde, dull witted and bedast :
For pleasant speech and painted flattery, Beguile you still, the which you never spy.*

But in the end, seeing the poore people did tumult still, taking Pyffistratus part, and that the rich fled here and there, he went his way also, saying : he had shewed himself wiser then some, and harder then other. Meaning, wiser then those which saw not Pyffistratus reach and fetch : and harder then they which knew very well he did aspire to be King, and nevertheless durst not resist him. The People went on with the motion of Ariston, and authorized the same, touching the grant of Halbards : limiting no number, but suffered him to have about him, and to assemble as many as he would, untill such time as he had gotten possession of the Cattle. Then the City was marvellously affraid and amazed : and presently Alegacles, and all those which were of the House of the Alcmeonides did flie. Solon, who for yeares was now at his last cast, and had no man to stick unto him : went notwithstanding into the Market-place, and spake to the Citizens whom he found there, and rebuked their beastlinesse, and faint cowardly hearts, and encouraged them, not to lose their liberty. He spake at that time notably, and worthy memory, which ever after was remembered. Before, said he, you might more easily have staid this present tyranny : but now that it is already fashioned, you shall winne more glory, utterly to suppress it. But for all his goodly reasons, he found no man that would hearken unto him, they were all amazed. Wherefore he hid him home againe, and tooke his weapons out of his house, and laid them before his gate in the midst of the streete, saying : For my part, I have done what I can possible, to helpe and defend the Lawes and Liberties of my Countrey. So from that time he betooke himselfe unto his ease, and never after dealt any more in matters of State, or Common-weale. His friends did counsell him to flye : but all they could not perswade him to it. For he kept his house, and gave himselfe to make Verses : in which he fore reproved the

and constancy.

*If presently your burden heaue be : yet murmur not against the gods therefore.
The fault is yours, as you your selfe may see,
Which granted have of mighty Mars the lore to such as now, by your direction do hold your necks in this subjection.*

His friends hereupon did warne him, to beware of such speeches, and to take heed what he said : lest if it came unto the Tyrants eares, he might put him to death for it. And further, they asked him wherein he trusted, that he spake so boldly. He answered them ; in my age. Howbeit Pyffistratus after he had obtained his purpose, sending for him upon his word and faith, did honour and entertaine him so well, that Solon in the end became one of his Councell, and approved many things which he did. For Pyffistratus himselfe did straightly keepe, and caused his friends to keepe Solons Lawes. Insomuch as when he was called by processe into the Court of the Areopagites for a murder, even at that time when he was a Tyrant ; he presented himselfe very modestly to answer his accusation, and to purge himselfe thereof. But his accuser let fall the matter, and followed it no further. Pyffistratus himselfe also did make new laws : as this. That he that had been maimed, and made lame of any member in the Wars, should be maintained all his life long at the common charges of the City. The

The selfe same was before decreed by Thersippus (as Heraclides writeth) by Solons perswasion : who did prefer it to the Counsell. Pyffistratus afterwards took hold of the motion, and from thenceforth made it a generall Law. Theophrastus saith also, it was Pyffistratus, and not Solon, that made the Law for idleness : which was the onely cause that the Countrey of Attica became more fruitful, being better mantured : and the City of *Athen*s waxed more quiet. But Solon having begun to write the Story of the Isles Atlantides in Verse (which he had learned of the wise men of the City of Sais in Egypt, and was very necessary for the Athenians) grew weary, and gave it over in mid way : not for any matters or businesse that troubled him, as Plato said, but onely for his age, and because he feared the tediousnesse of the worke. For otherwise he had leisure enough, as appeared by these Verses, where he saith :

I grow old, and yet I learne still.

And in another place where he saith :

*New Venus yeelds me sweet delights, and Bacchus lends me comfort still :
the Muses eke refresh my sprights, and much relieve my weary will.
These be the points of perfect ease,*

which all mens mindes oft times do please.

Plato afterwards for beautifying of the Story and Fables of the Isles Atlantides, was desirous to dilate them out at length, as if he would by way of speech have broken up a Field or lay-land of his owne, or that this gift had descended to him of right from Solon. He began to raise up a stately front unto the same, and enclosed it with high walls, and large squared Courts at the entry thereof : such was it, as never any other Worke, Fable, or Poeticall invention had ever so notable, or the like. But because he began a little too late, he ended his Life before his Worke, leaving the Ceaders more sorrowfull for that was left unwritten, then they tooke pleasure in that they found written. For even as in the City of *Athen*s, the Temple of Jupiter Olympian onely remained unperfect : so the wisdom of Plato (amongst many goodly matters of his that have come abroad) left none of them unperfect, but the onely Tale of the Isles Atlantides. Solon lived long time after Pyffistratus had usurped the tyranny, as Heraclides Ponticus writeth. Howbeit *Phanias Ephesi*an writeth, that he lived not above two yeares after. For Pyffistratus usurped tyrannicall power in the yeare that Comias was chiefe Governour in *Athen*s. And Phanias writeth, that Solon dyed in the yeare that Hegesistratus was Governour, which was the next yeare after that.

And where some say, the ashes of his body were after his death strawed abroad through the Ile of Salamina : that seemeth to be but a Fable, and altogether untrue. Nevertheless it hath been written by notable Authors, and amongst others, by Aristotle the Philosopher.

Consuls.

Now we have declared what Salon was, we have thought good to compare him with Publicola, to whom the ROMANE People for an honour gave that Surname; for he was called before Publicus Valerius, descended from that ancient Valerius, who was one of the chiefest workers and means to bring the ROMANS and the SABYNS that were mortall enemies, to joyn together as one People. For it was he that most moved the two Kings to agree, and joyn together. Publicola being descended of him, whilst the Kings did rule yet at ROME, was in very great estimation, as well for his eloquence, as for his riches: using the one rightly and freely for the maintenance of Justice, and the other liberally and courteously, for the reliefe of the poore. So that it was manifest, if the Realme came to be converted into a publick State, he would be one of the chiefest men of the same. It chanced that King Tarquine furnack State, he would be one of the chiefest men of the same. It chanced that King Tarquine furnished the proud, being come to the Crowne by no good lawfull meanes, but contrarily, by indirect and wicked waies; and behaving himselfe like a King, but like a cruell Tyrant, the People much hated and detested him, by reason of the death of Lucretia (which killed her self for that she was forcibly ravished by him) and so the whole City rebelled against him. Lucius Brutus taking upon him to be the Head and Captain of this insurrection and rebellion, did joyn first with this Valerius: who did greatly favour and assist his enterprise, and did help him to drive out King Tarquine with all his house and family. Now whilst they were thinking that the People would choose some one alone to be chief Ruler over them, instead of a King: Valerius kept himself quiet, as yielding willingly unto Brutus the first place, who was meetest for it, having bene the chiefe Authour and Worker of their recovered liberty. But when they saw the name of Monarchy (as much to say, as Sovereignty alone) was displeasing to the People, and that they would like better to have the rule divided unto two, and how for this cause they would rather choose two Consuls: Valerius then began to hope he should be the second person with Brutus. Howbeit this hope failed him. For against Brutus will, Tarquinius Collatinus (the husband of Lucretia) was chosen Consul with him: not because he was a man of greater vertue, or of better estimation then Valerius. But the Noblemen of the City fearing the practises of those of the Kings blood, which fought by all the faire and flattering meanes they could to returne againe into the City: did determine to make such a one Consul, whom occasion forced to be their hard and heave Enemy, perswading themselves that Tarquinius Collatinus would for no respect yeeld unto them. Valerius tooke this matter grievously, that they had a mistrust in him, as if he would not doe any thing he could, for the benefit of his Countrey: for that he had never any private injury offered him by the Tyrants. Wherefore he repaired no more unto the Senate to pleade for private men, and wholly gave up to meddle in matters of State: inso much inso much as he gave many occasion to think of his absence, and it troubled some men much, who feared lest upon this his milking and withdrawing, he would fall to the Kings side, and so bring all the City in an uprore, considering it stood then but in very tickle termes. But when Brutus, who stood in jealousie of some, would by Oath be assured of the Senate, and had appointed them a day solemnly to take their Oaths upon the Sacrifices: Valerius then with a good cheerfull countenance came into the Market-place, and was the first that tooke his oath he would leave nothing undone that might prejudice the Tarquines, but with all his able power he would fight against them, and defend the liberty of the City. This Oath of his marvellously rejoyced the Senate, and gave great assurance also to the Consuls, but specially, because his deeds did shortly after performe his words. For there came Ambassadors to ROME, which brought Letters from King Tarquine, full of sweete and lowly speeches, to win the favour of the People, with commission to use all the mildest meanes they could, to dulce and soften the hardened hearts of the multitude: who declared how the King had left all pride and cruelty, and meant to aske nought but reasonable things. The Consuls thought best to give them open audience, and to suffer them to speake to the People. But Valerius was against it, declaring it might perill the State much, and deliver occasion of new stir unto a multitude of poore People, which were more afraid of Wars, then of Tyranny. After that, there came other Ambassadors also, which said that Tarquine would from thenceforth for ever give over and renounce his Title to the Kingdome, and to make any more Wars; but besought them only, that they would at the least deliver him and his friends their Money and Goods, that they might have wherewithall to keep them in their banishment. Many came on apace, and were very ready to yeeld to this request, and specially Collatinus, one of the Consuls who did favour their motion. But Brutus, that was a fast and resolute man, and very fierce in his heate, ran immediately into the Market-place, crying out that his fellow Consul was a Traytor, and contented to grant the Tyrants matter and meanes to make War upon the City, where indeed they deserved not so much as to be relieved in their exile. Hereupon the People assembled together, and the first that spake in this assembly, was a private man called Gaius Minutius, who speaking unto Brutus, and to the whole Assembly, said unto them: O Noble Consul and Senate, handle so the matter, that the Tyrants Goods be rather in your custody to make Warre with them, then in theirs to bring Warre upon your selves. Notwithstanding the ROMANS were of opinion, that having gotten the liberty, for which they fought with the Tyrants, they should not disappoint the offered peace, with keeping back their Goods, but rather they should throw their Goods out after them. Howbeit this was the least part of Tarquines intent, to seeke his Goods againe: but under pretence of that demand, he secretly corrupted the People, and practised Treason, which his Ambassadors followed, pretending onely to get the Kings Goods and his favourers together, saying, that they had already sold some part, and some part they kept, and sent them daily. So as by delaying the time in this sort with such pretences, they had corrupted two of the best and ancientest houses of the City: to wit, the Family of the Aquilians, whereof there were three Senators: and the Family of the Vitellians, whereof there were two Senators: all which by their Mothers, were Consul Collatinus Nephews. The Vitellians also were allied unto Brutus, for he had married their owne Sister, and had many Children by her. Of the which the Vitellians had drawne to their string, two of the eldest of them, because they familiarly frequented together, being Cousin germains, whom they had enticed to be of their conspiracy, allying them with the House of the Tarquines, which was of great power, and through the which they might perswade themselves to rise to great honour and preferment by means of the King, rather then to trust to their Fathers wilfull hardnesse: for they called his severity to the wicked, hardnesse: for that he would never pardon any. Furthermore, Brutus had feigned himself man, and a foole of long time for safety of his life, because the Tyrant should not put him to death: so that the name of Brutus onely remained. After these two young men had given their consent to be of the Confederacy, and had spoken with the Aquilians: they all thought good to be bound one to another, with a great and horrible Oath, drinking the blood of a man, and shaking hands in his bowels, whom they would sacrifice. This matter agreed upon betweene them, they met together to put their Sacrifice in execution, in the House of the Aquilians. They had fity pickt out a dark place in the House to do this Sacrifice in, and where almost no body came: yet it hapned by chance, that one of the Servants of the House called Vindicius, had hidden himself there, unknowing to the Traytors, and of no set purpose, to spie and see what they did, or that he had any manner of inking thereof before: but falling by chance upon the matter, even as the Traytors came into that place with a countenance to do some secret thing of importance, fearing to be seen, he kept himself close, and lay behind a coffer that was there, so that he saw all that was done, and what they said and determined. The conclusion of their Councell in the end was this; that they would kill both the Consuls: and they wrote Letters to Tarquinius advertising the same; which they gave unto his Ambassadors, being lodged in the house of the Aquilians; and were present at this conclusion. With this determination they departed from thence, and Vindicius came out also as secretly as he could, being marvellously troubled in minde, and at a maze how to deale in this matter. For he thought it dangerous (as it was indeed) to go and accuse the two Sons unto the Father (which was Brutus) of so wicked and detestable Treason, and the Nephews unto their Uncle, which was Collatinus. On the other side also, he thought this was a secret, not to be imparted to any private person, and not possible for him to conceale it, that was bound in duty to reveale it. So he resolved at the last to go to Valerius to bewray this Treason, of a special affection to this man, by reason of his gentle and courteous using of men, giving easie access and audience unto any that came to speake with him, and specially specially for that he disdained not to heare poore mens causes. Vindicius being gone to speake with him, and having told him the whole Conspiracy before his brother Marcus Valerius, and his wife, he was abashed and fearfull withall : whereupon he stayed him left he should slip away, and locked him in a chamber, charging his wife to watch the doore, that no body went in nor out unto him. And willed his brother also, that he should go and beset the Kings Palace round about, to intercept these Letters if it were possible, and to see that none of their Servants fled. Valerius selfe being followed (according to his manner) with a great traine of his friends and people that waited on him, went straight unto the house of the Aquilians, who by chance were from home at that time : and entering in at the gate, without lett or trouble of any man, he found the Letters in the chamber, where King Tarquinius Ambassadors lay : Whilst he was thus occupied, the Aquilians having intelligence thereof, ran home immediately, and found Valerius coming out at their Gate. So they would have taken those Letters from him by force and strong hand : but Valerius and his company did resist them, and moreover huddled them with their Gownes over their heads, and by force brought them (do what they could) into the Market-place. The like was done also in the Kings Palace, where Marcus Valerius found other Letters also wrapt up in certaine fardels for their more safe carriage, and brought away with him by force into the Market-place, all the Kings Servants he found there. There the Consuls having caused silence to be made, Valerius sent home to his house for this Bond-man Vindicius, to be brought before the Consuls : then the Traytors were openly accused, and their Letters reade, and they had not the face to answer one word. All that were present, being amazed, hung down their heads, and beheld the ground, and not a man durst once open his mouth to speake, excepting a few, who to gratifie Brutus, began to say that they should banish them : and Collatinus also gave them some hope, because he fell to weeping, and Valerius in like manner, for that he held his peace. But Brutus calling his Sons by their names : Come on (said he) Titus and thou Valerius, why do you not answer to that you are accused of ? and having spoken thrice unto them to answer, when he saw they stood mute, and said nothing : he turned him to the Serjeants, and said unto them : They are now in your hands, do justice. So soone as he had spoken these words, the Serjeants layd hold immediately upon the two young men, and tearing their clothes off their backs, bound their hands behinde them, and then whipped them with rods : which was such a pittifull sight to all the people, that they could not finde in their hearts to behold it, but turned themselves another way, because they would not see it. But contrariwise, they say that their owne Father had never his eye off them, neither did change his austere and fierce countenance, with any pity or naturall affection towards them, but stedfastly did behold the punishment of his owne Children, until they were layd flat on the ground, and both their heads stricken off with an Axe before him. When they were executed, Brutus rose from the Bench, and left the execution of the rest unto his fellow Consul. This was such an act, as men cannot sufficiently praise, nor reprove enough. For either it was his excellent vertue, that made his minde so quiet, or else the greatnesse of his misery that tooke away the feeling of his sorrow : whereof neither the one nor the other was any small matter, but passing the common nature of man, that hath in it both Divinenesse, and sometime beastly brutishnesse. But it is better the judgement of men should commend his fame, then that the affection of men by their judgements should diminish his vertue. For the ROMANS hold opinion, it was not so great an act done of Romulus first to build ROME, as it was for Brutus to recover ROME, and the best liberty thereof, and to renew the ancient Governement of the same. When Brutus was gone, all the People in the Market-place remained as they had bene in a maze, full of feare and wonder, and a great while without speaking to see what was done. The Aquilians straight grew bold, for that they saw the other Consul Collatinus proceede gently, and mildly against them : and so made petition they might have time given them to answer to the Articles they were accused of, and that they might have their Slave and Bond-man Vindicius delivered into their hands, because there was no reason, he should remaine with their accusers. The Consull seemed willing to yeeld thereto, and was ready to breake up the Assembly thereupon. But Valerius said, he would not deliver Vindicius (who was among the Assembly that attended upon his person :) and stayed the People besides for departing away, left they should negligently let those escape that had so wickedly fought to betray their Countrey : untill he himselfe had layd hands upon them, calling upon Brutus to assist him, with open exclamation against Collatinus, that he did not behave himselfe like a just and true man, seeing his fellow Brutus was forced for justice sake to see his owne Sonnes put to death : and he in contrary manner, to please a few Women, sought to let go manifest Traytors, and open Enemies to their Countrey. The Consull being offended herewith, commanded they should bring away the Bond-man Vindicius. So the Serjeants making way through the prease, layd hands upon him to bring him away with them, and began to strike at them which offered to resist them. But Valerius friends stepped out before them, and put them by. The People shouted straight, and cried out for Brutus : who with this noise returned againe into the Market-place, and after silence made him, he spake in this wise : For mine owne children, I alone have bene their sufficient Judge, to see them have the Law according to their deservings : the rest I have left freely to the judgement of the People. Wherefore (said he) if any man be disposed to speake, let him stand up, and perswade the People as he thinketh best. Then there needed no more words, but onely to hear-ken what the People cried : who with one voice and consent condemned them, and cried execution; and accordingly they had their heads stricken off. Now was Consull Collatinus long before had in some suspicion, as allied to the Kings, and disliked for his surname, because he was called Tarquinius : who who perceiving himself in this case much hated and mistrusted of the people, voluntarily yeelded up his Consulship, and departed the City. The people then assembled themselves, to place a successour in his room : they chose Valerius in his stead, without the contradiction of any, for his faithfull travel and diligence bestowed in this great matter. Then Valerius judging that Vindicius the bond-man had well deserved also some recompence, caused him not onely to be manumitted by the whole grant of the people, but made him a free man of the City besides : and he was the first bondman manumitted, that was made Citizen of ROME, with permission also to give his voice in all elections of Offices, in any company or tribe he would be enrolled in. Long time after that, and very lately, Appius to curry favour with the common people, made it lawfull for bondmen manumitted, to give their voices also in elections, as other Citizens did : and unto this day the perfect manumitting and freeing of bondmen, is called Vindicta, after the name of this Vindicius, that was then made a free-man. These things thus passed over, the goods of the Kings were given to the spoile of the people, and their palaces were razed and overthrowne. Now amongst other Lands, the goodliest part of the field of Mars was belonging unto King Tarquinius : the same they consecrated forthwith, unto the god Mars, and not long before they cut downe the wheat thereof, the sheaves being yet in shocks in the field, they thought they might not grind the wheate, nor make any commodity of the profite thereof : wherefore they threw both Corne and sheaves into the River, and Trees also which they had hewn downe and rooted up, to the end that the field being dedicated to the god Mars, should be left bare, without bearing any fruite at all. These sheaves thus throwne into the River, were carried downe by the streame not farre from thence, unto a foord and shallow place of the water, where they first did stay, and did let the other which came after, that it could goe no further : there these heapes gathered together, and lay so close one to another, that they began to sinke and settle fast in the water. Afterwards the streame of the River brought downe continually such mud and gravell, that it ever increased in the heape of corne more and more, in such sort, that the force of the water could no more remove it from thence, but rather softly pressing and driving it together, did firme and harden it, and made it grow so to Land. Thus this heape rising still in greatnesse and firmenesse, by reason that all that came downe the River staid there, it grew in the end and by time to spread so farre, that at this day it is called the holy Island in ROME : in which are many goodly Temples of diverse gods, and sundry walks about it, and they call it in Latine, Inter duos pontes : in our tongue, betweene the two Bridges. Yet some write, that this thing fell not out at that time when the field of the Tarquines was consecrated unto Mars : but that it happened afterwards, when one of the Vestall Nunnes, called Tarquinia, gave a field of hers unto the people, which was hard adjoining unto Tarquines Field. For which liberality and bounty of hers, they did grant her in recompence many Priviledges, and did her great honour besides. As amongst others, it was Ordained, that her word and witness should stand good, and be allowed in matters judiciall : which Priviledge, never Woman besides her self did enjoy. By speciall grace of the people also, it was granted her, that she might Marry if she thought it good : but yet she would not accept the benefit of that offer. Thus you heare the report how this thing happened. Tarquinus then being past hope of ever entering into his Kingdome againe, went yet unto the THUSCANES for succour, which were very glad of him : and so they levied a great Army together, hoping to have put him in his Kingdome againe. The Consuls also hearing thereof, went out with their Army against him. Both the Armies presented themselves in battell ray, one against another, in the Holy places consecrated to the gods : whereof the one was called the wood Arsa, and the other the Meadow Asuina. And as both Armies began to give charge upon each other, Aruns the eldest Sonne of King Tarquinius, and the Consul Brutus encountred together, not by chance, but fought for of set purpose to execute the deadly feud and malice they did beare each other. The one as against a Tyrant and enemy of the liberty of his Countrey : the other, as against him that had been chiefe author and worker of their exile and Expulsion. So they set Spurres to their Horses, so soone as they had spied each other, with more fury then reason, and fought so desperately together, that they both fell starke dead to the ground. The first onset of the battell being so cruell, the end thereof was no lesse bloody : untill both the Armies having received and done like damage to each other, were parted by a marvellous great tempest that fell upon them. Now was Valerius marvellously perplexed, for that he knew not which of them wanne the Field that day : seeing his souldiers as sorrowfull for the great losse of their men lying dead before them, as they were glad of the slaughter and Victory of their enemies. For, to view the multitude of the flaine bodies of either side, the number was so equal in fight, that it was very hard to judge, of which side fell out the greatest slaughter : so that both the one and the other viewing by the eye the remaine of their Campe, were perswaded in their Opinion, that they had rather lost then won, conjecturing a farre off the fall of their enemies. The night being come, such things fell out as may be looked for after so terrible a battell. For when both Camps were all layed to rest, they say the wood wherein they lay incamped, quaked and trembled : and they hard a voice say, that onely one man more was slaine one the THUSCANES side, then on the ROMANES part. Out of doubt this was some voice from Heaven : for the ROMANES thereupon gave a shrill shout, as those whose hearts received a new quickning spirit or courage. The THUSCANES one the contrary part were so afraid, that the most part of them stole out of the Campe, and scattered here and there : and there remained behind about the number of five thousand men, whom the ROMANES tooke prisoners every one, and had the spoile of their Campe. The carkasses were viewed afterwards, and they found that there were slaine in that battell, eleven thousand that she did embolden and encourage the other to swimme hard by her horse-side, and recovering the other bank, and being past all danger, they went and presented themselves before Publicola the Consul. Who neither commended them, nor liked the part they had played, but was marvellous sorry, fearing lest men would judge him lesse carefull to keep his faith, then was King Porfena; and that he might suspect the boldness of these Maidens was but a crafty sleight devised of the ROMANES; Therefore he tooke them all againe, and sent them immediately unto King Porfena. Whereof Tarquine having intelligence, he laid an ambush for them that had the conduction of them. Who so soone as they were past the River, did shew themselves and brake upon the ROMANES; they being farre fewer in number then the other, did yet very stoutly defend themselves. Now whilst they were in earnest fight together, Valeria Pub-licola's daughter, and three of her Fathers Servants, escaped through the midde of them, and saved themselves. The residue of the Virgins remained in the middest among their swords, in great danger of their lives. Aruns King Porfena's Sonne advertised hereof, ran thither incontinently to the rescue; but when he came the enemies fled, and the ROMANES held on their journey to re-deliver their hostages. Porfena seeing them againe, asked which of them it was that began first to passe the River, and had encouraged the other to follow her. One pointed him unto her, and told him her Name was Clelia. He looked upon her very earnestly, and with a pleasant countenance, and commanded they should bring him one of his best Horses in the Stable, and the richest furniture he had for the same, and so he gave it unto her. Those which hold opinion that none but Clelia passed the River on horsebacke, doe alledge this to prove their Opinion true. Others doe deny it, saying, that this Thuscane King did onely honour her noble courage. Howsoever it was, they see her Image on Horsebacke in the Holy Streete, as they goe to the Palace; And some say, It is the Statue of Valeria, other of Clelia.

After Porfena had made peace with the ROMANES, in breaking up his Campe, he shewed his noble minde unto them in many other things, and specially in that he commanded his Souldiers they should carry nothing but their armour and weapon onely, leaving his Campe full of Corne, Victuals, and other kinde of goods. From whence this custome came, that at this day when they make open sale of any thing belonging to the Common-weale, the Sergeant or Common-Cryer crieth, that they are King Porfena's Goods, and taken of thankfullnesse and perpetuall memory of his bounty and liberality towards them. Further, Porfena's Image standeth ad-joyning to the Palace where the Senate is used to be kept, which is made of great antique work.
Afterwards the SABYNES invading the ROMANE Territory with a great force, Marcus Vale-rius Publicola's Brother, was then chosen Consul, with one Posthumius Tubertus. Howbeit all maters of weight and importance passed by Publicolae counsell and authority, who was present at any thing that was done; and by whose meanes Marcus his Brother wan two great Battles, in the last whereof he slew thirteen thousand of his enemies, not losing one of his own men. For which his Victories, besides the honour of Triumph he had, the people also at their owne charges built him a house in the street of Mount Palatine, and granted him moreover that his door should open outwards into the street, where all other mens doors did open inwards into their house: signifying by grant of this honour and privilege, that he should alwaies have benefit by the Common-weale. It is reported that the GRECIANS doors of their houses in old time, did all open outwards after that fashion: And they doe conjecture it by the comedies that are plaied: where those that would go out of their houses, did first knocke at their doors, and make a noise within the house, lest in opening their door upon a suddain, they might overthrow or hurt him that tarried at the Street-door, or passed by the way, who hearing the noise had warning straight to avoid the danger. The next yeare after that, Publicola was chosen Consul the fourth time, because they stood in great doubt that the SABYNES and LATINES would joine together to make warres upon them: Besides all this, there was a certaine superstitious feare ranne through the City, of some ill hap toward it, because most part of the women with childe were delivered of imperfect Children, lacking some one limb or other, and all of them came before their time. Wherefore Publicola looking in some of Sybillae's Books, made private sacrifice unto Pluto, and did set up againe some Feasts and solemne Games that were left off, and had been commanded before time to be kept by the Oracle of Apello. These meanes having a little rejoiced the City with good hope, because they thought that the anger of the gods had been appeased: Publicola then began to provide for the dangers that they were threatned withall by men, for that news was brought him that their enemies were up in all places, and made great preparation to invade them. Now there was at that time amongst the SABYNES a great rich man called Appius Claudius, very strong and active of body, and otherwise a man of great reputation and eloquence, above all the rest of his countreymen; But notwithstanding he was much envied, and could not avoid it, being a thing common to great men. He went about to stay those intended warres against the ROMANES.
Whereupon many which before tooke occasion to murmur against him, did now much more encrease the same; with saying he sought to maintaine the power of the ROMANES, that afterwards by their ayde he might make himselfe Tyrant and King of the Countrey. The common people gave easie care unto such speeches, and Appius perceiving well enough how the souldiers hated him deadly, he feared they would complain and accuse him. Wherefore being well backed and stood to by his kinsmen, Friends, and Followers, he practised to make a stir among

among the SABYNES, which was the cause of staying the warres against the ROMANES.
Publicola also for his part was very diligent, not onely to understand the originall cause of this sedition, but to feede on further and encrease the same, having gotten men meet for that purpose, which carried Appius such a message from him; That Publicola knew very well he was a iust man, and one that would not be revenged of his Citizens to the generall hurt of his Countrey, although the injuries he received at their hands delivered him iust occasion to doe it: Nevertheless if he had any desire to provide for his safety, and to repaire to ROME, leaving them which causelesse wished him so much evil, they would both openly and privately receive him with that due honour which his vertue deserved, and the worthinesse of the ROMANE people required. Claudius having long and many times considered this matter with himselfe, resolved, that it was the best way he could take, making vertue of necessity; and therefore being determined to doe it, he did procure his Friends to doe as he did, and they got other also to them, so that he brought away with him out of the Countrey of the SABYNES, five thousand Families with their Wives and Children (of the quietest and most peaceable people among the SABYNES) to dwell at ROME. Publicola being advertised thereof before they came, Appius Claudius did receive them at their coming to ROME with great joy, and all manner of good courteous entertainment. For at their first coming he made them all and their Families free Citizens, and assigned unto every person of them two Jugera of Land (which contained one acre, one rood, eleven pole, and sixty nine parts of a pole) by the River of Tyber: And unto Appius selfe he gave five and twenty Jugera (to wit, sixteen acres and a half, four pole and seventy six parts of a pole) and received him into the number of the Senators. And thus came he first unto the government of the Common-weale in ROME, where he did so wisely behave himselfe, that in the end he came to be the chiefeit man of dignitie and authority in ROME so long as he lived. After his death he left behinde him the Family of the Claudians, descending from him; The family of which for honour and worthinesse gave no place to the noblest Family in ROME. But now the sedition amongst the SABYNES being pacified, by the departure of those that were gone to ROME: The seditious Governours would not suffer those that remained to live in peace, but still cried out, It were too much shame for them that Claudius being a fugitive, and become an enemy, should honour their enemies abroad, that being present durst not shew so much at home, and that the ROMANES should escape unrevenged, who had done them such apparent wrongs. So they raised great force and power, and went and encamped with their army near the City of Fidene, and laid an ambush hard by ROME in certain hidden and hollow places, where they put two thousand choise footmen, very well armed, and did appoint the next morning to send certain light horsemen to runne and prey to ROME-gates; commanding them, that when the ROMANES came out of the City to charge them, they should seeme leisurely to retire, until they had drawne them within danger of their ambush. Publicola receiving full intelligence of all their intention, by a Traitor that fled from them unto him, made due preparation to encounter with their privy ambush, and so divided his Army into two parts; For he gave his Sonne in Law Posthumius Balbus three thousand footmen, whom he sent away by night, commanding them the same night to take the hills, in the bottome whereof the SABYNES were laid in ambush. Lucretia fellow-Consul with Publicola, having the lightest and lustiest men of the City, was appointed to make head against the vantage of the SABYNES that minded to approach the gates. And Publicola with the rest of the Army marched a great compasse about to inclose his enemies behinde. The next morning betimes, by chance it was a thick miste, and at that present time, Posthumius coming downe from the hills, with great shouts charged them that lay in ambush. Lucretius on the other side set upon the light horsemen of the SABYNES, and Publicola fell upon their Campe. So that of all sides the SABYNES enterprife had very ill successe; For they had the worke in every place, and the ROMANES killed them flying, without any turning againe to make resistance. Thus the place which gave them hope of best safety, turned most to their deadly overthrow. For every one of their companies supposing the other had been whole and unbroken, when a charge was give upon them, did straight breake, and never a company of them turned head toward their enemy; For they that were in the Campe, ranne towards them that were in ambush; and those which were in ambush on the contrary side, ranne towards them that were in Campe. So that in flying the one met with the other, and found those towards whom they were flying to have been safe, to stand in as much need of helpe as themselves. That which saved some that were not slaine, was the City of Fidene, which was neare the Campe, and specially saved those which fled thither. But such as came short of the City and could not in time recover it, were all slaine in the Field, or taken prisoners. As for the glory of this honourable Victory, albeit the ROMANES were wont to ascribe all such great notable matters to the speciall providence and grace of the gods, yet at that time notwithstanding they did judge that this happy successe fell out by the wise foresight and valiantnesse of the Captain. For every man that had served in this journey, had no other talke in his mouth, but that Publicola had delivered their enemies into their hands, lame and blinde, and as a man might say, bound hand and feet to kill them at their pleasure. The people were marvellously enriched by this Victory, as well for the spoile as for the ranfome of the prisoners that they had gotten. Now Publicola after he had triumphed, and left the government of the City to those which were chosen Consuls for the Yeare following, died incontinently, having lived as honourably

His Funerals. honourably and vertuously all the daies of his life as any man living might doe. The people then tooke order for his Funerals, that the charges thereof should be defrayed by the City, as if they had never done him any honour in his life, and that they had been still debtors unto him for the noble service he had done unto the State and Common-weale whilest he lived. Therefore towards his Funerall charges, every Citizen gave a peece of money called a Quatine. The women also for their part to honour his Funerals, agreed among themselves to mourn a whole yeare in black for him, which was a great and honourable memoriall; He was buried also by expresse order of the people, within the City, in the street called Velia, and they granted priviledge also unto all his posterity, to be buried in the selfe same place. Howbeit they doe no more bury any of his there: But when any die, they bring they bring the coarfe unto this place, and one holding a torch burning in his hand, doth put it under the place, and take it straight away againe, to shew that they have liberty to bury him there, but that they willingly refuse his honour; and this done, they carry the Coarfe away againe.

The End of the Life of Publicola.

NOW presently to compare these two Personages together, it seemeth they both had one vertue in them; which is not found in any other of their lives which we have written of before. And the same is, that the one hath been a witnesse, and the other a follower of him, to whom he was like. So as the sentence that Solon spake to King Craesus touching Tellus felicity and happinesse, might have been better applied unto Publicola then to Tellus: whom he judged to be very happy because he died honourably, he had lived vertuously, and had left behinde him goodly children. And yet Solon speaketh nothing of his excellency or vertue in any of his Poems: Neither did he ever beare any honourable office in all his time, nor yet left any Children that carried any great fame or renowne after his death. Whereas Publicola so long as he lived, was alwaies the chiefe man among the ROMANES, of credit and authority; and afterwards since his death certain of the noblest Families and most ancient houses of ROME, in these our daies, as the PUBLICOLES, the MESSELES, and the VALERIANES, for six hundred yeares continuance, doe referre the glory of the Nobility and anciantry of their houses unto him. Furthermore, Tellus was slaine by his enemies, fighting valiantly like a worthy honest man: But Publicola died after he had slaine his enemies; which is far more greater good hap then to be slaine. For after he as Generall had honourably served his Country in the warres, and had left them Conquerors, having in his life time received all honors and triumphs due unto his service, he attained to that happy end of life, which Solon accounted and esteemed most happy and blessed. Also in wishing manner he would his end should be lamented to his praise, in a place where he confuteth Nimnermus about the continuance of mans life, by saying,

Let

Let not my death without lamenting passe,
But rather let my friends bewaile the same:
Whose grievous tears, and cries of out alas;
May oft resound the Echo of my name.

If that be good happy, then most happy maketh he Publicola: for at his death, not only his friends and kinsfolkes, but the whole City also, and many thousand persons besides, did bitterly bewaile the losse of him. For all the Women of ROME did mourne for him in blacke, and did most pityfully lament his Death, as every one of them had lost either Father, Brother, or Husband.

True it is, that I covet goods to have:
But yet so got as may me not deprave.

Solon saith this, because vengeance followed ill gotten goods. And Publicola tooke great heede, not onely to get his goods most justly, but had regard that those which he had, he spent most honestly in helping the needie. So that if Solon was justly reputed the wisest man, we must needs confesse also that Publicola was the happiest. For what the one desired for the greatest and most perfect good a man can have in the world, the other hath wonne it, kept it, and used it all his life time, until the houre of his death. And thus hath Solon honoured Publicola, and Publicola hath done the like unto Solon; shewing himselfe a perfect example and looking-glasse, where men may see how to governe a popular state; when he made his Consulship void of all pride and stately shew, and became himselfe affable, courteous, and beloved of every body. So tooke he profit by many of his Lawes; as when he ordained that the people onely should have authority to chuse and create all common Officers and Magistrates, and that they might appeale from any Judge to the people: as Solon when he suffered them to appeale unto the Judges of the people. Indeed Publicola did not create any new Senate, as Solon did, but he did augment the first number, with as many persons almost as there were before. He did also first erect the office of Questores, for keeping of all Fines, Taxes, and other collections of money. Because the chiefe Magistrate, if he were an honest man should not for so light an occasion be taken from the care of better and more weighty affairs; and if he were wickedly given, and ill disposed, that he should have no such meane or occasion to worke his wicked will, by having the treasure of the City in his hands, and to command what he list. Moreover in hating the Tyrants, Publicola therein was farre more sharpe and terrible. For Solon in his Lawes punished him that went about to make himselfe a Tyrant, yet after he was convicted thereof by Law; but Publicola ordained that they should kill him, before the Law did passe upon him, that sought to be King. And where Solon justly and truly vauntech himselfe, that being offered to be King and Lord of ATHENS, and that with the whole consent of the Citizens, yet he did notwithstanding refuse it: This vaunt and glory is as due unto Publicola; who finding the dignity of a Consul tyrannicall, he brought it to be more lowly and favourable for the people, not taking upon him all the authority he might lawfully have done. And it seemeth that Solon knew before him what was the true and direct way to governe a Common-weale upright. For he saith in one place:

Both great and small of power, the better Will obey,
If we too little or too much upon them do not lay.

The discharging of debts was proper to Solon, which was a full confirmation of libertie: For little prevaileth Law to make equality among Citizens when debts doe hinder the poore people to enjoy the benefit thereof. And where it seemeth that they have most liberty, as in that they may be chosen Judges and Officers, to speake their Opinion in the Council, and give their voices also; There indeed are they most bound and subject, because they do but obey the rich in all they doe command. But yet in this act there is a thing more wonderfull, and worthy to be noted, That commonly discharging of debts was wont to breede great tumults and seditions in Common-weales. And Solon having used it in a very good time (as the Physician venturing a dangerous medicine) did appease the sedition already begun, and did utterly quench through his glory, and the common opinion they had of his wisdom and vertue, all the infamy and accusation that might have grown of that act. As for their first entrie into the government, Solons beginning was farre more noble: For he went before, and followed not another; and himselfe alone without any others helpe, did put in execution the best, and most part of all his notable and goodly Lawes. Yet was Publicolaes end and death much more glorious and happy; For Solon before he died, saw all his Common-wealth overthrowne; But Publicolaes Common-weale continued whole as he left it, until the broile of civil warres began againe among them. Solon after he had made his Lawes, and written them in wooden Tables, leaving them without defence of any man, went his way immediatly out of the City of ATHENS. Publicola abiding continually in ROME governing the state, did thoroughly stablish and confirme the Lawes he made. Furthermore, Solon having wisely foreseene Pysistratus practises, aspiring to make himselfe King, he could never let him for all that, but was himselfe overcome and oppressed with the Tyranny he saw stablished in his owne fight, and in despite of him; where Publicola overthrowne and did put down a mighty Kingdom, that had continued of long time, and was thoroughly stablished; his vertue and desire being equall with Solons, and having had besides fortune favourable, and sufficient power to execute his vertuous and well-disposed minde. But as for warres and martiall deeds, there is no comparison to be made betweene them. For Daimachus Plataian

Plataian, doth not attribute the warres of the MEGARIANS unto Solon, as we have written it: where Publicola being Generall of an Army, and fighting himself in person, hath wonne many great battels. And as for matters of peace and civil government, Solon never durst present himselfe openly to perswade the enterprize of SALAMINA, but under a counterteit madnesse, and as a foole to make sport: where Publicola taking his adventure from the beginning, shewed himselfe without dissimulation an open enemy to Arginus, and afterwards he revealed all the whole conspiracy. And when he had been the onely cause and authour of punishing the Traitors, he did not onely drive out of ROME the Tyrants selves in person, but tooke from them also all hope of returne againe. Who having alwaies thus nobly and valiantly behaved himselfe, without shrinking back, or flying from ought that required force, a manly courage, or open resistance; did yet shew himselfe discreet, where wisdom was requisite, or reason and perswasion needfull. As when he cunningly wanne King Porfena, who was a dreadfull enemy unto him, and invincible by force; whom he handled in such good sort, that he made him his Friend. Peradventure some might stand in this, and say, that Solon recovered the Isle of SALAMINA unto the ATHENIANS, which they would have lost. Publicola to the contrary restored the Lands unto Porfena againe, which the ROMANES had conquered before, within the Countrey of THUSCANE. But the times in which these things were done, are alwaies to be considered of. For a wise Governour of a Realme, and politick man, doth governe diversly according to the occasions offered, taking every thing in his time wherein he will deale, and many times in letting go one thing he saveth the whole; and in losing a little he gaineth much: as Publicola did, who losing a little peece of another mans Countrey which they had usurped, saved by that means all that was assuredly his owne. And whereas the ROMANES thought he should doe very much for them to save their City onely, he got them moreover all the goods that were in their enemies Campe which did bessege them. And in making his enemy judge of his quarrell, he wan the victory; winning that moreover which he would gladly have given to have overcome, and have sentence passe on his side. For the King their Enemy did not onely make peace with them, but did also leave them all his furniture, provision, and munition for the warres: even for the vertue, manhood, and justice, which the great wisdom of the Consul perswaded Porfena to beleeve to be in all the other ROMANES.

THE LIFE OF THEMISTOCLES.

THEMISTOCLES Parentage did little advance his glory, for his Father Necles was of small reputation in ATHEENS, being of the hundred of Phrear, and tribe of Leontis; of his mother an alien or stranger, as these Verses do witnesse:

Abrotonon I am, borne in Thracia,

And yet this high good hap I have, that into Grecia

I have brought forth a Son, Themistocles by name,

The glory of the Greekeish blouds, and man of greatest fame.

Howbeit Phanias writeth, that his Mother was not a THRACIAN, but borne in the Countrey of CARIA; and they doe not call her Abro- tomon but Euterpe. And Neanthes saith furthermore, that she was of HALICARNASSUS, the chiefeft City of all the Realme of CARIA. For which cause when the strangers did assemble at Cynosarges (a place of exercise without the gate dedicated to Hercules, which was not a right god, but noted an alien, in that his mother was a mortal woman:) Themistocles perswaded divers youths of the most honourable houses, to goe downe with him, and to anoint themselves at Cynosarges, cunningly thereby taking away the difference between the right and allied sort. But setting apart all these circumstances, he was no doubt allied unto the house of the Lycomedians; For Themistocles caused the Chappell of this Family, which is in the Village of PHLYES, being once burnt by the barbarous people, to be built up againe at his owne charges; and as Simonides saith, he did set it forth and enrich it with pictures. Moreover every man doth confesse it, that even from his childhood they did perceive he was given to be very hot-headed, stirring, wise, and of good spirit, and enterprising of himself to do great things, and borne to rule weighty causes. For at such daies and howrs as he was taken from his Booke, and had leave to play, he never played, nor would never be idle, as other Children were; But they alwaies found him conning some Oration without Booke, or making it alone by himself; and the ground of his matter was ever commonly, either to defend or accuse some of his companions. Whereupon his Schoolmaster observing him, oft said unto him: Sure some great matter hangeth over thy head my Boy, for it cannot be chosen but that one day thou shalt do some notable good thing, or some extreme mischief. Therefore when they went about to teach him any thing, onely to check his nature, or to fashion him with good manners and civility, or to study any matter for pleasure or honest pastime, he would slowly and carelesly learne of them. But if they delivered him any matter of wit, and things of weight concerning state, they saw he would beate at it marvellously, and would understand more then any could of his age and carriage, trusting altogether to his natural mother wit. This was the cause that being mocked afterwards by by some that had studied humanity and other liberrall Sciences, he was driven for revenge and his owne defence, to answer with great and stout words, saying, that indeed he had no skill to tune a Harpe, nor a Violl, nor to play on a psalterion; but if they did put a City into his hands that was of small name, weak, and little, he knew waies enough how to make it noble, strong, and great. Nevertheless Stesimbrotus writeth, how he went to Anaxagoras School, and that under Melissus he studied natural Philofophy. But herein he was greatly deceived, for that he tooke no great heed unto the time. For Melissus was Captain of the SAMIANS against Pericles, at what time he did lay siege unto the City of SAMOS. Now this is true, Pericles was much younger then Themistocles, and Anaxagoras dwelt with Pericles in his owne house. Therefore we have better reason and occasion to believe those that write, Themistocles did determine to follow Mucspphilus Phrearian. For he was no professed Orator nor natural Philosopher, as they termed him at that time; but made profession of that which then they called wisdom; which was no other thing but a certain knowledge to handle great causes, and an endeavour to have a good wit and judgement in matters of state and government: Which profession beginning in Solon, did continue, and was taken up from man to man, as a sect of Philofophy. But those that came thence, have mingled it with art of speech, and by little and little have translated the exercise of deeds unto bare and curious words: whereupon they were called Sophisters, as who would say, counterfeit wise men. Notwithstanding when Themistocles began to meddle with the government of the commonweale, he followed much Mucspphilus. In the first part of his youth his behaviour and doings were very light and unconstant, as his name carried away with a rash head, and without any order or discretion: By reason whereof his manners and conditions seemed marvellously to change, and oftentimes fell into very ill-favoured events, as himselfe did afterwards confesse, by saying, that a ragged colt oftentimes proves a good horse, specially if he be well ridden and broken as he should be. Other tales which some will seem to adde to this, are in my opinion but Fables. As, that his Father did disinherite him, and that his mother for very care and sorrow she tooke to see the lewd life of her Son, did kill her selfe. For there are that write to the contrary, that his Father being desirous to take him from dealing in government, did go and shew him all along the Sea shore, the shipwracks and ribs of old galleys cast here and there, whereof no reckoning was made, and said to him, thus the people use their governors when they can serve no longer. Howsoever it was, it is most true that Themistocles earnestly gave himself to state, and was suddenly taken with desire of glory. For even at his first entry, because he would set foot before the proudest, he stood at pike against the greatest and mightiest persons that bare the sway and government, and specially against Aristides, Lyfimachus Son, who ever encountered him, and was still his adversary opposite. Yet it seemeth the evil will he conceived toward him, came of a very light cause. For they both loved Stesilams that was borne in the City of TEOS, as Ariston the Philosopher writeth. And after this jealousie was kindled betweene them, they alwaies tooke contrary part one against another, not only in their private likings, but also in the government of the commonweale. Yet I am perswaded, that the difference of their manners and conditions did much encrease the grudge and discord betwixt them. For Aristides (being by nature a very good man, a just dealer, and honest of life, and one that in all his doings would never flatter the people, nor serve his owne glory, but rather to the contrary would do, say, and counsell alwaies for the most benefit and commodity of the Commonweale) was oftentimes enforced to resist Themistocles, and disappoint his ambition, being ever busily moving the people to take some new matter in hand: For they report of him, that he was enflamed with desire of glory, and to enterprize great matters, that being but a very young man at the battell of MARATHON, where there was no talk but of the worthinesse of Captain Miltiades that had won the battell: He was found many times solitary alone devising with himself. Besides, they say he could take no rest in the night, neither would goe to Plays in the day time, nor would keepe company with those whom he was accustomed to be familiar withall before. Furthermore, he would tell them that wondred to see so great alteration in his manners, and asked him what he ailed, that Miltiades victory would not let him sleepe, because other thought this overthrow at MARATHON, would have made an end of all warres. Howbeit Themistocles was of a contrary opinion, and that it was but a beginning of greater troubles: Therefore he daily studied how to prevent them, and how to see to the safety of GREECE; and before occasion offered, he did exercise his City in feats of war, foreseeing what should follow after. Wherefore where the Citizens of ATHENS before did use to divide among themselves the revenue of their mines of silver, which were in a part of ATTICA called LAURION, he alone was the first that durst speak to the people, and perswade them, that from thenceforth they should cease that distribution among themselves, and employ the money of the same in making of galleys, to make warres against the EGYPTIANS. For their wars of all GREECE were most cruel, because they were lords of the Sea, and had so great a number of Ships. This perswasion drew the Citizens more easily to Themistocles minde then the threatening them with King Darius, or the Persians would have done; who were farre from them, and not feared that they would come near unto them. So this opportunity taken of the hatred and jealousie between the ATHENIANS and the EGYPTIANS, made the people to agree, of the said money to make an 100 galleys, with which they fought against King Xerxes, and did overcome him by Sea. Now after this good beginning and successe, he wan the Citizens by degrees to bend their force to Sea, declaring unto them, how by land they were scant able to make head against their equals, whereas by their power at Sea they should not only defend themselves from the barbarous people, but moreover be able to command all GREECE. Hereupon he made them good good mariners, and passing Sea-men, as Plato saith, where before they were stout and valiant souldiers by land. This gave his enemies occasion to cait in his teeth afterwards, that he had taken away from the ATHENIANS the pike and the target, and had brought them to the bank and the ower; and so he got the upper hand of Miltiades, who inveighed against him in that, as Stesimbrotus writeth. Now after he had thus his will, by bringing this Sea-service to passe, whether thereby he did overthrow the justice of the commonweal or not, I leave that to the Philosophers to dispute. But that the preservation of all GREECE stood at that time upon the Sea, and that the galleys only were the cause of setting up ATHENS againe, Xerxes himself is a sufficient witness, besides other proofs that might be brought thereof. For his army by Land being yet whole, and unset on, when he saw his Army by Sea broken, dispersed, and sunk, he fled straight upon it, confessing as it were that he was now too weak to deal any more with the GRECIANS, and left Mardonius his Lieutenant in Grece, of purpose in my opinion, rather to let that the GRECIANS should not follow him, then for any hope he had to overcome them. Some write of Themistocles, that he was a very good husband for his own profit, and careful to looke to his things; for he did spend liberally, and was not to be careful to get, to defray his charges. Other to the contrary blame him much, that he was too near and miserable; For some say he would sell presents of meat that were given him. He did aske one Philides on a time which had a breed of mares, a colt of gift; who denying him flatly he was so angry, that he threatned him ere it were long he would make his house the horse of wood, with the which TROIA was taken. Meaning covertly to let him understand that he would shortly set strife and quarrel betwixt him, and his nearest kinsmen and familiar friends. It is true that he was the most ambitious man of the world; For when he was but a young man, and scant known, he earnestly entreated one Epicles born at HERMIONNA, an excellent player of the Citerne, and counted at that time the cunningest man in all ATHENS at that instrument, that he would come and teach his art at his house, and all was no more but that many people being desirous to hear him play, should ask for his house, and come thither to him. And one year when he went unto the Feast and assembly of the plays Olympical, he would needs keep open house for all comers, have his tents richly furnished, and a great train of servants and all other furniture, only to contend with Cimon. This marvellously spited the GRECIANS, who thought Themistocles expences fit for Cimons countenance and ability, because he was a young gentleman, and of a noble house; but for him that was but a new come man, and would bear a greater port then either became his calling or ability, they thought it not only unallowable in him, but meer presumption and vainglory. Another time he defrayed the whole charges of a tragedy which was played openly; and being set out therein to have won the prize, and the ATHENIANS being marvellous desirous of the honour in such playes, he caused this Victory of his to be painted in a Table which he did dedicate and set up in a Temple, with this Inscription, Themistocles Phrearian defrayed the charges; Phrynicus made it; Adimantus was chief Ruler. Yet notwithstanding he was well taken of the common people, partly because he would speake to every citizen by his name, no man telling him their names, and partly also because he shewed himselfe an upright judge in private mens causes. As one day he answered the Poet Simonides, born in CHIO, who did request an unreasonable matter at his hands, at that time when he was governeur of the City: Thou couldst be no good Poet, Simonides, if thou didst sing against the rules of musick; Neither my selfe a good governeur of a City, if I should do any thing against the Law. And mocking the same Simonides another time, he told him he was but a fool to speak ill of the Corinthians, considering they were Lords of so great and strong a City; and that he was not wise to make himself to be drawn, being so deformed and ill-favoured. But being growne in credit, and having won the favour of the people, he was such an enemy to Aristides, that in the end he made him to be expelled and banished ATHENS for five years. When news were brought that the King of PERSIA was onwards on his journey, and coming down to make wars upon the GRECIANS: the ATHENIANS consulted whom they should make their General. And it is reported that all their common Counsellors which were wont to speake in matters, fearing the danger, drew back, save an Orator called Epicles, Euphemides Sonne, very eloquent in speech, but somewhat womanish, faint-hearted, and greedy of money, who offered himselfe to sue for this charge, and had some hope to obtain it. Wherefore Themistocles fearing all would not be well if it fell to this man to be General of the Army, he bought out Epicles ambition with ready money, and so made him let fall his suit. It fell out Themistocles was greatly commended, about that was done to the Interpreter, that came with the King of Persia's Embassadours, and demanded the Empire of the Greecians both by Sea and Land, that they should acknowledge obedience to the King. For he caused him to be taken and put to death by a common consent; for using the Greek Tongue in the service and commandment of the barbarous people. It was a notable thing also, that at his motion Athmias born at ZELBA, was noted of infamy; both he, his children; and all his posterity after him, because he brought gold from the King of Persia, to corrupt and winne the Greecians. But the greatest and worthiest act he did in those parts, was this: that he pacified all civil warres among the Greecians, perswading the Cities to leave off their quarrels until the warres were done, in the which they they say Chileus Arcadian did helpe him more then any other man. He being now chosen General of the ATHENIANS, went about presently to imbarke his Citizens into Galleys, declaring to them they should leave their City; and go meet with the barbarous King by Sea, so far from the coast of Greece as they could; but the people did not think that good. Wherefore he led great numbers of Souldiers by Land into the Countrey of TEMPE with the LACEDÆMONIANS;

MONIANS, to keep the passage and entry into THESSALY, against the barbarous people, which Country stood yet found to GRECE, and not revolted to the MEDES. Afterwards the GRECIANS coming from thence without any act done, and the THESSALIANS also being won somewhat on the Kings side, so that all the whole Countrey unto BOEOTIA was at the devotion and good-will of the barbarous people, the ATHENIANS began then to finde how Themistocles opinion to fight by Sea was very good. Whereupon they sent him with their Navy to the City of ARTEMISIUM, to keep the straight. There the other GRECIANS would have had the LACEDÆMONIANS and their Admiral Eurybiades to have had the authority and commandment of the rest. But the ATHENIANS would not set sail under any other Admirall then their own, because theirs were the greatest number of Ships in the Army, and above all the other Grecians. Themistocles foreseeing the danger that was likely to fall out amongst themselves, did willingly yeeld the whole authority unto Eurybiades, and got the Athenians to agree unto it: assuring them, that if they behaved themselves valiantly in these wars, the other GRECIANS of their owne accord would afterward submit themselves unto their obedience. Hereby it appeareth, that he only of all other was at that time the originall cause of the saving of GRECE, and did most advance the honour and glory of the Athenians, by making them to overcome their enemies by force, and their friends and allies, with liberality. In the meane time, Eurybiades seeing the barbarous fleet riding at anchor all along the Isle of APHETES, with such a great number of Ships in the vaward, he began to be afraid. And understanding moreover, there were other two hundred saile that went to coit about the Isle of SCIATHE, and so to come in: he presently would have retired further into GRECE, and would have drawn nearer unto Peloponnesus, to the end their Army by Sea might be near their Army by Land, as thinking it impossible to fight with King Xerxes power by Sea. Whereupon the Inhabitants of the Isle of EUBOEIA, fearing lest the Grecians would leave them to the spoile of the enemy, they caused Themistocles secretly to be spoken withall, and sent him a good summe of money by one called Pelagon. Themistocles took the money, as Herodotus writeth, and gave it to Eurybiades. But there was one Architeles amongst the Athenians, Captain of the galley called the holy galley, that was much against Themistocles intended purpose; who having no money to pay his mariners, did what he could that they might depart with speed from thence. Themistocles stirred up then his Souldiers more against him then before, inasmuch as they went aboard his galley, and tooke his supper from him. Architeles being marvellous angry and offended withall, Themistocles sent him both bread and meat in a pannier, and in the bottome thereof he had put a talent of silver, bidding him for that night to sup with that, and the next morning he should provide for his mariners, or else he would complain and accuse him to the Citizens that he had taken money of the enemies. Thus it is written by Phanias Lesbian. Moreover the first fights in the straight of EUBOEIA, between the Grecians and the barbarous people, were nothing to purpose to end the warres betweene them: For it was but a taste given unto them which served the Grecians turne very much, by making them to see by experience, and the manner of the fight, that it was not the great multitude of Ships, nor the pomp and sumptuous setting out of the same, nor the proud barbarous shouts and songs of victory, that could stand them to purpose against noble hearts and valiant-minded Souldiers, that durst grapple with them, and come to hand-strokes with their enemies, and that they should make no reckoning of all that bravery and brags, but should stick to it like men, and lay it on the jacks of them. The which (as it seemeth) the Poet Pindarus understood very well, when he said touching the battle of ARTEMISIUM:

The stout Athenians have now foundation layed Unto the liberty of Greece, by these assaults assayed.

Artemisium.

For out of doubt the beginning of victory, is to be hardy. This place ARTEMISIUM is a part of the Isle of EUBOEIA, looking towards the North, above the City of ESTIEA, lying directly over against the Countrey, which sometimes was under the obedience of the PHILOCTETES, and specially of the City of OLIZON. There is a little Temple of Diana, surnamed Orientalis, round about the which there are trees, and a compasse of pillars of white stone, which when a man rubs with his hand, they shew of the colour and favour of saffron. And in one of those pillars there is an inscription of lamentable verses to this effect:

*When boldest blonds of Athens by their might,
Had overcome the numbers infinite.
Of Asia: they then in memory Of all their deeds and valiant victory, Began to build this noble Monument,
And to Diane the same they did present,
For that they had the Medes likewise subdued,
And with their blood, their hardy hands embued.*

stratagem.

There is a place seen also upon that coast at this day, a good way into the land, in the midst whereof are great sands full of blacke dust like ashes: and they think that they burnt in that place all dead bodies and old shipwracks. News being brought what had been done in the Countrey of THERMOPILES, how that King Leonidas was dead, and how that Xerxes had won that entry into GRECE by land; the GRECIANS then brought their whole Army by Sea more into GRECE, the ATHENIANS being in the rereward in this retreat, as men whose hearts were lift up with the glory of their former valiant deedes. Now Themistocles passing by those places places where he knew the enemies must of necessity fall upon the Lee shore for harbour: he did engrave certaine words spoken unto the IONIANs, in great letters in stone, which he found there by chance, or purposely brought thither for that purpose, where there was very good harbour for Ships, and fit places also to lye in. These were the words, that the IONIANs should take the GRECIANS parts being their founders and ancestors, and such as fought for their liberty; or at the least they should trouble the army of the barbarous people, and doe them all the mischief they could, when the GRECIANS should come to fight with them. By these words he hoped either to bring the IONIANs to take their part, or at the least he should make the barbarous people jealous and mistrustful of them. Xerxes being already entred into the uppermost part of the Province of DORICA, into the Countrey PHOCIDA, burning and destroying the Towns and Cities of the PHOCIANS, the other GRECIANS lay still and suffered the invasion, notwithstanding the ATHENIANS did request them to meete with the barbarous army in BOEOTIA, to save the Countrey of ATTICA, as before they had done, when they went by sea to ARTEMISIUM. But they would not hearken to it in no wise; and all was because they were desirous they should draw to the straight of PELOPONNESUS, and there they should assemble the whole strength and power of GRECE within the barre of the same, and make a strong substantiall wall from the one Sea to the other. The ATHENIANS were very angry at this device, and were half discouraged and out of heart to see themselves thus forsaken and cast off by the rest of the GRECIANS. For it was out by all speech that they alone should fight against so many thousands of enemies, and therefore their only remedy was, to leave their City, and to get them to the Sea. The people were very unwilling to listen hereunto, making their reckoning it was needlesse to be carefull to overcome, or to save themselves, having once forsaken the temples of their gods, and the graves of their Parents. Wherefore Themistocles seeing that neither reason nor mans persuasion could bring the people to like his opinion; He began to frame a device (as men doe use sometimes in tragedies) and to threaten the ATHENIANS with signs from heaven, with oracles and answers from the gods. And the occasion of Minerva's dragon served his turne for a celestiall signe and token, which by good fortune did not appear in those daies in the Temple as it was wont to do; and the Priests found the Sacrifices which were daily offered to him, whole and untouched by any. Wherefore being informed by Themistocles what they should do, they spread a brute abroad amongst the people, that the goddesse Minerva, the protector and defender of the City, had forsaken it, pointing them the way unto the Sea. And againe he wan them by a Prophecy, which commanded them to save themselves in wals of wood, saying, that the wals of wood did signifie nothing else but Ships. And for this cause he said, Apollo in the Oracle called SALAMINA divine, not miserable nor unfortunate, because it should give the name of a most happy Victory which the GRECIANS should get there. And so at the last they following his counsell, he made this Decree, that they should leave the City of ATHENS to the custody of the goddesse Pallas, that was Lady and Governour of the Countrey, and that all those which were of age to carry any weapon should get them to the galleys; and for the rest that every man should see his wife, children and bondmen placed in some sure place as well as he could. After this decree was past and authorized by the people, the most part of them did convey they aged Fathers and Mothers, their wives and little children, into the City of TROEZEN, where the TROEZENIANS received them very lovingly and gently. For they gave order that they should be entertained of the common charge, allowing them a peece, two oboles of their money a day, and suffered the young children to gather fruit wheresoever they found it, and furthermore did hire Schoolmasters at the charge of the Commonwealt, to bring them up at School. He that was the penner of this decree was one called Nicagoras. The ATHENIANS at that time had no common money, but the Senate of the Areopagites (as Aristotle saith) furnished every Souldier with eight drachma's, which was the only meane that the galleys were armed. Yet Clidemus writeth, that this was a craft devised of Themistocles. The ATHENIANS being come downe unto the haven of PIRÆA, he made as though Pallas target (on the which Medusaes head was graven) had been lost, and was not found with the Image of the goddesse; and feigning to seek for it, he rancked every corner of the galleys, and found a great deal of silver which private persons had hidden amongst their fardels. This money was brought out unto the people, and by this means the Souldiers that were shipped had wherewithall to provide them of necessary things. When time came that they were to depart the haven, and that all the City of ATHENS had taken Sea, one way it was a pity to behold them: another way it made all sorts to wonder, that considered the boldnesse and courage of those men, which before sent away their Fathers and Mothers from them, and were nothing moved at their tears, cries, shrieks, and embracings of their wives, their children, and departures, but stoutly and resolutely held on their course to SALAMINA. Notwithstanding there were many old Citizens left still of necessity in ATHENS, because they could not be removed for very extreme age, which stirred many with compassion toward them. There was besides a certain pity that made mens hearts to yern, when they saw the poor dogges, beasts, and cattel runne up and downe bleating, lowing, and howling out aloud after their Masters, in token of sorrow, when they did imbarke. Amongst these there goeth a strange tale of Xantippus dogge, who was Pericles Father; which for sorrow his Master had left him behinde him, did cast himselfe after into the Sea, and swimming still by the galleys side wherein his master was, he held on to the Ile of SALAMINA, where so soone as the poore curre landed, his breathe failed him, and he died presently.

made: to the end, said he, that we may take ASIA into EUROPE. Aristides liked not this opinion: for we have (said he) fought all this while against this barbarous King, who thought but to play with us: but if we shut him within GRECE, and bring him to fight of necessity to save his life: such an enemy that commandeth so great an Army, will no more stand still, as a looker on, and sit at his ease under his golden pavilion, to see the pastime of the battell, but will prove every way, and be himselfe in every place at all assaies to save himselfe from such a straight and danger. Thus with politick care and foresight, he may easily amend his former fault committed by negligence, and doe well enough, when he shall see his life and Kingdome both depend upon it. Therefore Themistocles, I would thinke best not to breake downe his Bridge at all, which he hath caused to be made; but rather if we could, to build another to it, to drive him out of EUROPE as soone as we could. Themistocles then replied: Seeing you thinke this were best to be done, we must all lay our heads together, to devise how he may be forced to come out as soon as we could. They breaking off with this resolution, Themistocles sent immediately one of the Kings Eunuches, called Arfaces: that was one of the Grooms of his Chamber, whom he found out amongst the Prisoners, and by him he sent this Message unto the King: That the GRECIANS having won the battell of him by sea, had decreed in their Counsell, how they would goe to the straight of HELLESPONT, to breake the Bridge of the Ships he had caused to be made there. Whereof he thought good to advertise him for the good will he did beare him, and to the end he might bethinke him betimes, to get him away to the sea with in his own Dominion, and so passe back againe into ASIA as soone as he could, whilst he gave order to his allies and confederates, to stay following him at the poepe. The barbarous King understanding this news, was so afraid that he hoised away with all possible speed. The further foresight and great wisdom of Themistocles and Aristides, in marine causes, did manifestly appeare afterwards in the battell the GRECIANS fought before the City of PLATEA, against Mardonius King Xerxes Lieutenant: who having but a small power of the King his Sovereigns there, did yet put the GRECIANS to great distresse, and in hazard to have lost all. Of all the Towns and Cities that fought in this battell, Herodotus writeth, that the City of AEGINA wanne the fame for valiantnesse above the rest: and of private men, among the GRECIANS, Themistocles was judged the worthiest man; although it was fore against their wills, because they envied much his glory. For after the battell done, all the Captaines being gotten into the straight of PELOPONNESUS, and having sworne upon the Altar of their sacrifices, that they would give their voices after their consciences, to those they thought had best deserved it: every one gave himselfe the first place for worthinesse, and the second unto Themistocles. The LACEDÆMONIANS carried him unto SPARTA, where they judged the honour and dignity of valiantnesse to their Admirall Eurybiades: but the wisdom and policie they attributed unto Themistocles. In token thereof they gave him an Olive branch, and the goodliest Coach that was in their City: and moreover they sent three hundred of their lusty youths to accompany him, and conduct him out of their Countrey. And they say, that at the next Feasts and assemblies of the playes Olympick which were made after this victory, when Themistocles was once come into the shew-place where these Games were played, the people looked no more on them that fought, but all cast their eyes on him, shewing him to the strangers which knew him not, with their fingers, and by clapping of their hands did witness how much they esteemed him. Whereat he himselfe tooke so great delight, that he confessed to his familiar friends, he then did reape the fruit and benefit of his sundry and painfull services he had taken in hand, for the preservation of GRECE: so ambitious was he of nature, and covetous of honour, as we may easily perceive by certaine of his deeds and notable sayings they have noted of him. For being chosen Admirall of ATHENS, he never dispatched any causes private or publike, howsoever they fell out, untill the very day of his departure and taking ship: and all because that men seeing him dispatch much businesse at once, and to speak with so many persons together, they should esteeme him to be the notablest man, and of the greater authority. Another time he walked upon the sands by the sea side, beholding the dead bodies of the barbarous people, which the sea had cast up upon the shore: and seeing some of them that had on still their chaines of gold and bracelets, he passed by on his way, but shewed them yet to a familiar friend of his that followed him, and said unto him: Take thou those, for thou art not Themistocles. And unto one Amiphates, who in his youth had been a goodly young boy, and at that time did scornfully behave himselfe unto him, making no reckoning of him: and now that he saw him in great authority came to see him, he said: O my young sonne and friend; we are both even at one time (but too late) growne wife. He said the ATHENIANS did not esteeme of him nor honour him in time of peace: but when any stormes of warres were towards, and they stood in any danger, they ran to him then, as men run to the shadow of a Plane tree, upon any sodaine raine: and afterwards when faire weather cometh againe, they cut away the branches and boughs thereof. There was a man borne in the Isle of SERIPHA, who being fallen out with him, did cast him in the teeth, that it was not for his worthinesse, but for the noble City wherein he was borne, that he had wonne such glory: Thou sayest true said he; but neither should I have wonne any great honour, if I had been a SERIPHIAN, nor thou also if thou hadst been an ATHENIAN. Another time one of the Captains of the City, having done good service unto the Commonweale, made boast before Themistocles, and compared his service equall with his. Themistocles to answer him, told him a pretty tale, That the Working-day brauled on a time with the Holy-day, repining against her, that he laboured for his living continually, and how she did nothing but fill her belly, and spend that they had gotten. Thou hast reason said the Holy-day: but if I had not been before thee, thou haddest not been here now.

And

And so, if I had not been then; where had you my Masters been now? His owne Sonne was a little too fawcie with his Mother, and with him also, bearing himselfe over-boldly of her good will; by meanes of her cockering of him. Whereupon being merrily disposed, he would say that his Sonne could doe more then any man in all GRECE. For, saith he, the ATHENIANS command the GRECIANS, I command the ATHENIANS, my Wife commandeth me, and my Sonne commandeth her. Moreover because he would be singular by himselfe above all other men: having a piece of Land he would sell, he willed the Cryer to proclaime open sale of it in the market-place, and withall he should add unto the sale, that his Land lay by a good neighbour. Another time, two men being suiters to his Daughter, he preferred the honeste before the richer, saying: he had rather have to his Sonne in law a man that lacked goods, then goods to lacke a man. These were Themistocles pleasant conceits and answers. But after he had done all these things we have spoken of before, he took in hand to build againe the City and walls of ATHENS, and did corrupt the Officers of LACEDÆMONIA with money, to the end they should not hinder his purpose, as Theopompus writeth: Or as all other say, when he had deceived them by this subtilty, he went unto SPARTA, as Ambassadour, sent thither of purpose upon the complaints of the LACEDÆMONIANS, for that the ATHENIANS did inclose their City againe with walls, who were accused unto the Counsell of SPARTA, by an Orator called Poliarchus, who was sent thither from AEGINETES, of purpose to prosecute this matter against the ATHENIANS. Themistocles stoutly denied it to them, and prayed them for better understanding of the troth, they would send some of their men thither to see it. This was a fetch onely to winne by this delay, the ATHENIANS so much more time to raise up their walls, and that the ATHENIANS should keepe as Hostages for surety of his person, those they should send to ATHENS to bring back the report thereof; and so it fell out. For the LACEDÆMONIANS being informed of the troth as it was, did him no hurt, but dissembling the mistaking they had to be thus abused by him, sent him away safe and sound. Afterwards he made them also mend and fortifie the haven of PIRÆA, having considered the situation of the place, and all to incline the City to the sea. Wherein he did directly contrary to all the counsell of the ancient Kings of ATHENS: who seeking (as they say) to withdraw their people from the sea, and to accustom them to live upon the land, by planting, sowing, and plowing their grounds, did devise and give out abroad, the Fable they tell of the goddesse Pallas: And that is this: How she contending with Neptune about the patronage of the Countrey of ATHENS, brought forth and shewed to the Judges the Olive-tree, by meanes whereof she prevailed and obtained the preheminance. Even so Themistocles did not joyne the haven of PIRÆA unto the City of ATHENS, as the Comickall Poet Aristophanes saith: but rather joynd the City unto the haven PIRÆA, and the land unto the sea. By this meanes he made the people strong against the Nobility, and brought the communalty to wax bolder then they were before, by reason the rule and authority fell into the hands of Saylers, Mariners, Pifors, Ship-masters, and such kinde of seafaring men: so as the Pulpit where all the Orations were made, stood in the market-place of PNIX, and did look towards the sea. But the thirty Tyrants that came in afterwards, did remove it, and turne it towards the land: holding opinion, to be strong by sea, was it that did maintaine the authority of the popular state: and that contrariwise they which live by the labour and toile of the earth, doe more willingly like the government of Nobility. Themistocles called to minde another matter alfo of greater importance, to make the City of ATHENS of greater power by sea. For after the retire of Xerxes, and that all the Fleet and Navy of the GRECIANS wintred in the haven of PEGASES: he said one day in an open assembly of the people, that he had thought of a thing which would be very profitable and beneficiall for them, but it was not to be told openly. The people willed him then to impart it to Aristides; and if he thought it good, they would execute it speedily. Themistocles then told Aristides: the thing he had considered of was to burne the Arcenall where the GRECIANS Navy lay, and to set on fire all their Shippes. Aristides hearing his purpose, returned to the people, and told them; how nothing could be more profitable, but withall more unjust, then that which Themistocles had devised. The ATHENIANS then willed Aristides it should be let alone altogether. Furthermore when the LACEDÆMONIANS had exhibited their Petition to the Counsell of the Amphictions (that is, the generall Counsell of all the states of GRECE assembled) how the Townes and Cities of GRECE which had not been parties with the GRECIANS in the League against the barbarous people, should be put off wholly from this Counsell, Themistocles doubting that if the ARGIVES, the THESSALIANS and the THEBANS also should by this meanes be exempted, that the LACEDÆMONIANS would be then the greater number in voices, and by this meanes might doe what they would in this Counsell: he spake so considerably for the Cities which they would have thus discharged, that he made the Petitioners in the assembly utterly to change their opinion. Declaring, how there were but one and thirty Cities comprised onely in the League, and yet that some of them were very weake and small: and how it were no reason, that rejecting all the rest of GRECE, the greatest authority of this Counsell should fall into the hands of two or three of the chiefe Cities alone. For this cause chiefly the LACEDÆMONIANS did ever beare him extreme hatred, and did stirre up Cimon all they could, to be alwayes adversary opposite unto him, and as it were to beard him in all matters of state, and the government of ATHENS. They procured him besides the ill will and displeasure of all the friends and confederates of the ATHENIANS, for that he went sayling still to and fro amongst the Isles, exacting Money of the inhabitants of the same. And this is to be known by the matter propounded by him to the ANDRIANS (of whom he would have had Money) and by the answer they made him, as Herodotus writeth. Which was, how he had brought brought them two mighty gods: Love and Force. And they answered him againe, that they also had two great goddesses, which kept them from giving of him any money: Poverty and Impossibility. And to make this good also, Timocreon the Rhodian Poet galled him to the quicke, when he sharply taunted him, for calling many home againe for money that were banished: and how for the covetousnesse of Money he had betrayed, and forsaken his host and Friend. The verses wherein this matter is mentioned, are to this effect:

*Who list commend worthy Pausanias, Zanthippus or good Leotychides, Yet shall I seeme but light thereof to passe, Compar'd with valiant Aristides.
For yet was nay the like in Athens towne, Nor never shall come none of like renowne.
Themistocles by right and due desert,
Is hated of Latona, for his lies,
And for he bare a traiterous Wicked heart,
Who like a Wretch, and niggard did devise,
For small reward his host Timocreon,
To hold out of his Countrey Iasion.
He took for bribe (unjustly yet therewith)
Of ready coine three talents faire and bright, Revoking such as pleas'd him, from exile,
And banishing full many a worthy knight.
Or putting them to death, without cause told,
He gave thereby great heaps of coine and Gold.
But in the end (o right reward for such)
This bribing wretch, was forced for to hold A tipling booth, most like a clowne or snuch, At holy feasts and pastimes manifold,
Which were amongst the people in those dayes, Istmiciane folke, did use the like alwayes.
And there he serv'd his guests with cold meate still,
Whilst they that tasted of his cookerie, Gan wish that they (to ease their weary will)
Had never lived, to see the treachery Of false Themistocles, and that he might No longer live, which wrought them such despight.*

After this, he did more openly blase him to the world, when he was banished and condemned, in a song that had beginning thus:

*O Muse, let these my verses be dispers'd Throughtout all Greece, since they deserve no lesse:
And since the truth which is in them rehearst, Deserveth fame, whom no man should suppress.*

They say the cause why this Timocreon was banished, was, the friendship which he had with the Barbarous people, and for giving them intelligence. Whereof Themistocles was one that judiciously condemned him. Wherefore when Themistocles himself was accused afterwards of the same fault, Timocreon then made these verses following against him:

Timocreon was not without his pbeere, Which did conferre With Medes privily, Since others mo, the self same blame might beare, No foxes lurke in dennes, as well as I.

Besides these verses; Themistocles owne Citizens for ill will they bare him, begane now with great contentment and applaude, to harken to those that gave out evill speeches and slanders of him. Therefore while he sought wayes to redresse all this, he was driven to use such means, which more increased their hatred towards him. For in his orations to the people, he did oft remember them of the good services he had done them: and perceiving how they were offended withall, he was driven to say: Why, are ye weary so often to receive good by one man? Many of them were very angry with him also, when he surnamed Diana (in the dedication of her Temple he made unto her) Aristobule, as much to say, as the good counsellor: meaning thereby, how he had given grave and wise counsell, both unto his City, and to all the rest of the Grecians. He built this Temple also neare his house, in a place called Melita, where the hang-men did cast the dead bodies of those that were executed, and throw the Ragges and halters ends of those that were hanged, or otherwise put to death by Law. There was also in our dayes in the Temple of Diana Aristobule, a little Image of Themistocles, which shewed plainly, that he was not onely wise, and of a noble minde, but also of a great majesty and countenance in the face. In the end the ATHENIANS banished him him] ATHENS for five yeares, because they would pluck downe his over great courage and authority, as they did use to serve those, whose greatnesse they thought to be more, then common equality that ought to be among Citizens would beare. For this manner of banishment for a time, called Ostracism, was no punishment for any fault committed, but a mitigation and taking away of the envie of the people, which delighted to pluck downe their stomacks that too much seemed to exceed in greatnesse: and by this means they tooke away the poyson of his malice, with diminishing his glory and honour. So Themistocles being banished from ATHENS, went to dwell in ARGOS. In this meane season, Pausanias treachery fell out, which gave his enemies occasion to lie heavy on his back. But he which became his accuser, and was partner of the treason, was one called Leobates, (Alcmeon Sonne) borne in a Village called AGRAULA. Besides this, the SPARTANS also did sit on his skirts, and charged him sorely. For Pausanias never before revealed to Themistocles the treason he had purposed, although he was his very familiar friend. But after he saw Themistocles was banished, and did take his exile very unpaciently: then Pausanias was bold to open his treason unto him, to procure him to take his part, and shewed him the Letters the King of PERSIA had written to him, and all to stirre him up against the GRECIANS, as against ungratefull and unnaturall people. Howbeit Themistocles shooke him off, and told him plainly he would be no partner of his treason. Notwithstanding, he never revealed it to any living creature, nor discovered the practise he intended: hoping either he would have given it over, or that shortly it would appeare by some other meane, considering he so fondly aspired to things of danger, and without purpose or possibility. After Pausanias was condemned, and had suffered paines of death for the same: they found amongst his papers, certaine writings and Letters, which made Themistocles to be very sore suspected. Whereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS on the one side cryed out of him, and his enemies and ill willers at ATHENS accused him one the other side. To the which he made answer by Letters from the beginning, and wrote unto the people; that it was not likely that he (who fought all the wayes to rule, and was not borne to serve, neither had any mind thereto) would ever have thought in his head, to sell his owne liberty, and the GRECIANS also unto the Barbarous people their enemies. Notwithstanding this purgation of his, the people by the procurement of his enemies, sent to apprehend him, and to bring him before the States of all GREECE, to be judged by that counsell. Whereof Themistocles having intelligence in time, he did convey himself into the Isle of CORPHU, because the City there was greatly beholding to him, for a certaine pleasure he had done them in times past. For the being at fute and strife with the CORINTHIANS he tooke up the matter betweene them, and gave judgement one their side, and condemned the CORINTHIANS to pay them twenty Talents damages: and did set downe an Order, that they should occupie the Isle of LEUCADE in common together, as ground that had been inhabited with the people, aswell of the one City, as of the other. From thence he fled to Epirus, whether being followed by the ATHENIANS and the LACEDÆMONIANS, he was compelled to venter himself upon a doubtful and very dangerous hope. For he went to yeeld himself into the hands of Admetus, King of the MOLOSSIANS. Who having heretofore made certaine requests unto the ATHENIANS, and being shamefully denied them by means of Themistocles (who then was at his chiefe height and authority) the King was marvellously offended with him: and it was a cleere case indeede, that if he could then have layed hands one him, he would have been revenged of him throughly. Howbeit feeling the present misery of his exile, he thought he might lesse feare the Kings old quarrell and displeasure, then the fresh hate and envie of his Countrey men. Whereupon he went unto King Admetus, trusting to his mercy, and became an humble suter to him in a strange extraordinary sort. For he tooke the Kings little young Sonne in his Armies, and went and kneeled downe before the Altar in his Chappell: which humble manner of suing the MOLOSSIANS take to be most effectually, and such as they dare not denie nor refuse. Some say that Queene Phibia her selfe, the Kings Wife did informe him of this their Countrey custome and manner, and brought her little Sonne also nere the Altar. Other write also, that it was Admetus himself that taught and shewed him this enforcing manner of Petition, onely for a cloke to excuse himself to those that should come to demand Themistocles of him: that by duty of Religion he was so straightly bound and restrained, that he might not deliver him out of his Protection. In this mean time Epicrates Acharnian found the meanes secretly to convey Themistocles Wife and Children out of ATHENS, and did send them privily unto him: whereupon he was afterwards accused and put to death, upon Cimon accusation and motion, as Stesimbrotus writeth. Who not remembering those matters I know not how, or making as thought Themistocles had not remembered himself to say, that Themistocles sailed into STICLE, where he sought to Marry Hieron Daughter, the Tyrant of SYRACUSA: promising him if he would let him have her, he would assure him to conquer all GREECE for him and to bring them under his obedience. But Hieron refusing this offer, Themistocles went from thence into ASIA: but that is not likely. For Theophrastus writeth in his booke intituled of Kingdomes, that Hieron having sent certaine running Horses, to the feast of the games Olimpical, and having set up a marvellous rich and sumptuous Tent there: Themistocles made an Oration to the GRECIANS, declaring unto them how the should teare the Tyrants Tents in peeces, and not to suffer his Horses to run with other swift and light Horses, and to carry away the prize in those holy games. Thucydides againe declareth how he went unto the other sea, and embarked in the City of PYDNE, being not knowne of never a man in the ship, untill such time as the wind began to carry them into the Isle of NAXOS, which they ATHENIANS by chance did besiege at that time, where being ascaied to be set on Land;

Land, he was forced to bewray himself to the Master of the ship, and the Masters mate, and wrought them, what with faire words and what with thereats (by saying he would accuse them to the ATHENIANS, that they did not ignorantly receive him in, but hired for money) so as he compelled them to faile no further, and to carry him into ASIA. As for his goods, his friends saved the most part of them, and sent them into ASIA to him. But for those that came to light, and were confiscate unto the State, Theopompus writeth, they did amount to the value of one hundred * Talents; and Theophrastus saith, but to fourescore Talents onely: whereas all his goods was not worth three * Talents, when he began to governe the State of the Commonweale. When he came unto the City of CUMA, he perceived that all the coasts by sea were layed for him to apprehend him, and that he had many spials upon him: among the which, these were two speciall noted men, Ergoteles, and one Pythodorus, the reward being very great, for men that fought their gaine any way they could. For the King of PERSIA had proclaimed by sound of Trumpet, two hundred Talents to him that brought him Themistocles. Whereupon he fled unto a little towne of AOLIA, called ÆGES, where no living body knew him, but his host onely, called Nicogenes: who was the richest man of all the AOLIANS, and knew all the Noble men of authority that were about the King of PERSIA. Themistocles continued hidden certaine dayes in his house: in which time, on a night after the feast of a sacrifice, one Olbius, schoolemaster to Nicogenes Children, by some secret working of the gods, suddenly fell besides himself, and began to sing these verses out aloud:

*Do thou beleeve what so the night thee tels,
And give they voice thy counsell and conceits Unto the night, in darknessenesse that dwells, Thereon also thy victory awaits.*

The next night following, Themistocles being fast asleepe in his bed, dreamed that a Snake wound it self round about his Belly, and glided upwards to his necke, untill it touched his face, and suddenly then it became an Eagle, and imbraced him with his wings: and so at length did lift him up in the ayre, and carried him a marvellous way off, untill he thought he saw a golden rodde (such as Herald's use to carry in their hand) whereupon the Eagle did set him, and so was delivered of all this feare and trouble he thought himself in. The troth was, Nicogenes had this device in his head, how he might bring him safe to the King of PERSIAES court. The Barbarous Nations for the most part (and specially the PERSIANS) are of a very strange nature, and marvellous jealous over their Women, and that not onely of their Wives, but also of their bondwomen, and concubines: which they keepe so straightly locked up, that no man ever seeth them abroad at any time, but are alwaies like Houfe-doves. And when they have any occasion to goe into the Countrey, they are carried in clofe choaches covered all about, that no man can looke into them. Themistocles was conveyed into one of these coaches drest after this manner, and had warned his men to answer those they met by the way, that asked whom they carried: that it was a young GRECIAN gentlewoman of the Countrey of IONIA, which they carried to the Court for a Noble man there. Thucydides, and Charon Lampiscenian say, he went thither after the death of Xerxes, and spake with his soone there. But Ephorus, Dino, Clitarchus, Heraclides, and many other write, that he spake with himselfe. Yet notwithstanding it appeareth that Thucydides words doe best agree with the Chronicles and Tables, recording the succession of times, although they be of no great certainty. Themistocles being come now to the sword's point (as it were) and to the extremity of his danger, did first present him unto one Artabanus, Colonell of a thousand footmen, and said unto him: Sir, I am a GRECIAN borne, and desire to speake with the King: I have matters of importance to open to his Majesty, and such as I know he will thankfully receive. Artabanus answered him in this manner: My friend fir stranger, the Lawes and cutomes of men are diverse, and some take one thing for honest, other some another thing: but it is most honesty for all men, to keepe and observe the Lawes and manners of their owne Countrey. For you GRECIANS have the name to love Liberty, and equality above all things: and for us, amongst all the goodly Lawes and customs we have, we esteeme this above the rest: to reverence and honour our King, as the Image of the God of nature, who keepeth all things in their perfect life and state. Wherefore, if thou wilt fashion thy self after our manner to honour the King, thou maiest both see him, and speake with him: but if thou have another minde with thee, then must thou of necessity use some third person for thy meane. For this is the manner of our Countrey: the King never giveth audience to any man, that hath not first honoured him. Themistocles hearing what he said, answered him againe: My Lord Artabanus, the great good will I beare unto the King, and the desire I have to advance his Glory and Power, is the onely cause of my present repaire unto his Court: therefore I meane not onely to obey your Lawes (since it hath so pleased the gods to raise up the Noble Empire of PERSIA unto this greatnesse) but will cause many other people also to honour the King, more then there do at this present. Therefore let there be no stay, but that my selfe in person may deliver to the King that I have to say unto him. Well, said Artabanus, Whom then shall we say thou art? For by thy speech it seemeth, thou art a man of no meane state and condition. Themistocles answered him: As for that Artabanus, none shall know before the King himselfe. Thus doth Phanias report it. But Eratosthenes, in his Booke he wrote of riches, addeth further: how Themistocles had access unto this Artabanus, being recommended to the King by a Woman of of ERETRIA, whom the King kept. Themistocles being brought to his presence, after he had presented his humble duty and reverence to him, stood one his feete, and said never a word, untill the King commanded the interpreter to aske him what he was? and he answered: May it please your Majesty, O Noble King, I am Themistocles the ATHENIAN, a banished man out of my Countrey by the GRECIANS, who humbly repaireth to your Highnesse, knowing I have done great hurt to the PERSIANS, but I perswade my selfe I have done them far more good then harme. For it was that kept the GRECIANS backe they did not follow you, when the state of GRECE was delivered from thralldome, and my native Countrey from danger, and that I knew I stood in good state to pleasure you. Now for me, I finde all mens good wills agreeable to my present misery and calamity: for I come determined, most humbly to thanke your Highnesse for any grace and favour you shall shew me, and also to crave humble pardon if your Majesty be yet offended with me. And therefore licence me (most noble King) to beseech you, that taking mine enemies the GRECIANS for witness of the pleasures I have done the PERSIAN nation, you will of your princely grace use my hard fortune as a good occasion to shew your honourable vertue, rather then to satisfie the passion of your heat and choler. For in saving my life, your Majesty saveth an humble suter that put himself to your mercy: and in putting me to death, you shall rid away an enemy of the GRECIANS. Having spoken thus these words, he said further: That the gods by diverse signs and tokens had procured him to come to submit himself unto him, and told the King what vision he had seene in his dreame in Nicogenes house: and declared also the Oracle of Jupiter Dodanian, who had commanded him that he should goe unto him that was called as a god, and how he thought it was the person of his Majesty, because that god and he in troth were called both great Kings. The King having thus heard him speake, gave him then no present answer againe, notwithstanding he marvellously wondred at his great wisdom and boldnesse. But afterwards amongst his familiars the King said, he thought himselfe very happy to meete with the good fortune of Themistocles coming to him: and so besought his great god Arimanius, that he would alwayes send his enemies such minds, as to banish the greatest and wisest men amongst them. It is reported also he did sacrifice unto the gods, to give them thanks therefore, and disposed himselfe presently to be merry. Infomuch as dreaming in the night, in the midst of his dreame he cried out three times together for joy: I have Themistocles the ATHENIAN. The next morning the King having sent for the chieft Lords of his Court, he made Themistocles also to be brought before him: who looked for no goodnesse at all, specially when he saw the souldiers warding at the Court gates, give him ill countenance and language both, when they beheld him, and understood his name. Moreover Raxanes, one of the captaines, as Themistocles passed by him going to the King; (who was set in his chaire of state, and every man keeping silence) softly sighing, said unto him: O thou Greekish serpent, subtle and malicious, the Kings good fortune hath brought thee hither. Nevertheless when he came to the King, and had once againe made him a very humble and low reverence: the King saluted him, and spake very courteously to him, saying: I am now your debtor of two hundred Talents, for presenting your self. It is good reason I should deliver you the money promised him that should have brought you: but I give you a further warrant, be bold I charge you, and speake your minde freely, say what you think of the state of GRECE. Themistocles then answered him: That mens words did properly resemble the stories and imagerie in a peece of arras: for both in the one and in the other, the goodly Images of either of them are seene, when they are unfolded and laid open. Contrariwise they appeare not, but are lost, when they are shut up, and clofe folded: whereupon he said to the King: he must needs require some further time of answer. The King liked his comparison passing well, and willed him to appoint his owne time. Themistocles asked a yeare: in which time having pretily learned the Persian tongue, he afterwards spake to the King himself without any interpreter. So, such as were no Courtiers, thought he only talked with the King of matters of GRECE. But because the change and alteration of the court fell out great at that time, the noble men imagined he had been so bold to commune with the King of them also. Thereupon they greatly envied him, and afterwards murmured much against him. For indeed the King did honour Themistocles above all other strangers whatsoever they were. On a time the King had him out a hunting with him, he made him see his Mother, with whom he grew familiar: and by the Kings owne commandement he was to heare the disputations of the wise men of PERSIA touching secret Philosophie, which they call Magike. Demaratus the LACEDÆMONIAN being at that time in the court of PERSIA, the King willing him to aske what gift he would, he besought the King to grant him this favour: to licence him to goe up and downe the City of SARDIS with his royall Hat on his head as the Kings of PERSIA do. Mithropanstes, the Kings cousin, taking him by the hand, said unto him: Demaratus, the Kings hat thou demandest, and if it were on thy head, it would cover but little wit: Nay, though Jupiter did give thee his lightning in thy hand, yet that would not make thee Jupiter. But the King gave him so sharpe a repulse for his unreasonable request, and was so angry with him for it, that it was thought he would never have forgiven him: howbeit Themistocles was so earnest a suter for him, that he brought him into favour againe. And the report goeth, that the Kings successours which have been since that time, under whom the PERSIANS have had more dealings with the GRECIANS, then in former dayes: when they would retain any great state or personage of GRECE into their service, they wrote unto him, and promised him they would make him greater about them, then ever was Themistocles about Xerxes. That which is written of him, doth also confirme it. For he being stept up to great countenance and authority, and followed with great great good prosperity and victory, some bitter adversity and overthrow be predestined unto us: I beseech you then (most mercifull gods) in sparing our City of ROME, and this her Army, you will (with as little hurt as may be) let it all fall and light upon my person alone. And as he had spoken these words, and was turning on his right hand (according to the manner of the ROMANES after they have prayed unto the gods) he fell downe flat before them all. The standers by taking this fall for an ill token, were somewhat troubled with the matter: but after he got up on his feete againe, he told them that the thing he requested of the gods was happened unto him. And that was, a little hurt, in exchange of a great good fortune. So the whole City being spoiled and rifled, he was also desirous to carry Junus Image to ROME, to accomplish the vow he had made. And having sent for workmen for this purpose, he did sacrifice first unto the goddesse, beseeching her to accept well of the ROMANES good will, and that she would willingly vouchsafe to come and dwell with the other gods, who had the protection of the City of ROME. Some say, that the Image answered, she was contented. But Livius writeth, that Camillus made this prayer as he touched the Image, and that the assistants answered she was contented, and would go with a good will. Yet they which do affirm, it was the Image self that spake, do favour this miracle, grounding their proof upon the opinion of the fortune of ROME: the which, from so base and meane beginning had impossibily attained unto so high glory and power as it had, without the singular favour of the gods: and that hath manifestly appeared unto the world, by sundry great proofs and examples. They bring forth also such otherlike wonders: As, that Images have heretofore let fall drops of sweat from them: that they have been heard to sigh: that they have turned, and that they have made certaine signes with their eyes, as we finde written in many ancient stories. And we could our selves also tell such like wonders, which we have heard men of our time affirme, which are not incredible, nor lightly to be condemned. But for such matters, it is as dangerous to give too much credit to them, as also to discredit them too much, by reason of the weaknesse of mans nature, which hath no certaine bounds, nor can rule it selfe, but runneth sometimes after vanity and superstition, and otherwhile also despiseth and contemneth holy and divine matters: and therefore the meane is the vertue, and not to go too far in this, as in all other things besides, it is the best. Now Camillus, whether his late enterprise performed, in winning a City that stood out with ROME, and held siege with them ten years together, had put him into an overweening or conceit of himselfe: or that the words of the people, which did blesse and praise him, had made him looke high, and presume upon himselfe, more then became the modesty of a civil Magistrate and Governour of the Commonweale, and one that was subject to the Law: he shewed a faterly triumph, set forth with all rich furniture, and specially for that himselfe was carried through ROME upon his triumphant Chariot drawn with foure faire white coursers. This, never Captaine nor Generall before him durst undertake to doe, neither any ever after him attempted it: for they thinke it as a sacred carriage, and only meet for the King and Father of the gods. This bred him much envy amongst the Citizens, which had not been acquainted with so great statelinessse. There was another occasion also that made them mislike him much: which was, because he stood against the Law put forth that they should divide the City of ROME. For the Tribunes of the people did set out an Edict, that the Senate and people of ROME should be divided into two parts: and that those on whom the Lot should fall, should abide still in ROME, and the other should goe dwell in the new won City of VEIES. These were the reasons to perswade this: that both the one and the other sort should be richer then they were before, and should more easily keep their Lands and Goods from the invasion of their enemies, by means of these two great Cities. The people which were multiplied now into great numbers, and had served dutifully and dangerously, thought it the best way in the world: Therefore they still cried out, and thronged with great tumult, about their Pulpit for Orations, praying that this Law might be put unto the voices of the people. But the whole Senate, and wisest Citizens among them, judging this motion of the Tribunes would be the destruction, and not the division of the City of ROME, could in no wise abide it should goe any further. Whereupon they went and prayed Camillus helpe: who fearing to bring it to the point, whether the Law should passe or no, did alwayes seeke new occasions and lets, still to delay and put off the matter, and stay the confirmation of this Law. For these causes, he was hated of the common people. But the originall and apparent cause of the peoples ill will towards him, was for taking from them the tenth part of their spoiles: and it was not altogether without some reason, and to say truly the people did him much wrong to beare him such malice for that. For before he went to the City of VEIES, he made a solemne vow to offer the tenth part unto the gods, of the spoiles of the City, if he won the same. But when it was taken and sacked, whether it was that he was loth to trouble the Citizens, or having a world of businesse in his head, that he easily forgot his vow, he suffered the Souldiers to divide the spoile amongst them, and to take the benefit to themselves. Shortly after he was discharged of his charge, he did enforce the Senate of his vow. Furthermore, the Soothsayers made report at that very time, how they knew by certaine signes and tokens of their Sacrifices, that the gods were offended for somewhat, and how they must of necessity be pacified againe. Whereupon the Senate presently made an Order, where it was unpossible every man should bring in againe the selfe same things he had gotten, to make a new division of every mans share: that every one therefore upon his Oath should present the tenth part of his gaine he had gotten by that booty. There was great trouble about it. They were driven to use great extremity to the poore Souldiers (which had travelled fore, and taken great paines in the warres) to make them restore backe such a collop out of their gaine, and the rather, because many of them had already spent it every penny: and for

for this trouble, they all cried out with open mouth against Camillus. But he (not knowing otherwise how to excuse himselfe) was forced to bring forth as cold and as unreasonable an excuse as he could make, which was forsooth, that he had forgotten his Vow he had made: The people notwithstanding were eager still against him, saying, how he had vowed then to offer the tenth part of the enemies goods to the gods, and that now he would performe it with the tenths of the Citizens goods. Nevertheless every man having brought that he should for his part, it was thought good they should cause a massie cup of gold to be made to send to the Temple of Apollo at DELPHES. And small store of gold being in the City of ROME, as the Officers of the City were searching up and down to get it, the women of ROME of their own voluntary wils without motion, agreed among themselves, that they would depart with all the jewels they had towards the making up of this Offering, which came to the weight of eight talents. In recompence whereof to honour them withall, the Senate ordained that they should be praised openly with Funeral Orations at their buriall, as they did use at honourable and noble mens obsequies. For before that Law it was not the manner to praise Women openly at their Funerals: Now there were appointed three of the noblest men of the City to goe to carry this Offering, and they sent them out in a galley well manned, stored also with good Mariners, and trimly set forth in all triumphing manner; howbeit both in storm and calme weather, they were in danger of their lives. For after that they had escaped drowning very narrowly by tempest, when the winde was downe againe, they fell into another danger which they escaped also beyond all hope. For hard by the Isles of Æolus, the galleys of the LIPARIANS fell upon them, as if they had been rovers. But when the LIPARIANS saw they made no resistance, and entreated them, holding up their hands, they gave no further charge upon them, but only fastened their galley unto theirs. So when they had haled them to the shore, they declared they were Pyrats, and offered to make port-sale of the men and goods, as if they had been a lawful prize, and had sold them indeed, had not the wifedome and authority of Timisthenes letted them, who was Governour at that time of the City, and had great ado to perswade them to let them goe. And he did not so leave them, but sent out certain of his owne Ships to accompany them in their journey, who did help them to goe and performe their offering. For which courtesie of his, the ROMANES afterwards did him great honour at ROME, according to his well-deserving. The Tribunes of the people began now to set on foot against the Law for the dividing of the Inhabitants of ROME unto the City of VEIES. But the wars of the FALISCES fell out happily at that time, whereby the Noble men did chuse such Officers as they would. So they chose Camillus, Tribunus militaris of the Souldiers, and five others to assist him, the service in that case requiring a General that carried both authority and reputation among them, as an old experienced Souldier in the warres. When the people had confirmed the Election, Camillus immediatly entred the territories of the FALISCES with the ROMANES Army, where he laid siege unto the City of the FALERIANS, being very well fortified, victualled and stored, with all other munition of warre. Knowing therefore that it was no small attempt to win this City, and that it would not be done in a short time, he politickly sought (whatsoever came of it) to keep his Countrey men occupied about some thing, and to stay them for going home, lest by repairing to ROME they should have many occasions to rebell, and raise some civill dissention. For the ROMANES did wisely use this remedy to disperse abroad like good Physicians the humours which troubled the quiet state of their commonweale at home. But the FALERIANS trusting in the situation of their City, which was very strong in all parts, made so little account of the Siege, that those which kept not watch upon the wals, walked up and downe in their Gownes in the City, without any weapon about them, and their Children went to School, the School-Master also would commonly leade them abroad out of the City a walking, to play and passe the time by the Town-wals. For the whole City had one common School-Master, as the GRECIANS also have, which do bring up their Children from little ones in company together, because one may be familiarly acquainted with another. This School-master spying his time to do the FALERIANS a shrewd turn, did accustomably take all his Scholars out of the City with him, to play not farre from the wals at the beginning, and afterwards brought them into the City againe after they had played their fill. Now after he had led them abroad thus once or twice, he trained them out every day a little further, to make them to be bold, perswading them there was no danger. But at the length, one day having gotten all the Citizens children with him, he led them within the watch of the ROMANES Campe, and there delivered all his Scholars into their hands, and praised them they would bring him unto their General. So they did. And when he came before Camillus, he began to tell him that he was School-Master unto all these Children, nevertheless that he did more esteeme to have his grace and favour, then regard his office he had by this Name and Title. Camillus hearing what he said, and beholding his treacherous part, he said to those that were about him: Warre of it selfe surely is an evil thing, for in wars many injuries and mischiefs are done: Nevertheless among good men there is a Law and discipline, which doth forbid them to seeke Victory by wicked and traitorous means, and that a noble and worthy General should make warre, and procure Victory by trusting to his owne valiantnesse, and not by another vilenesse and villany. Therefore he commanded his Sergeants to teare the clothes off the backe of this vile School master, and to binde his hands behinde him; and that they should give the Children rods and whips in their hands, to whip the Traytor back again into the City, that had betrayed them, and grieved their Parents. Now when the FALERIANS heard news that the School-master had thus betrayed them, all the City fell a weeping (as every man may think for so great a losse).

Herald before to ROME, to demand livery of the man that had offended him, that he might punish him accordingly. In the mean time he himselfe came marching after, by small journeys, to receive their answer. The Senate hereupon assembled, and many of the Senators blamed the rashnesse of the Fabians; but most of all the Priests called Feciales. For they followed it very earnestly, as a matter that concerned Religion and the honour of the gods; declaring how the Senate in discharge of all the residue of the City of the offence committed, should lay the whole weight and burthen of it upon him alone, that onely had done the fact. Numa Pompilius the justest and most peaceable of all the Kings of ROME that had been, was he that first erected the Colledge of these Feciales, and did ordaine that they should be the Keepers of peace, and the Judges to hear and allow all the causes for the which they should justly begin any warres. Nevertheless the Senate in the end turned over the ordering of the matter unto the whole will and judgement of the people, before whom these Priests Feciales did also accuse Fabius Ambustus. The people made so little account of their propounded Religion, and honour of the gods in that case, that instead of delivering of this Fabius unto the enemy, they did chuse him for one of the Tribunes of the Souldiers with his Brothers. The GAULES understanding this were so furious and angry thereat, that they would no longer linger their journeys, but marched with all speed unto ROME. The people that dwelt by the High-waies where they should passe by, were marvellously afraid to see the multitude of them, and their brave and univerfall furniture; and beginning to doubt the fury of their rage, they imagined first of all that they would destroy all the champion country before them, and afterwards would take all the strong Cities. They contrariwise did take nothing at all out of the fields, neither did any hurt or displeasure unto any body; but passing by their Cities, cried out they went to ROME, and would have no wars but with the ROMANES, and how otherwise they desired to be friends with all the world. These barbarous people marching on in this wise towards ROME, the Tribunes of the Souldiers brought their Army to the field to encounter them. They were no lesse in number then the GAULES, for they were 40000 Footmen; howbeit most part of them were raw Souldiers, that had never served in the wars before. They were very carelesse of the gods, and dissolute in matters of Religion; for they passed neither for good signes in their Sacrifices, neither to aske counsell of their Soothsayers, which the ROMANES were religiously wont to doe before they gave any battel: To make the matter worse, the number of the Captaines having power and authority alike, did as much (or more then the rest) disorder and confound their doings. For oftentimes before in far lesser matters and dangers then these, they did use to chuse special Officers that had sole and soveraigne authority, which they called Dilators; knowing very well of how great importance it is in dangerous times to have but one head and General, to command all, and to have supreme authority of justice in his hands, and not to be bound to deliver account of his doings to any. The injury also which they had so ingratefully done to Camillus, brought great mischief and inconvenience then upon them. For the Captaines after him durst no more command the people roughly, but ever after did flatter them much. When their Army was now brought into the field, they encamped themselves by a little River called Alia, about the eleventh stone from ROME; and not farre from the place where the same River falleth into Tyber. Thither came the barbarous Army to them, who overthrew them in battel by their discord and lack of government: For the left point or wing of their battel was broken off at the first by the GAULES, who charged them so furiously that they drave them headlong into the River. The right wing then retiring out of the plaine, before they had any charge given, and having gotten certaine hills hard by them, they had little hurt, and most of them saving themselves did recover ROME againe. The rest that escaped after the enemies were weary of killing, fled by night unto the City of VEIES, thinking ROME had been lost, and all the City put to the Sword. This overthrow was on the longest day in Summer, the Moone being at the full; and the day before fortun'd the great slaughter of the Fabians, of the which were slain by the THUSCANES in one day 300 all of a Name. The very day it selfe was afterwards called Alia fl., of the name of the little River, by the which the second overthrow was given. But for the difference of daies, that some of them are naturally unfortunate, or that Heracitus the Philosopher had reason to reprove the Poet Hesiodus, for making some daies good, and some daies ill, as though he understood they were not all of one nature: we have written and declared our opinion thereof in other places. Yet because the matter delivereth present occasion to speake of the same, peradventure it will not be amiss to alledge a few Examples of it onely. It fortun'd the BOEOTIANS on a time to winne two honourable Victories, on the first day of the Moneth they call Hippodromus (and which the ATHENIANS call Hecatombæon) that is now the Moneth of June, by either of the which they did still restore the GRECIANS to their liberty. One was the battell of LEUCITRES, the other was the battell of GERASTE, which was twenty years before, when they overcame Dattamias, and the THESSALIANS in battel. The PERSIANS contrarily were overcome in battel by the GRECIANS the sixth day of August at the journey of MARATHON. The third day at the battell of PLATES. And on the selfe same day near unto MYCALA. On the five and twentieth day at the fight of ARBELES, the ATHENIANS won the battel by Sea near unto the Isle of NAXOS, under the charge and government of Chabrias, about the full of the Moone, in the Moneth of August. And on the twentieth of the same Moneth, they won the battell of SALAMINA; as we have written more amply in our History of difference of daies. The Moneth of April also brought to the barbarous people many notable losses. For Alexander the Great overcame the General of the King of PERSIA, at the field of GRANICA in the said Moneth. The CARTHAGINIANS

CARTHAGINIANS also were vanquished in CICILE by Timoleon, on the seven and twentieth day thereof. On which day also it is thought the City of TROY was taken; as Ephorus, Calisthenes, Damastes, and Phylarchus, have written in their Histories. Now contrariwise the moneth of July which the BOEOTIANS call Panemus, hath not been gracious to the GRECIANS. For on the seventh day of the same they were overthrown by Antipater at the battel of CRANON, which was their utter destruction. They had before also lost a battel the same moneth, near unto the City of CHERONEA, by King Philip. On the same day also, and in the very selfe moneth and yeare, those which came into ITALY with King Archidamus were slaine every one of them, by the barbarous people of the Countrey. The CARTHAGINIANS also fear the 27. day of the same moneth, as the day which had beforetime brought them into many great and forrowful calamities. Contrarily also I know very well how about the Feast of Mysteries the City of THEBES was destroyed by Alexander, and that the ATHENIANS were compelled to receive a garison of souldiers into their City, about the 20 day of August, at which time they made the holy procession of the mysteries of Iacchus. And on the selfe same day the ROMANES lost their Army, and their Generall Cepio, who was slain by the CIMBRES. And how afterwards under the leading of Lucullus, they overcame King Tigranes, and the ARMENIANS. And that Attalus and Pompey also died both on the selfe same day they were born. To conclude, infinite examples of men might be brought, unto whom after like revolutions of time there happened notable chances of good or ill. But to returne againe unto our History. The day of this overthrow is one of those which the ROMANES take for one of the unfortunatest daies that ever came unto them. And by reason of that day they reckon two other daies of every Moneth very unfortunate, engendred through feare and superstition, which spreadeth farre (as commonly it doth) upon such sinister misfortunes. But for this matter we have written more largely and exquisitely in the Booke we made, of the Ceremonies and customes of the ROMANES. Now after this battel lost, if the GAULES had hotly pursued the chase of their flying enemies, nothing could have saved ROME from being taken, and the Inhabitants thereof from being put unto the Sword; for the ROMANES that fled from the battel brought such a fear upon those that received them, and filled the whole City of ROME with such grief and trembling, that they wist not what to doe. The barbarous people againe beleiving little their victory was so great as it was, fell to make good cheer for so great a joy received, and divided among them the spoile of their enemies goods they found in the Campe. So gave they time and leisure by this means, to the multitude of people that fled out of ROME, to seeke them some place of safety; and to such as remained still they left good hope to save themselves, and to make some provision for defence. Thereupon they all fortified themselves within Mount Capitoll, and storing it with all kinde of victuall, armour, and munition, they wholly did forsake the rest of the City. But the first work they tooke in hand was this: They did bring into their said fort, part of their sacred reliques: and the professed Vestals brought thither also their holy fire and all other their holy monuments. Some Writers say, that they had nothing else in keeping, but the sempiternall fire, and were so consecrated by King Numa, who did first institute, that the fire should be worshipped, as the beginning of all things. For that it is the most motive and quickest substance that is of all natural things; notwithstanding that generation also is a moving, or at the least not done without motion. For we see that all other substance which lacketh heat, remaineth idle and without action, end stirreth nor, no more then doth a dead thing, which craveth the force and heat of fire; as the soule it selfe recovering heate, beginneth somewhat to move, and disposeth it selfe to doe and suffer something. Wherefore Numa being (as they say) a man of great learning and understanding, who for his wisdom was reported to talke many times with the Muses, did consecrate the same as a most sacred thing, and commanded that they never should suffer that fire to goe out, but to keepe it, as they would preserve the lively Image of the eternal God, the only King and maker of the world. Others say, that the fire burned continually there before the holy and sacred things, signifying a kinde and manner of purification; which opinion the GRECIANS hold also; howbeit behinde the same fire there were certain hidden things, which in no case any might see but those holy Vestall Nuns. Many also hold an opinion, that the Palladium of TROY (as much to say as Pallas image) is hidden also there, which was brought by Aeneas into ITALY. Other do report also that Dardanus at that time when he first began to build the City of TROY, brought thither the holy Images of the gods of SAMOTHRACIA, and he did offer them up there; and how Aeneas after the City was taken did steale them away, and kept them until he came to dwell in ITALY. Some other also that take upon them to know more therein then the common sort do, hold opinion, that there are two pipes not very great, whereof the one is empty and standeth open, the other is full and fast locked up, howbeit they are not to be seen but by these holy Nunnes. Other thinke also, that these imaginers invented that they spake of their own heads, because the Vestall Nunnes did cast all that they could put in at that time into two pipes, which they buried after in the ground, within the Temple of Quirinus; and therefore that very place carrieth the surname at this day of pipes. Howbeit they carried about them the most precious things they had, and fled along the River; where one Lucius Albinus (one of the common people) flying also, and having brought away his Wife and little children, and other household stuffe he had in a Cart, by chance he lighted upon the Vestall Nunnes in the way. But so soone as he perceived these holy Nunnes (carrying the blessed Reliques and Jewels in their armes dedicated unto the service of the gods) all alone, and that they were weary with going a foot; He caused his Wife and his Children to come out of the Cart, and tooke downe all his goods.

also, and willed them to get them up, and fly into some City or Towne of GRECE. Thus methought I could not well passe over with silence, Albius reverence and devotion he shewed unto the gods in so dangerous a time and pinch of extremity. Furthermore the Priests of other gods, and the most honourable old men of the City of ROME (that had been Consuls beforetime, or had past the honour of triumph) had not the heart to forsake ROME; but putting on all their most holy robes and vestments, did vow, and as it were willingly sacrificed themselves unto the fortune that should befall them for the safety of their Countrey. And using certaine words and Prayers which their high Bishop Fabius had taught them, they went even thus apparelled into the great market-place, and did sit them downe there in chairs of Ivory, expecting the goodwill and pleasure of the gods what should become of them. But within three daies after Brennus came to ROME with his Army, who finding the gates of the City all open, and the Walls without watch, he doubted some devise in it, and feared some privy ambush had been laid, as one hardly beleeving to have found the ROMANES of so base a minde as to forsake their City: After being informed of the truth, he entred into ROME by the gate Collina, and tooke the same little more then 360 yeares after it was first builded; if it be true at the least that there hath remained any certaine Chronicles of those times unto this present day, considering the trouble and confusion of that time hath made many things more certain then that doubtful unto us. But so it was, that the rumour ran to GRECE incontinently how ROME was taken, but yet withal somewhat doubtfully and uncertainly. For Heraclides Ponticus (who was about that time) saith in a certaine Booke he wrote of the Soule, that there was news come from the West part, that an Army which came from the HYPERBORIANS had taken a City of GRECE called ROME, situated in that Countrey neare the great Sea. But I wonder not that Heraclides (who hath written so many other fables and lies) did amplify the true newes of the taking of ROME, with adding too of his own device, of the HYPERBORIANS, and by the great Sea. It is a most true tale, that Aristotle the Philosopher had certaine knowledge it was taken by the GAULES; howbeit he saith also it was recovered againe afterwards by one called Lucius; where indeed it was by Marcus Camillus, and not by Lucius. But all this in manner is spoken by conjecture. Moreover Brennus being entred ROME did appoint part of his souldiers to besiege those which were gotten into Mount Capitol. And he with the residue of his Army marched on towards the Market-place, where when he saw the ancient Senators sit so gravely in their chairs, and spake never a word, nor offered once to rise, though they saw their enemies come armed against them, neither changed countenance nor colour at all, but leaped softly on their staves they had in their hands, seeming to be nothing afraid nor abashed, but looked one upon another, he marvelously wondered at it. This their so strange manner at the first did so dampe the GAULES, that for a space they stood still, and were in doubt to come near to touch them, fearing lest they had been some gods, until such time as one of them went boldly unto Marcus Papyrius, and laid his hand faire and softly upon his long beard: But Papyrius gave him such a rap on the pate with his Staffe, that he made the bloud run about his ears. This barbarous beast was in such a rage with the blow, that he drew out his Sword and slue him. The other Souldiers also killed all the rest afterwards, and so the GAULES continued many daies spoiling and sacking all things they found in the houses, and in the end did set them all on fire, and destroyed them every one, for despite of those that kept the Fort of the Capitoll, and would not yield upon their Summons, but valiantly repulsed them when they scaled the walls. For this cause they razed the whole City, and put all to the Sword that came in their hands, young and old, man, woman, and childe. Now this sieg continuing long, and the ROMANES holding them out very stoutly, victuals began to grow scant in the Campe of the GAULES, insomuch as they were driven of force to seeke it abroad without the City. Hereupon they divided themselves, whereof some remained still with the King at the Siege of the Capitoll, and the rest went a foraging and spoiling all the Champion Countrey and Villages thereabouts. scattered as it were by Bands and Companies, some here, some there, fearing nothing, nor passing upon watch or ward, they lived in such security of their victory. Howbeit the greatest company amongst them went by fortune towards the City of ARDEA where Camillus dwelt, living like a private man, meddling with no matters of state from the time of his exile until that present time. But then he began not to thinke himselfe as a man that was in safety, and might have escaped the hands of his enemies, but rather fought to devise and finde out all the means he could to subdue them if occasion were so offered. Whereupon considering that the Inhabitants of ARDEA were enough in number to set upon them, although faint-hearted and cowardly, by reason of the sloth and negligence of their Governours and Captaines, who had no manner of experience in the warres: he began to cast out these words among the young men: That they should not thinke the ROMANES misfortune fell upon them, through the valiantnesse of the GAULES, nor that their calamity (who had refused good counsell) had happened unto them by any worke or act of the GAULES, having done nothing for their part to make them carry away the victory; but that they should thinke it was no other thing, but Fortune alone that would needs shew her power. Therefore that it were now a notable and honourable enterprise (although somewhat dangerous) to drive these strangers and barbarous people out of their Countrey; considering that the onely end of their victory was, but to destroy and consume as fire all that fell into their hands. Wherefore if they would but only take a good lusty heart and courage unto them, he would with opportunity and space, assure them the victory without any danger. The young men were pleased with these words of life and comfort. Whereupon Camillus went to breake the matter also unto the Magistrates and Counsellors, and having drawne them by perswasion unto this enterprise, he armed all that were of age to carry armour, and would not suffer a man to goe out of the City for feare lest the enemies (which were not farre off) should have intelligence of the same. Now after the GAULES had run over all the Champion Countrey, and were loaden with all sorts of spoils, they did encampe themselves negligently in open fields, and never charged watch nor ward; but having their full carriage of wine laid them down to sleepe, and made no noise at all in their Campe. Camillus being advertised thereof by his severall scouts, caused the ARDEANS with as little noise as might be, forthwith to go out into the fields, and having marched somewhat roundly the distance betwene the City and the Campe of the GAULES, they came thither much about midnight. Then he made his Souldiers make great shouts and cries, and the Trumpets to be sounded on every side, to put a feare in their enemies, who yet with all the loud noise they made could hardly be made to wake, they were so deadly drunk. Yet there were some notwithstanding that for feare to be taken tardy did budge up at this sudden noise, and coming to themselves fell to their weapons to resist Camillus, which were slain by and by. The rest and the greatest number of them lay here and there scattered in the midst of the field without any weapon dead asleepe, stark drunke with wine, and were put to the Sword and never strake stroak. Those that fled out of the Campe that night (which were but few in number) were overthrowne also the next day by the Horlemen that followed and killed them as they tooke them stragling here and there in the Fields. The bruit of this Victory was blowne abroad incontinently through all the Towns and Villages thereabouts, which caused many young men to come and joyn themselves to Camillus: but specially the ROMANES desired the same, that had saved themselves in the City of VEIES, after the Battell lost at ALLIA, who made their moans among themselves there, saying, O gods, what a Captaine hath Fortune taken from the City of ROME? What honour hath the City of ARDEA by the valiantnesse and worthy deeds of Camillus; and in the meane season his natural City that brought him forth is now lost and utterly destroyed? We, for lacke of a Captaine to leade us are shut up here within others walls, and do nothing but suffer ITALY in the meane space to goe to ruine and utter destruction before our eyes. Why then do we not fend to the ARDEANS for our Captaine? or why do we not arme our selves to goe unto him? For he is now no more a banished man, nor we poore Citizens; since our City is possessed with the foreign power of our hatefull enemies. So they all agreed to this counsel, and sent unto Camillus to beseech him to be their Captaine and leade them. But he made answer, he would in no case consent unto it, unlesse they that were besieged in the Capitoll had lawfully first confirmed it by their voices. For those (said he) so long as they remaine within the City, doe represent the state and body thereof. Therefore if they commanded him to take this charge upon him, he would most willingly obey them; if otherwise they misliked of it, that then he would not meddle against their good wils and commandment. They having received this answer, there was not a ROMANE against them but greatly honoured and extolled the wisdom and justice of Camillus. But now they knew not how to make them privy unto it that were besieged in the Capitoll; for they saw no possibility to convey a messenger to them; considering the enemies were Lords of the City, and laid sieg to it. Howbeit it there was one Pontius Cominius among the young men (a man of a meane house, but yet desirous of honour and glory) that offered himselfe very willingly to venter to get in if he could. So he tooke no Letters to carry to them that were besieged, for feare lest they might be intercepted, and so they should discover Camillus intention; but putting on an illfavoured gown upon him, he conveyed certaine peeces of cork under it, and travelling at noone daies kept on his way without feare until he came to ROME, bringing dark night with him. And because he could not passe by the Bridge, for that the barbarous people kept watch upon it, he wrapped such clothes as he had about his necke (which were not many nor heavy) and tooke the River, and swimming with these corks he had brought, at the length he got over to the other side where the City stood. Then taking up those lanes alwaies where he thought the enemies were not, seeing fire, and hearing noise in other places, he went into the gate Carmentis, where he found more silence then in other places; on the which side also the hill of the Capitoll was more steep and upright, by reason of the great rocks that were hard to climbe up upon. But he digged and crept up so long amongst them, that he got up with great paine unto the wall of the fortress, on the which side also the enemy kept no watch, and saluting the Watch of the Capitoll, he told them what he was. So they plucked him up unto them, and brought him to the Magistrates that ruled then, who caused the Senate to assemble presently, to whom he told the newes of Camillus Victory, which they had not heard of before; and therewith also he did declare unto them the determination of the ROMANE Souldiers that were abroad, which was to make Camillus their Captaine and General, and did perswade them also to grant him the charge, for that he was the only man abroad whom the Citizens gave their consents to obey. When they heard this, all that were within the Capitoll, consulted thereupon amongst themselves, and so did chuse Camillus Dictator, and returned the Messenger Pontius Cominius back againe the selfe same way he came unto them. His fortune in returning back was like unto his coming thither, for the enemies never saw him. And so he brought report to them that were abroad, of the Senates decree and consent, whereof they were all marvellous glad. Thus came Camillus to take this charge of general upon him, and found there were twenty thousand good fighting men abroad, and well armed. Then got he further aide also of their allies and confederates, and prepared daily to goe and set upon the enemies. So was Camillus chosen now Dictator the second time, and went into the City of VEIES where he spake with the ROMANE Souldiers that were there, and levied a great number of the allies besides, to go fight with the enemies as soone as he could. But whilst Camillus was thus a preparing, certaine of the barbarous people people in ROME, walking out by chance on that side of the Capitoll where Pontius Cominius had gotten up the night before; spied in divers places the prints of his feet and hands, as he had griped and gotten hold, still digging to get up, and saw the weeds and herbs also growing upon the rocks. and the earth in like manner flat troden down. Whereupon they went presently unto the King to let him understand the same, who forthwith came to view the place. And having considered it well, he did nothing at that time; but when dark night was come, he called a company of the lightest GAULES together, and that used most to digge in mountaines, and said unto them: Our enemies themselves doe shew us the way how to take them, which we could not have found out but by themselves. For they having gone up before us, do give us easily to understand it is no impossible thing for us to climbe up also. Wherefore we were utterly shamed, having already begunne well, if we should faile also to end well, and to leave this place as invincible. For if it were easie for one man alone, by digging to climbe up to the height thereof, much lesse is it hard for many to get up one after another, so that one do helpe another. Therefore Sirs I assure you, those that doe take paines to get up, shall be honourably rewarded, according to their just desert. When the King had spoken these words unto the GAULES, they fell to it lustily every man to get up, and about midnight they began many of them to dig, and make steps up to the rocke one after another, as softly as could possibly, with catching hold the best they could, by the hanging of the rock, which they found very steepe, but nevertheless easier to climbe then they tooke it at the beginning. So that the foremost of them being come to the top of the rock, were now ready to take the wall, and to set upon the Watch that slept; For there was neither man nor dog that heard them. It chanced then there were holy geefe kept in the Temple of Juno, which at other times were wont to be fed till their crops were full: But Victuals being very strait and scant at that time even to finde the men, the poor geefe were so hard handled and so little regarded, that they were in manner starved for lacke of meate. This Fowle indeed naturally is very quicke of hearing, and so is the also very fearful by nature, and being in manner famished with their hard allowance they were so much the more waking and easier to be afraid. Upon this occasion therefore they heard the coming of the GAULES, and also began to runne up and down and cry for feare; with which noise they did wake those that were within the Cattle. The GAULES being bewraied by these foolish geefe, left their stealing upon them, and came in with all the open noise and terrour they could. The ROMANES hearing this Alarum, every man tooke such weapon as came first to his hand, and they ran suddenly to rescue that place from whence they understood the noise; amongst those the foremost man of all was Marcus Manlius a man that had been Consul, who had a lusty body, and as stout a heart. His hap being to meete with two of the GAULES together, as one of them was lifting up his Axe to knock him on the head, he prevented him, and strake off his hand with his Sword, and clapt his Target on the others face so fiercely, that he threw him backward downe the Rock; And coming afterwards unto the wall with others that ran thither with him, he repulst the rest of the GAULES that were gotten up, who were not not many in number, neither did any great act. Thus the ROMANES having escaped this danger, the next morning they threw the Capitaine downe the rocks from the cattie, who had charge of the watch the night before, and gave Manlius in recompence of the good service he had done, a more honourable then profitable reward, which was this, Every man of them gave him halfe a pound of the Country wheat, which they call Far, and the fourth part of the measure of wine, which the GRECIANS call Cotile; and this might be about a quart, being the ordinary allowance of every man by the day. After this repulse, the GAULES began to be discouraged, partly for that their victuals failed them, and durst no more forage abroad in the fields for feare of Camillus, and partly also for that the plague came amongst them, being lodged amongst heapes of dead bodies, lying in every place above ground without buriall, and amongst burnt houses destroyed, where the ashes being blowne very high by the winde and vehemency of heat, did give a dry piercing aire, that did marvellously poison their bodies when they came to draw in the breath of it. But the greatest cause of all their mischief was, the change of their wonted diet. Who coming out of a fresh Country, where there were excellent pleasant places to retire unto, to avoid the discomfort of the parching heat of the Summer, were now in a naughty plain Country for them to remaine in, in the latter season of the yeare. All these things together did heape diseases upon them, besides the long continuance of the sieg about the Capitoll (for it was then about the seventh moneth) by reason whereof there grew a marvellous death in their Campe, through the great numbers of them that died daily and lay unburied. But notwithstanding all the death and trouble of the GAULES, the poor besieged ROMANES were nothing holpen the more, the famine did still grow so fast upon them. And because they could heare nothing of Camillus, they were growne almost unto a despaire, and send unto him they could not, the GAULES kept so strait watch upon them in the City. Whereupon both parties finding themselves in hard state, first the watch of either side began to cast out words of peace amongst themselves, and afterwards by consent of the heads, Sulpitius Tribune of the Souldiers came to parly with Brennus. In which parly it was articulated, that the ROMANES should pay a thousand pound weight of gold, and that the GAULES should incontinently after the receipt of the same, depart out of their City and all their territories. This Decree being passed by Oath from both, the gold was brought. And when it came to be weighed, the GAULES at the first privily began to deale fallily with them; but afterwards they openly staid the ballance, and would not let them weigh no more, whereat the ROMANES began to be angry with them. Then Brennus in scorne and mockerie to despight them more, pluckt off his sword, girdle and all, and put it into the ballance where the gold was weighed. Sulpitius seeing that, asked him what he meant by it. Brennus answered him: What can it signifie else, but sorrow to the vanquished? This word ever after ranne as a common Proverbe in the Peoples mouths. Some of the ROMANES tooke this vile part of theirs in such scorne, that they would needs take the gold from them againe by force, and so returne into their hold, to abide the sieg still, as they had done before. Other were of opinion to the contrary, and thought it best with patience to put up this scorne of theirs, and not to thinke it was a shame to pay more then they had promised: but only to pay it by compulsion as they did, by misfortune of time, was to thinke it rather necessary, then honourable. And as they were debating the matter thus, as well amongst themselves, as with the GAULES, Camillus came to ROME Gates with his Army, and understanding all what had passed betweene them, he commanded the rest of the Army to march faire and softly after him in good order, and he in the meane season with the best choice men he had, went before with all speede. As soone as the other ROMANES within the City had spied him, they shouted out for joy, and received him every one with great reverence, without any more words, as their Sovereigne Capitaine and Prince, who had power over them all. And Camillus taking the Gold out of the Scales, gave it unto his men, and commanded the GAULES presently to take up the Scales, and to get them going: For, saith he, it is not the ROMANES manner to keepe their Country with Gold, but with the Sword. Then Brennus began to be hot, and told him, it was not honourably done of him, to breake the accord that had passed betweene them before by oath. Whereupon Camillus stoutly answered him againe, that accord was of no validity: for he being created Dictator before, all other Officers and Magistrates whatsoever, and their acts, by his election were made of no authority. And seeing therefore they had dealt with men that had no power of themselves to accord to any matter, they were to speak to him, if they required ought: for he alone had absolute authority to pardon them if they repented, and would aske it: or else to punish them, and make their bodies answer the damages and losse his Country had by them sustained. These words made Brennus mad as a March Hare, that out went his blade. Then they drew their Swords of all sides, and laid lustily one at another as they could, within the houses, and in open streets, where they could set no Battell in order. But Brennus suddenly remembering himselfe, that it was no even match for him, retired with his men about him into his Campe, before he had lost many of his People. The next night following, he departed out of ROME with all his Army, and went to encampe himselfe about a threescore furlongs from thence, in the high way that goeth towards the City of the GABIANES. Camillus with his whole Army well appointed, went after him immediately, and shewed at his Campe by the breake of day. The ROMANES having taken heart againe unto them, did lustily give them battell: the same continued long, very cruell and doubtfull, untill the GAULES at the length were overthrowne, and their Campe taken with great slaughter. As for those that did escape the fury of the Battell, they were killed, some by the ROMANES selves, who hotly followed the chase after the Battell broken: the residue of them, and the greatest part, were slaine by those of the Cities and Villages neare abouts, that did set upon them as they fled scatteringly here and there in the Fields. And thus was the City of ROME strangely againe recovered that was before strangely wonne and lost, after it had continued seven moneths in the hands of the barbarous People. For they entred ROME about the fifteenth day of July: and they were driven out againe, about the thirteenth day of February following. So Camillus triumphed as befemed him, and as one that had saved and delivered his Country out of the hands of their Enemies, and set ROME againe at liberty. Those that had bene abroade all the time of this Sieg, came into ROME againe, following his triumphing Chariot: and those that had bene besieged within the Capitoll (looking for no other but to have died by famine) went and presented themselves before him, and each one embraced other, in weeping wile for joy. The Priests and Ministers of the Temples also, presented their holy Jewels, whole and undefaced, which some of them had buried in the ground within the City selfe: and other some had carried away with them, when they fled out of ROME. All these the People did as gladly see, as if the gods themselves had returned home againe into their City. After they had sacrificed unto the gods, and rendred them most humble thanks, and had purged their City, as they had bene taught by men experienced in those matters for satisfaction of the gods, Camillus began againe to build up the Temples that were there before, hard by the which he built another new one also to the god Aius Locutius, in that very place where Marcus Cadius heard the voyce warne him of the coming of the GAULES. So by Camillus good diligence, and the Priests great paine and travell, the situations of these Temples were with much ado found out againe. But when they were to build againe all the rest of the City, that was wholly burnt and destroyed to the ground, the People had no minde to it, but ever shrinked backe to put any hand to the Worke, for that they lacked all things necessary to begin the same. Furthermore, weighing their late and long sustained trouble and miseries, they were fitter to take their ease and rest, then to begin new labour and toyle, to kill their hearts and bodies altogether. For neither were their bodies able to performe it, nor yet their goods to reach to the charge of it. Wherefore disposing their mindes to dwell in the City of VETES, which remained whole, untouched, and furnished of all things to receive them, they delivered to the prating Orators (whose tongues did never cease to speake placencia to the People) trimme occasion to set this matter abroach. So they gave good care, and were willing to heare certaine feditious words spoken against Camillus, which were these: That for his private ambition he would deprive them of a City well furnished already, and would against their wills compell them to lodge in their owne Houses, wholly burnt and pulled downe. And moreover, that he would make them to raise up againe the great ruine the fire had made, to the end the People might call him, not onely Captaine and Generall of the ROMANS, but the Founder of Rome also, and so drowne Romulus honourable Title thereof. The Senate considering of this matter, and fearing some tumult among the People, they would not suffer Camillus to leave the Dictatorship before the end of the year, notwithstanding no man ever enjoyed that Office above fixe Moneths. Then Camillus for his part did much indeavour himselfe, to comfort and appease the People, praying them all he could to tarry: and further pointed with his finger unto the graves of their Ancestors, and put them in minde also of the holy places dedicated to the gods, and sanctified by King Numa, or by Romulus, or by other Kings. But amongst many other tokens drawne out of holy and Divine things, he forgot not to bring for example, the head of a man found new and fresh, in making the foundation of the Capitoll, as if that place by fatall destiny had bene once chosen to be the head and chiefe of all ITALY. And moreover, that the holy fire of the goddesse Vesta (which since the Warres had bene kindled againe by the holy Vestall Nuns) would againe come to be put out by them, if they did forsake their naturall City: besides the great shame and dishonour it would be unto them, to see it inhabited in time to come by unknowne strangers, or else to be left a common field and pasture, for Cibeasts and Cattell to graze in: Such sorrowfull examples and griefes, the honest naturall borne Citizens, did ever blow into the Peoples eares, as well privately as openly. The People againe to the contrary, did make their hearts to yerne for pity, when they laid before their eyes their penury and poverty they sustained: and besought them also not to enforce them to gather and joyne together againe the broken pieces of a spoiled City (as of a Shipwracke that had caft them naked into the Sea, having onely saved bare life and persons) since that they had another City neare at hand and ready to receive them. So Camillus counsell was, that the Senate should consult upon this matter, and deliver their absolute opinion herein: which was done. And in this Councell, he himselfe brought forth many probable reasons, why they should not leave in any case, the place of their naturall birth and Countrey: and so did many other Senators in like case, favouring that opinion. Last of all, after these perswasions, he commanded Lucius Lucretius (whose manner was to speake first in such Assemblies) that he should stand up and deliver his opinion, and that the rest also in order as they fate, should say their mindes. So every man keeping silence, as Lucretius was ready to speake, at the present time there passed by their Councell-house, a Captaine with his Bande that warded that day, who spake aloud to his Ensigne-bearer that went formost, to stay, and set downe his Ensigne there: For, said he, here is a very good place for us to dwell in. These words being heard up into the Senate-house, even as they stood all in a doubt and maze what would be the resolution of this matter, Lucretius began to say, that he most humbly thanked the gods; and allowed of the Capitaines judgement, and so every one of the rest in their order, said as much. Moreover there was a wonderful change and alteration of minde suddenly among the common People: for every man did perswade and encourage his fellow lively to put his hand to this worke. Infomuch as tarrying for no division or appointing out of streets, nor setting out every man his place he should build in, they fell to worke of all hands, every one chusing that place he liked best, and was most commodious for their building, without any other order or division amongst them. Whereupon, they running to this Building on a head, the streets were confused on heaps together, and their houses all built out of order and uniformity. For the report goeth, that the whole City (as well common as private Buildings) was built up new againe in a yeare. But the Survivors, to whom Camillus had given charge to finde out all the holy places where the Temples had bene overthrowne, as they were about Mount Palatine, they came by chance to the place, where the Chappell of Mars had stood, which the GAULES had wholly burnt and destroyed, as they had done all the rest. They making cleane the place, and surveying every corner, did finde by chance Romulus Augures crooked staffe hidden under a great mount of ashes. This staffe is crooked at one of the ends, and they call it Litnus, which Soothsayers do use to quarter out the Regions of the Element, when they will behold the flying of Birds to tell of things to come. Romulus that was very skilfull in this art, did use this staffe: and after he was taken away from all mens fights, the Priests tooke it, and kept it as a holy Relique, suffering no creature to lay hands on it. Now when they found this staffe whole and unbroken, where all things else were consumed and perished by fire, they were in a marvellous joy thereat: for they interpreted this to be a signe of the everlasting continuance of the City of Rome. But before they could make an end of all their building, there grew a new Warre againe upon them. For at one very instant, all the ÆQUES, the VOLSCES, and the LATINES, entred with all their might and maine into the Territories of the ROMANS. The Thuscans also went then and besieged Sutrium, that was in league and amity with the ROMANS. The Tribuni militares got them straight to the Field with their Army, and encamped about Mount Martian. The LATINES besieged them so straightly, that their Army stood in great danger to be overthrowne, and they were driven to send to Rome for a new supply. Thereupon the ROMANS did choose Camillus Dictator againe the third time. The occasion of this Warre is reported two manner of waies: whereof I will declare the first, which I do conceive to be but a tale. They say the LATINES sent unto the ROMANS, to demand some of their free Maids in marriage: which they did either to make a quarrell of Warre, or else as desirous indeede to joyne both the Peoples againe by new marriages. The ROMANS were amazed very much at this, and fore troubled, as not knowing how to answer them, they were so afraid of Warres. For they were yet scant new settled at home, and dreaded much lest this demand of Daugh-

the third time.

Daughters, was but a Summons made to give them Hostages, which they finely cloaked under the name of alliance in Marriage. Some say that there was at that time a Bond-maide called Tutola, or as some say, Philotis, that went unto the Senate, and counselled them they should send her away with some other faire Maid-slaves, dressed up like Gentlewomen, and then let her alone. The Senate liked very well of this device, and chose such a number of Bond-maides as she desired to have, and trimming them up in fine Apparell, begawed with Chaines of Gold and Jewels, they sent them forth to the LATINES, who were encamped not farre from the City. When night was come, the other Maides hid their Enemies Swords. But this Tutola, or Philotis (call her as you will) did climbe up to the top of a wilde Fig-tree, from which she shewed a burning Torch unto the ROMANS, having made shift to hang somewhat behinde her, to keepe the light from sight of the Enemies. For this signall the Senate of Rome had secretly appointed her to set up, which was the cause that the issuing out of the Souldiers, being commanded to go out in the night, was full of trouble and tumult. For being pressed by their Captaines, they called one another, and there was great ado to put them in order of Battell. Thus they went to take their Enemies sleeping, who nothing mistrusting the fame, were slain the most part of them within their Campe. This was done on the fifth day of the Moneth called then Quintilis, and now is named July: at which time they do yet celebrate a certaine Feast in remembrance of that act. For first of all, going out of the City, they call aloud many of their fellowes names which are most common: as Caius, Marcus, and Lucius, shewing thereby how one of them called another after that sort, as they went in great haste out of the City. Afterwards all the Maid-servants of the City being trimly apparelled, go playing up and downe the Towne, pleasantly jesting with those they meete: and in the end they make as though they fought together, in token that they did helpe the ROMANS at that time to destroy the LATINES. Then they are feasted, sitting under Bowers made with wilde Fig-tree boughes: and this Feast is called Nona Capratina, by reason of the wilde Fig-tree (as some thinke) from the top whereof, the Bond-maide shewed to the ROMANS the burning Torch. For the ROMANS call the wilde Fig-tree, Caprificus. Other say, that all these things are done and spoken in remembrance of the mischance that happened unto Romulus, when he was taken out of their fight, the same day without the Gates of the City, at which time there arose a sudden mist and darke cloud. Or as some other say, that then was the Eclipse of the Sunne: and they hold opinion that the day was named Nona Capratina, because Capra in the ROMAN Tongue, signifieth a Goate. Romulus vanished out of mens fights, as he was making an Oration unto his People, neare unto the place which is called Goat-marsh, as we have mentioned more at large in his life. The second occasion and beginning of this Warre (according to the opinion of most Writers) was, that Camillus being chosen Dictator the third time, and knowing that the Trib. militares with their Army were straightly besieged by the LATINES and VOLSCES, he was enforced to arme all the old men, who for very age were priviledged from further service in Warres. And having fetched a great compasse about Mount Martian, because he would not be seene of his Enemies, he came to lodge his Campe behinde them, where he raised fires, to make the ROMANS know that were besieged, that he was come: which as soone as they perceived, they tooke to them courage againe, and determined to fight. But the LATINES and VOLSCES kept within their Campe, and did intrench and fortifie themselves with a Wall of Wood, which they laide across, because they saw they were beset both before and behinde: and determined to tarry the reliefe of a new supply, as well of their owne, as of some other aide besides from the Thuscans: which thing Camillus perceiving, and fearing lest they should serve him, as he had already handled them, by compassing of him againe behinde, he thought it necessary to prevent this. So considering the inclosure and fortification of their Campe was all of Wood, and that every morning commonly, there came a great winde from the side of the Mountaines, he made provision of a number of fire-brands. And leading out his Army into the Fields by breake of day, he appointed one part of them to give charge upon the Enemies on the one side, with great noise and shouting: and he with the other part determined to raise fire on the contrary side, from whence the winde should come, looking for opportunity to do the same. When he saw the Sunne up, and the winde beginning to whistle, blowing a good gale from the side of the hills, and that the skirmish was begun on the other side: then he gave a signall unto the Company he led with him, to set upon the Enemies, and made them throw into the inclosure of their Campe, divers pots and darts with fire, so that the flame finding matter to catch hold of, in this inclosure of wood, and Trees laid overthwart, did raise straight an exceeding great flame in the aire, and still got way inwards into the LATINES Campe. Whereupon the LATINES being unprovided of present remedie to quench the flame, and seeing their Campe a fire all about their eares, they gathered themselves together at the first in a very small roome. Nevertheless, they were enforced in the end to get them into the Field, and there they found their Enemies ready armed, and in battell ray. So as few of those escaped that came into the Field, and their fellowes that remained within their Campe, were burnt to death with fire, untill the ROMANS themselves came to quench it, for greedineffe of their spoile and goods. When all this was done, Camillus left his Sonne in the Campe, to keepe the prisoners and spoiles: and he himselfe, with the rest of the Army, went to invade his Enemies Countrey, where he tooke the City of Æques. Then after he had overcome the VOLSCES, he led his Army presently from thence unto the City of Sutrium. For he had not yet heard of their misfortune. Therefore he hastened himself to aid them, because he thought they were yet besieged by the Thuscans. But such was their hard fortune, that they had already yielded up their City by composition, and saved no part of their goods, but the very clothes they had on their backs.

So being turned out of all they had, they met Camillus by the way as they were wandering abroad, lamenting their misery with their Wives and little young Children: whose misery went to the very heart of Camillus, when he beheld their lamentable state. Furthermore, when he saw the ROMANS weep for pity also, to see the moane that these unfortunate People made unto him, and that it grieved them heartily to behold their great mischance: he determined with himselfe not to defer revenge, but presently to go the self-same day before the City of SUTRIUM, imagining that he should finde the THUSCANES out of order, without keeping watch, and attending nothing but making good chere, because they had newly taken a wealthy rich City, where they had left never an Enemy in the same to hurt them, neither feared any abroade to come neare to assault them. And indeede it fell out rightly as he guessed. For he had not only passed through the Territories of the City, without any intelligence given to the Enemies within the same: but he was come to the very Gates, and had taken the Walls before they heard any thing of his coming, by reason they neither kept Watch nor Ward, but were dispersed abroade in the City, in every house, eating and drinking drunke together. Infomuch as when they knew their Enemies were already within the City, they were so full fraught with Meate and Wine, that the most of their wits served them not so much as to flee, but tarried untill they were slaine or taken, like Beasts in the Houses. Thus was the City of SUTRIUM twice taken in one day. And it chanced that those which had wonne it, lost it: and those which had lost it, recovered it againe by Camillus means; who deserved both the honour and entry of triumph into ROME: the which wanne him no lesse good will and glory, then the two first before had done praise, and gotten fame. For even his greatest Enemies that most spited and envied his former noble acts, ascribing them rather to Fortune that favoured him, then to his valiantnesse or worthinesse, were forced now by this deepe of his to confesse, that his wisdom and valiantnesse deserved praise and commendation to the skies. Camillus of all his Enemies had one most bitter to him, which was Marcus Manlius, that was the first man that gave the GAULES the repulse that night they had entred the Walls of the Capitoll, and had thought to have taken it: whereupon they gave him the surname of Capitolinus. He aspiring to be the chiefe of the City, and finding no direct way to exceede the glory of Camillus, tooke the broad High-way of them that practise Tyranny. For he began to flatter the common People, and specially those that were indebted: he tooke upon him to defend their causes, and pleaded their case at the barre against their Creditors. Sometimes he tooke the Debtors out of the Creditors hands, and carried them away by force, that for lacke of ability to pay were by rigour of the Law condemned to be Bond-slaves. But by this practice, in short time he got him a marvellous number of such needy followers, and poore men, that the Noblemen and honest Citizens were afraid of the insolent parts they played, and of the continuall troubles and tumults they daily stirred up in the Market-place. Therefore suspecting the worst in this case, they did choose Quintus Capitolinus Dictator: who caused the said Manlius immediately to be apprehended, and committed to prison. Whereupon the People began to change their Apparel: which they were never wont to do, but in great and common calamities. But the Senate fearing lest some commotion would rise hereupon, they did set him at liberty againe. He being thus out of prison, was no whit the better, nor wiser thereby, but did still stir up the Commons, more boldly and seditiously then before. Then was Camillus chosen againe Tribune militaris, and Manlius was accused in his time of Office. But when the matter came to pleading, the fight of the Capitoll troubled his Accusers much. For the very place it selfe where Manlius had repulsed the GAULES by night, and defended the Capitoll, was easily scene from the Marker-place, where the matter was a hearing: and he himselfe pointing with his hand, shewed the place unto the gods, and weeping tenderly, he laid before them the remembrance of the hazard of his life, in fight for their safety. This did move the Judges hearts to pity, so as they knew not what to doe, but many times they did put over the hearing of his case unto another day, and neither would they give judgement, knowing he was convicted by manifest proofes: neither could they use the severity of the Law upon him, because the place of his so notable good service was ever still before their eyes. Wherefore Camillus finding the cause of delay of Justice, did make the place of Judgement to be removed without the City, into a place called the Woode Petelian, from whence they could not see the Capitoll. And there the Accusers gave apparent evidence against him: and the Judges considering all his wicked practises, conceived a just cause to punish him, as he had deserved. So they gave sentence of death against him: that he should be carried to the Mount-Capitoll, and there to be throwne downe headlong the Rocks thereof. Thus, one and the selfe-place was a memory both of his notable good service, and also of his miserable and unfortunate ende. Besides all this, they razed his house, and built in the same place a Temple to the goddess they call Moneta: and made a Law also, that no Patrician from thenceforth should dwell any more in the Mount-Capitoll. Camillus after this, being called againe to take the Office of Tribune militaris the sixth time, he thought to excuse himselfe, as well for that he saw he was well steep in yeares, as also for that he feared Fortunes spight, or some mishap after he had obtained such glory for his noble acts and service. Howbeit the most apparent cause of his excuse, was his sicknesse, which troubled him much at that time. But the People would allow no excuse by any means, but cried out, they did not desire he should fight on foote nor on Horsebacke, but that he should onely give counsell, and command: and therefore they compelled him to take the charge, and to leade the Army with one of his companions named Lucius Frurius, against their Enemies the PRÆNESTINES, and the VOLSCES, who joyning together, did invade the Confines of the ROMANS friends. So he led his his Army out immediately to the field, and camped as neer the Enemy as he could: being minded for his part to draw the Wars out in length, that he might fight afterwards (if need required) when he had recovered strength. But Frurius contrarily coveting glory, was wholly bent to hazard the Battell, whatsoever perill came of it: and to this end he stirred up and incouraged the Captains of every private Band. Wherefore Camillus fearing lest they should think, for ill will he bare the young men, that he went about to hinder and take away the meane to win their honour, and to do some noble act: suffered Frurius against his will to put his men in order of battell, and he in the meane season by reason of his sicknesse, remained with a few about him in the Campe. So went Lucius upon a head to present battell to the Enemy, and so was he as headily also overthrowne. But Camillus hearing the ROMANS were overthrowne, sick as he was himselfe, got up, and taking his household Servants with him, he went in hafte to the Gates of the Campe, and passed through those that fled, untill he came to meete with the Enemies that had them in chase. The ROMANS seeing this that were already entred into the Campe, they followed him at the heeles forthwith: and those that fled also without, when they saw him, they gathered together and put themselves againe in array before him, and perswaded one another not to forsake their Captaine. So their Enemies hereupon stayed their chasing, and would pursue no further that day. But the next morning, Camillus leading his Army into the field, gave them battell, and wanne the field of them by plaine force: and following the victory hard, he entred amongst them that fled into their Campe pellmell, or hand over head, and slew the most part of them even there. After this victory, he was advertised how the THUSCANES had taken the City of SUTRIUM, and had put to the sword all the Inhabitants of the same, which were ROMAN Citizens. Whereupon he sent to ROME the greatest part of his Army, and keeping with him the highest and lustiest men, went and gave assault unto the THUSCANES, that now were harboured in the City of SUTRIUM. Which when he had wonne againe, he slew part of them, and the other saved themselves by flight. After this, he returned to ROME with an exceeding spoile, confirming by experience, the wisdom of the ROMANS, who did not feare the age nor sicknesse of a good Captaine that was expert and valiant, but had chosen him against his will, though he was both old and sick: and preferred him far before the younger and lustier that made fute to have the charge. Newes being brought unto the Senate, that the THUSCULANIANS were revolted, they sent Camillus thither againe, willing him of five other companions to take out one he liked best, every of the which desired to be chosen, and made their sute unto him for the same. But he refusing all other, did choose againe Lucius Frurius beyond all expectation of men, seeing not long before he needed would against his will hazard battell, in which he was overthrowne. Howbeit Camillus, having a desire (as I thinke) to hide his fault and shame he had received, did of courtesie prefer him before all other. Now the THUSCULANIANS hearing of Camillus coming against them, subtilly sought to colour the fault they had already committed. Wherefore they put out a great number of people into the fields, some to plough, other to keepe the beatts, as if they had been in best peace: and did let the Gates of the City wide open, sent their Children openly to Schoole, their Artificers wrought their Occupations in their Shops, the men of haviour and honest Citizens walked in the Market-place in their long Gownes, and the Officers and Governours of the City went up and down to every house, commanding them to prepare lodgings for the ROMANS, as if they had stood in no feare at all, and as though they had committed no fault. Howbeit all these fine fetches could not make Camillus believe, but that they had intent to rebell against the ROMANS: yet they made Camillus pity them, seeing they repented them of that they had determined to do. So he commanded them to go to ROME to the Senate, to crave pardon for their fault: and he himselfe did helpe them, not onely to purge their City of any intent of rebellion, but also to get them the Priviledge and Freedome of ROME. And these be the chiefest acts Camillus did in the sixth time of his Tribuneship. After this, one Licinius Stolo moved great sedition in the City, betwene the common people and the Senate. For he would in any case that of the two Consuls, which were chosen yearly, the one of them should be a Commoner, and not that both of them should be of the ancient Noble Families, called Patricians. The Tribunes of the People were chosen, but the Election of the Consuls, the People stayed: so that the Common-wealth went to decay, and declined to greater troubles, then ever it did before, for lack of Government. But to suppress this, the Senate created Camillus the fourth time Dictator: but this was fore against his will, because it disliked the People much. Furthermore, he would not complaine of the People, for that they having served him in many Wars and Battells, might boldly and truly say unto him: that he had done more notable acts by them in the Wars, then he had done by the Patricians in Peace. Yet was he created Dictator in despite, to rule the People, and of envie in the Noblemen towards them. Thus necessity did urge him, either by force to suppress the People, if he were the stronger in this dissention: or else that he himselfe should be suppressed, if he became the weaker. Camillus notwithstanding, preparing to prevent this mischief, and knowing the day the Tribunes had determined, to prefer the passing of their Law by voyces of the People: he gave warning by Proclamations set upon posts, that the same very day he would muster the People: and all was but to draw them from the Marker-place into the field of Mars, and did set great penalties upon those that should be lacking at the Musters, and would presume to disobey. The Tribunes of the People on the contrary part, did withstand his threats, and swore they would condemne Camillus selfe in fifty thousand Drachmes of Silver, if he did not let the People alone, but would go about to disturbe them for giving their voyces to such a Law as they liked of. Camillus perceiving this, and fearing to be condemned and banished once againe, which would fall out very ill for him, being now an old man, and one that had done so many great and notable acts, or else for that he thought himselfe not strong enough to withstand the force of the People: he kept his house that day, feigning himselfe to be sick, and certaine other dayes following, and in the end he gave up his Office. Thereupon the Senate chose in his place another Dictator, who named the same Licinius Stolo Generall of the Horsemen, that was the Authour and furtherer of all this sedition: and besides did suffer him to prefer another Law, and to passe it by voices of the People, that above all other Laws, did most trouble the Patricians. Which Law did forbid any Citizen of Rome, to have, or occupy above five hundred jugera, which amount to 330 acres and a halfe, 12 pole, and 121 parts of a pole. Then was this Stolo aloft, and of great estimation at that time: for that he had in despite of the Senate established this Law. Howbeit shortly after it was found out, that himselfe had more number of acres then his owne Law permitted: by reason whereof, he received the just punishment of his owne devised forfeiture. Yet the most weighty matter of all this diffention that began first, and most of all troubled the Senate, touching the election of the Consuls, remained still undetermined. But while these matters were thus in talke, the ROMANS had certaine intelligence, how the GAULES were departed once againe from the Adriatick Sea, and were coming with a great power straight unto Rome: upon report of which news, the Wars followed immediately. For the GAULES destroyed the champion Countrey as they went: and the poore Countrey-men that could not recover Rome, were scattered here and there amongst the Mountaines. The feare of this did somewhat appease the diffention. The People then assembling with the Senate, and the baser sort with the Noble, did all with one voice and assent choose Camillus Dictator the fifth time. He was now a very old man, lacking little of fourscore yeares: but nevertheless, confidently undertooke the charge. Now that he had taken it upon him, he presently levied men, and prepared his Army. And knowing very well how the fiercenesse of these barbarous GAULES consisted in down-right blows with their Swords, with which they would strike off heads and shoulders of men at a blow, mangle them like Butchers, without any art or skill of fight: he caused iron Sallets, and Morions to be made for the most of his men, as smoothly wrought on the out-side as could be, that their Swords lighting on them, should either slide off, or breake. Moreover, he caused their Shields to have barres made about them of copper, because the wood selfe was not able to abide their blows. Furthermore, he did teach his Souldiers to carry long Javelins or Punction-Raves, wherewith they might wound their Enemies lifting up their Swords to strike them. Now when the GAULES were come neare Rome, having pitched their Campe upon the River of Anian, and being full laden and stuffed with all kindes of spoile and booties: then Camillus brought his Army also into the Field, and went to lodge on a little hill which was easie to get upon, where there were many little caves, so that the most of his Army was all hidden and covered, and those that were seene, seemed to be retired thither into those high places for an advantage, and of feare. Camillus to increase this opinion more in his Enemies, and to make them the bolder, did suffer them to come and spoile even to the foote of the hill where he was lodged, and stirred not once out to trouble them, but kept himselfe quiet in his Campe and well fortified: untill such time as he spied occasion of advantage, that the best part of their Army were scattered here and there, a foraging all about the Fields: and those which remained in their Campe, fell to eating and drinking as they used carelessly at all houres. Then Camillus sent very early before day, his lightest armed men, to vex and trouble the barbarous People in coming out of their Campe, and to lett them in any case from putting their men in order of battell: and he in the breake of day came downe into the Plaine, and did set his other men being well armed, in good array, which were a great number, and lusty fellows, and were not as the barbarous People thought, few, and fearfull. This at the very first discouraged the hearts of the GAULES marvellously, because they thought themselves dishonoured, that the ROMANS should charge them first. Afterwards also Camillus Vaunt-guard did set upon the GAULES, and that on a sudden, before they had leifure to put themselves in battell, or to order their Troupes: compelling them to fight without order, as they met out of order by chance. In the end also, Camillus came upon the necks of them, with all his whole force and Army together: against whom they ranne notwithstanding, holding up their naked Swords aloft in their hands. But the ROMANS thrusting with their armed Javelins, received their Enemies blowes upon them, and thereby so rebated the edges of their Swords (their blades being very sharpe and thinne ground, and of so soft a temper) that they bowed againe, and stood crooked unreasonably: and furthermore, having pierced their Shields thorow with their punction-staves, the GAULES armes were so clogd and wearied with them, the ROMANS plucking them backe to them againe, that they threw away their Swords and Shields, and flying in, closed with the ROMANS and caught hold of their Javelins, thinking by plaine force to have wrested them out of their hands. Howbeit they perceiving then the GAULES were naked, fell straight to their Swords: and so was the slaughter of their first ranks very great. The other fled scatteringly here and there, all about the Plaine: because Camillus had caused all the Hills and Mountaines about them to be occupied and possessed. Neither did they retire towards their Campe, for that it was unfortified, and also knew well enough it would be easily taken. This battell (as they say) was thirteene yeares after their taking of Rome before. But after that Field, the ROMANS courages were good enough against these barbarous GAULES, whom they stood in feare of before: thinking the first time they came, that they had not overcome them by force, but by reason of the plague that fell amongst them, or through some other strange chance. For they did so feare them at that time, that they made a Law, that their Priests should be exempted from Warres, so it were not against the GAULES. This overthrow was the last martiall act Camillus did in the Warres. For, the taking of the City of VELITRES, was an accident depending upon this Journey: because they yeelded straight unto him, without striking any stroke. But the seditiousnesse of the People of Rome about Government, and the chusing of the yeare Consuls, was the hardest matter he ever had in hand. For they returning home to Rome strong and of great power, by their late obtained victory, would in any case have one of the Consuls to be chosen of a Commoner, which was directly against their ancient custome. But the Senate stoutly withstood it, and would not suffer Camillus to be put out of office: hoping the better by means of his authority, which was great then, that they should maintaine and continue their ancient Dignity, and Prerogative of their Nobility. But as Camillus was set in his chaire in the Market-place, where he heard and dispatched Causes, there came a Serjeant to him, sent from the Tribunes of the People, who commanded him to follow him, and therewithall laid violent hands upon him, as he would have carried him away by force. This made such a terrible tumult and uprore, that the like was never seene before in the Market-place. For Camillus friends drave the Serjeant backe behind the Chaire. The common People cried out againe to the Serjeant from beneath, Pull him out of his chaire. This so amazed Camillus, that he knew not well what to say to the matter. Notwithstanding, he would not resigne up his Office, but taking those Senators he had about him, he went unto the place where the Senate was wont to be kept: and there, before he would go into it, he returned backe againe unto the Capitoll, and made his Prayer unto the gods, that it would please them to bring his troubles againe to a quiet, and so made a solemne vow and promise (if these tumults and troubles might be pacified) that he would build a Temple of Concord. When this matter came to debating before the Senate, there fell great contention and diversity of opinions among them: yet in the end, the easiest way did carry it, and that was, to grant the common Peoples desire, that a Commoner should be chosen Consull with a Nobleman. The Dictator having openly published to the People the Senates Decree, confirming their desire: the common People were so joyfull, that at that present they let fall all their malice against the Nobility and Senate, and brought Camillus home to his house: with great shouts of joy and clapping of hands. The next meeting all the People being assembled together in the Market-place, it was there decreed: that the Temple of Concord should be built at the Common-wealths charge (according to the vow Camillus had made) in such a place, as it might be seene from the Market-place selfe, where all the Assemblies for matters of counsell were made. And further, it was ordered that one day more should be added to the Feasts of the LATINES: and that from thenceforth they should solemnize foure Festivall dayes, and should presently make great Sacrifices unto the gods, in every Temple of the City, to give them thanks: and in token of joy they should all weare Garlands upon their heads for this reconciliation. So Camillus proceeding to election, there were chosen two Consuls, Marcus Emilius of the noble Patricians, and Lucius Sextus of the Plebeians or Commoners. And this was the last act that ever Camillus did. For the next yeare after the Plague was in Rome, and tooke away an infinite number of the People that died, besides many Magistrates and Officers of the City that departed: among whom, Camillus also left his life. Who notwithstanding he had lived a long time, and had ended a reasonable course of life, and was ripe for death: yet the ROMANS made more mone and lamentation for his death alone, then for all the rest the Plague had already consumed.

ESAR seeing in Rome one day certaine rich and wealthy strangers, having little Dogs and Monkeys in their armes, and that they made marvelous much of them, he asked them if the women in their Country had no Children: wisely reproving them by this question, for that they bestowed their naturall love and affection upon brute Beasts, which they should with all kindeesse and love bestow upon men. Nature in like case also, having planted in our mindes a naturall desire to learne and understand, we are in reason to reprove those that vainly abuse this good desire, fondly disposing it to learne things vaine and unprofitable: and to cast behinde them in the meane season things honest and necessary to be learned. For as touching our outward sense, which with passion receiveth impression of the thing it seeth, peradventure it will be necessary to consider indifferently the thing seene, whether it will fall out beneficiall or hurtfull unto him: but so farreth it not with our understanding, for every man may at his pleasure turne and dispose that to the thing he taketh delight in, the reason whereof we must alwayes employ to the best part, and that not onely to consider and looke upon the thing, but also to reape the benefit and commodity of the thing we see. For like as the eye is most delighted with the lightest and freshest colours: even so we must give our mindes unto those sights, which by looking upon them do draw profit and pleasure unto us. For such effects doth vertue bring: that either to heare or reade them, they do print in our hearts an earnest love and desire to follow them. But this followeth not in all other things we esteeme, neither are we alwayes disposed to desire to do the things we see well done: but contrarily oftentimes, when we like the Worke, we milke the Workman, as commonly in making these perfumes and purple colours. For both the one and the other do please us well: but yet we take Perfumers and Dyers to be men of a meane Occupation. Therefore Antisthenes answered one very wisely, that told him Ismenias was an excellent player of the Flute. But yet he is a naughty man, said he: otherwise he could not be so cunning at the Flute as he is. Even so did Philip King of Macedon say to his Sonne Alexander the Great on a time: that at a certaine Feast had sung passing sweetly, and like a Master of Musick: Art thou not ashamed Sonne to sing so well? It is enough for a King to bestow his leisure sometime to heare Musicians sing, and he doth much honour to the Muses to heare the Masters of the Science otherwise, when one of them singeth to excell another. But he that personally shall bestow his time, exercising any meane Science: bringeth his paines he hath taken in matters unprofitable, a witnesse against himselfe, to prove that he hath beene negligent to learne things honest and profitable. And there was never any young Gentleman nobly borne, that seeing the Image of Jupiter (which is in the City of Pisa) desired desired to become Phidias: nor Polycletus, for seeing of Juno in the City of Argos: nor that desired to be Anacreon, or Philemon, or Archilocus, for that they took pleasure sometime to reade their works. For it followeth not of necessity, that though the Worke delight, the Workman must needs be praised. So in like case, such things do not profit those which behold them, because they do not move affection in the hearts of the beholders to follow them, neither do stir up affection to resemble them, and much lesse to conforme our selves unto them. But Vertue hath this singular property in all her actions: that she maketh the man that knoweth her, to affect her so, that straight he liketh all her doings, and desireth to follow those that are vertuous. For, as for riches, we onely desire to have them in possession: but of Vertue, we chiefly love the deeds. Wherefore we are contented to have Goods from other men: but good deeds we would other should have from us. For Vertue is of this power, that she allureth a mans minde presently to use her, that wisely considereth of her, and maketh him very desirous in his heart to follow her: and doth not frame his manners that beholdeth her by any imitation, but by the onely understanding and knowledge of vertuous deeds, which suddenly bringeth unto him a resolute desire to do the like. And this is the reason, why we thought I should continue still to write on the lives of Noble men, and why I made also this tenth Booke: in the which are contained the lives of Pericles and Fabius Maximus, who maintained Warres against Hannibal. For they were both men very like together in many sundry vertues, and specially in courtesie and justice: and for that they could patiently beare the follies of their People, and companions that were in charge of Government with them, they were marvellous profitable Members for their Countrey. But if we have sorted them well together, comparing the one with the other: you shall easily judge that reade our Writings of their lives. Pericles was of the Tribe of the Acamantides, of the Towne of Cholargus, and one of the best and most ancient Families of the City of Athens, both by his Father and Mother. For Xantippus his Father (who overcame in battell the Lieutenants of the King of Persia in the journey of Mygala) married Agariste that came of Clisphenes, he who drave out of Athens Pysistratus off-spring, and valiantly overthrew their tyranny. Afterwards he established Lawes, and ordained a very grave forme of Government, to maintaine his Citizens in peace and concord together. This Agariste dreamed one night that she was brought to bed of a Lion: and very shortly after she was delivered of Pericles, who was so well proportioned in all the parts of his body, that nothing could be mended, saving that his head was somewhat too long and out of proportion to the rest of his body. And this is the onely cause why all the Statues and Images of him almost, are made with a Helmet on his head: because the Workmen as it should seeme (and so it is most likely) were willing to hide the blemish of his deformity. But the Attican Poets did call him Schinocephalos, as much to say, as headed like an Onion. For those of Attica do sometime name that which is called in the Vulgar Tongue Scilla, that is to say, an Onion of Barbary, Schinos. And Cratinus the Comical Poet in his Comedy he intituled Chirones, said:

Pericles had a long head.

Old Saturne he, and dreadfull dire Debate, begotten have, betwene them carnally, this Tyrant here, this heaveie jolting pate, in court of gods so termed worthily.

And againe also in that which he termeth Nemesis, speaking of him, he saith:

Come Jupiter, come Jupiter, Come jolt-head, and come In-keeper.

And Teleclides mocking him also, saith in a place:

Sometimes he stands amaz'd when he perceiveth, that hard it were sufficiently to know, in what estate his Government he leaves.
And then will he be seldome scene below, such heaveie beaps within his braines do grow.

But yet sometimes out of that monstrous pate, he thundereth fast, and threatneth every state.

And Eupolis in a Comedy which he intituled Demi: being very inquisitive, and asking particularly of every one of the Orators (whom he feigned were returned out of Hell) when they named Pericles the last man unto him, he said:

Truly thou hast now brought unto us here that dwell, the chiefe of all the Captaines that come from darke some hell.

And as for Musicke, the most Authours write, that Damon did teach him Musicke, of whose name (as men say) they should pronounce the first syllable short. Howbeit Aristotle saith, that he was taught Musicke by Pythoclides. Howsoever it was, it is certaine that this Damon was a man of deepe understanding, and subtil in matters of Government: for, to hide from the People his sufficiency therein, he gave it out he was a Musitian, and did resort unto Pericles as a Master Wrestler or Fencer: but he taught him how he should deale in matters of State. Notwithstanding, in the end he could not so cunningly convey this matter: but the People saw his Harping and Musicke, was onely a Vizer to his other practise: wherefore they did banish him Athens for five yeares, as a man that busily tooke upon him to change the state of things, and that favoured Tyranny. And this gave the Comical Poets matter to play upon him finely, among which Plato in a Comedy of his, bringeth in a man that asketh him:

they do take away those also which are done by art. As the noise of bafons, the lights of fire by the Sea fide, and the fhadows of needles or points of Dials in the Sunne : all which things are done by some caufe and handiwork, to be a figne and token of fomething. But this argument peradventure may ferve better in another Booke. And now againe to Pericles. Whileft he was yet but a young man, the People flood in awe of him, becaufe he fomewhat refembled Pyfiftratus in his countenance : and the ancienteft men of the City alfo were much afraid of his foft voyce, his eloquent tongue, and readie utterance, becaufe in thofe he was Pyfiftratus up and downe. Moreover he was very rich and wealthy, and of one of the nobleft Families of the City, and thofe were his friends alfo that carried the onely fway and authority in the State : whereupon, fearing left they would banifh him with the banifhment of Oftiafifmon, he would not meddle with Government in any cafe, although otherwife he fhewed himfelfe in Warres very valiant and forward, and feared not to venture his perfon. But after that Arifides was dead, that Themiftocles was driven away, and that Cimon being ever in fervice in the Warres as Generall in Forraigne Countries, was a long time out of GREECE : then he came to leane to the Tribe of the poore People, preferring the multitude of the poore Commonalty, above the fmall number of Nobility and rich men, the which was directly againft his nature. For of himfelfe he was not popular, nor meanely given : but he did it (as it fhould feeme) to avoid fufpition, that he fhould pretend to make himfelfe King. And becaufe he faw Cimon was inclined alfo to take part with the Nobility, and that he was fingularly beloved and liked of all the honefter fort : he to the contrary enclined to the common People, purchafing by this meanes fafety to himfelfe, and authority againft Cimon. So he prefently began a new courfe of life, fince he had taken upon him to deale in matters of State : for they never faw him afterwards at any time go into the City, but to the Market-place, or to the Senate-houfe. He gave up going to all Feaftes where he was bidden, and left the entertainment of his friends, their company and familiarity. So that in all his time wherein he governed the Common-weale, which was a long time, he never went out to fupper to any of his friends, unleffe it were that he was once at a Feaft at his Nephew Euryptolemus Marriage : and then he tarried there no longer, but while the Ceremony was a doing, when they offer Wine to the gods, and fo he rofe from the Table. For thefe friendly meetings at fuch Feaftes, do much abate any counterfeit Majefty or fet countenance : and he fhall have much ado to keepe gravity and reputation, fhewing familiarity to every knowne friend in fuch open places. For in perfect vertue, thofe things truly are ever moft excellent, which be moft common : and in good and vertuous men there is nothing more admirable unto ftrangers, then their daily converfation is to their friends. Pericles now to prevent that the People fhould not be glutton with feeing him too oft, nor that they fhould come much to him : they did fee him but at fome times, and then he would not talke in every matter, neither came much abroad among them, but referved himfelfe (as Crisolaus faid they kept the SALAMINIAN Galley at ATHENS) for matters of great importance. And in the meane feafon, in other matters of fmall moment, he dealt by means of certaine Orators his familiars friends, amongst whom Ephialtes (as they fay) was one : he who tooke away the Authority and Power from the Court of Areopagus, and did give too much liberty to the People, as Plato faid. Upon which occafion, as the Comical Poets fay, he became fo ftout and head-ftrong, that they could no more hold him backe, then a young unbridled Colt : and tooke fuch a courage upon him, that he would obey no more, but invaded the Ifle of EUBOEIA, and fet upon the other Iflands. Pericles alfo becaufe he would fafhion a phrafe of fpeech, with a kinde of ftile altogether agreeable to the manner of life and gravity he had taken upon him : he gave himfelfe to all matters which he had learned of Anaxagoras, fhadowing his reafons of Naturall Philofophy, with artificiall Rhetorick. For having obtained a deep underftanding by ftudying of Philofophy, and a ready way effectually to end any matter he undertooke to prove, (befides that Nature had endued him with an excellent wit and capacity, as the Divine Plato doth write, to bring any thing to ferve his purpofe) he did fo artificially compaffe it with Eloquence, that he farre paffed all the Orators in his time. And for this caufe was he (as they fay) furnamed Olympius, as much to fay, as Heavenly or Divine. But fome are of opinion he had that furname, by reafon of the common Buildings and flatly Workes he raifed up in the City of ATHENS, that did much fet forth the fame. Other thinke it was given him for his great Authority and Power he had in Government, as well in Warres as in Peace. But it is no marvel that this glory was given him, confidering the many other qualities and vertues that were in him. Howbeit the Comedies the Poets caufed to be played in thofe times (in which there were many words fpoken of him, fome in earneft, fome in fport and jeft) do witneffe that he had that furname given him, chiefly for his Eloquence. For it is reported, that he thundred and lightened in his Orations to the People, and that his tongue was a terrible lightning. And touching this matter, they tell of an Answer Thucydides, Milefius Sonne, fhould pleafantly make concerning the force of Pericles Eloquence. Thucydides was a Nobleman, and had long time contended againft Pericles in matters of the Common-weale. Archidamus, King of LACEDÆMON, asked Thucydides on a time whether he or Pericles wrefteled beft. Thucydides made him answer. When I have given him an open fall before the face of the World, he can fo excellently deny it, that he maketh the People believe he had no fall at all, and perfwadeth them the contrary of that they faw. Notwithftanding, he was ever very grave and wife in fpeaking. For ever when he went up into the Pulpit for Orations, to fpeake unto the People, he made his Prayers unto the gods, that nothing might efcape his mouth, but that he might confider before, whether it would ferve the purpofe of his matter he treated on : yet are there none of his Workes extant in writing, unleffe unless it be some few Lawes he made, and but very few of his notable sayings are brought to light, save onely these. He said on a time, that they must take away the City of Ægina, because it was a straw lying in the eye of the haven Piræa. And another time, he said that he saw the Warres afar off, coming from Peloponnesus. And another time, as he tooke Ship with Sophocles (his companion in commission with him as Generall of the Army) who commended a faire young boy they met as they came to the haven: Sophocles, said he, a Governour must not onely have his hands, but also his eyes cleane. And Stesimbrotus writeth, that in a funerall Oration he made in the praise of those that were slaine in the Warre of Samos: he said they were immortall as the gods. For we do not see the gods (said he) as they be, but for the honour that is done to them, and the great happineffe they enjoy, we do conjecture they are immortall: and the same things are in those that die in service and defence of their Countrey. Now where Thucydides doth write the Government of the Common-wealth under Pericles to be as a Government of Nobility, and yet had appearance of a popular State: it is true, that in effect it was a Kingdome, because one alone did rule and governe the whole State. And many other say also, he was the first that brought in the custome to divide the Enemies Lands wonne by conquest among the People, and of the common money to make the People see Playes and Pastimes, and that appointed them reward for all things. But this custome wasill brought up. For the common People that before were contented with little, and got their living painfully with sweat of their browes, became now to be very vaine, sumptuous, and riotous, by reason of these things brought up then. The cause of the alteration doth easily appeare by those things. For Pericles at his first coming, fought to winne the favour of the People, as we have said before, onely to get like reputation that Cimon had wonne. But coming far short of his Wealth and ability, to carry out the port and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poore, keeping open house to all comers, cloathing poore old People, breaking open besides all Inclosures and Pales through all his Lands, that every one might with more liberty come in, and take the Fruits thereof at their pleasure: and seeing himselfe by these great meanes out-gone farre in good will with the common People, by Demonides counsell and procurement (who was borne in the Isle of Ios) he brought in this distribution of the common money, as Aristotle writeth. And having wonne in a short time the favour and good will of the common People, by distribution of the common Treasurie, which he caused to be divided among them, aswell to have place to see these Playes, as for that they had reward to be present at the judgements, and by other such like corruptions: he with the Peoples helpe, did inveigh against the Court of the Areopagites, whereof he never was any member. For it never came to be his happe to be yearly Governour, nor Keeper of the Lawes, nor King of the Sacrifices, nor Master of the Warres: all which were Officers chosen in ancient time by lot. And further, those on whom the lot fell, if they had behaved themselves well in their Office, they were called forwards, and raised to be of the body of this Court of the Areopagites. Pericles now by these meanes having obtained great credit and authority amongst the People, he troubled the Senate of the Areopagites in such sort, that he plucked many matters from their hearing, by Ephialtes helpe: and in time made Cimon to be banished Athens, as one that favoured the Lacedæmonians, and contraried the Common-wealth and Authority of the People. Notwithstanding he was the noblest and richest person of all the City, and one that had wonne so many glorious Victories, and had so replenished Athens with the conquered spoiles of their Enemies, as we have declared in his life: so great was the Authority of Pericles amongst the People. Now the banishment wherewith he was punished (which they called Ostracismos) was limited by the Law for tenne yeares. In which space the Lacedæmonians being come downe with a great Army into the Countrey of Tanagra, the Athenians sent out their power presently against them. There Cimon willing to shew the Athenians by his deedes, that they had falsely accused him for favouring the Lacedæmonians: did arme himselfe, and went on his Country-mens side, to fight in the company of his Tribe. But Pericles friends gathered together, and forced Cimon to depart thence as a banished man. And this was the cause that Pericles fought that day more valiantly then ever he did, and he wanne the honour and name to have done more in the person of himselfe that day, then any other of all the Army. At that Battell also, all Cimons friends, whom Pericles had burdened likewise to favour the Lacedæmonians doings, died every man of them that day. Then the Athenians repented them much that they had driven Cimon away, and wished he were restored, after they had lost this Battell upon the Confines of the Countrey of Attica: because they feared sharpe Warres would come upon them againe at the next Spring. Which thing when Pericles perceived, he sought also to further that the common People desired: wherefore he straight caused a Decree to be made, that Cimon should be called home againe, which was done accordingly. Now when Cimon was returned, he advised that peace should be made betweene both Cities: for the Lacedæmonians did love Cimon very well, and contrarily they hated Pericles, and all other Governours. Some notwithstanding do write, that Pericles did never passe his consent to call him home againe, before such time as they had made a secret agreement amongst themselves (by meanes of Elpinice, Cimons Sister) that Cimon should be sent out with an Army of two hundred Gallies, to make Warres in the King of Persia his Dominions, and that Pericles should remaine at home with the Authority of Government within the Citie. This Elpinice (Cimons Sister) had once before intreated Pericles for her brother, at such time as he was accused before the Judge of treason. For Pericles was one of the Committees, to whom this Accusation was referred by the People. Elpinice went unto him, and besought him him not to doe his worst unto her Brother. Pericles answered her mildly: Thou art too old Elpinice, thou art too old to goe through with these matters. Yet when this matter came to judgement, and that his cause was pleaded: he rose but once to speake against him (for his owne discharge as it were) and went his way when he had said: doing lesse hurt to Cimon then any other of his accusers. How is Idomeneus to be credited now, who accuseth Pericles that he had caused the Orator Ephialtes to be slaine by treason (that was his friend, and did alwayes counsell him; and take his part in all kinde of government of the Commonweale) onely for the jealousie and envy he did beare to his glory? I can but muse why Idomeneus should speake so slanderously against Pericles: unless it were that his melancholy humour procured such violent speech: who though peradventure he was not altogether blamelesse, yet he was ever nobly minded, and had a naturall desire of honour, in which kinde of men such furious cruell passions are seldome seene to breed. But this Orator Ephialtes being cruell to those that tooke part with the Nobility, because he would spare or pardon no man for any offence whatsoever committed against the peoples authority, but did follow and persecute them with all rigour to the uttermost: his enemies laid waite for him by meanes of one Aristodemus Tanagrian, and they killed him by treason, as Aristotle writeth. In the meane Cimon died in the Isle of Cyprus, being Generall of the Army of the Athenians by sea. Wherefore those that tooke part with the Nobility, seeing Pericles was now growne very great, and that he went before all other Citizens of Athens, thinking it good to have some one to stick on their side against him, and to lessen thereby somewhat his authority, that he might not come to rule all as he would: they raised up against him one Thucydides of the Towne of Alpeceia, a grave wise man and Father in law to Cimon. This Thucydides had lesse skill of warres then Cimon, but understood more in Civil government then he, for that he remained most part of his time within the City: where continually inveighing against Pericles in his Pulpit for Orations to the people, in short time he had stirred up a like company against the faction of Pericles. For he kept the Gentlemen and richer sort (which they call Nobility) from mingling with the common people, as they were before, when through the multitude of the commons their estate and dignity was obscured, and trodden under foot. Moreover he did separate them from the people, and did assemble them all as it were into one body, who came to be of equal power with the other faction, and did put (as a man will say) a counterpoise into the ballance. For at the beginning there was but a little secret grudge onely betwene these two factions, as an artificall Flower set in the blade of a Sword, which made those shew a little, that did leane unto the people; and the other also somewhat that favoured the Nobility. But the contention betwene these two persons, was as a deep cut, which divided the City into two factions: of which the one was called the Nobility, and the other the Communalty. Therefore Pericles giving yet more liberty unto the people, did all things that might be to please them, ordaining continual Playes and Games in the City, many Feasts and Bankets, and open pastimes to entertaine the commons with such honest pleasures and devises: and besides all this, he sent yearly an Army of three score Gallies unto the warres, into the which he put a great number of poore Citizens, that tooke pay of the State for nine moneths of the yeare, and thereby they did learne together, and practise to be good Seamen. Furthermore he sent into the Countrey of Cherroneus, a thousand free-men of the City to dwell there, and to divide the Lands amongst them: five hundred also into the Isle of Naxos: into the Isle of Andros two hundred and fifty: into Thracia, a thousand to dwell with the Bisaltes: and other also into Italy, when the City of Syracuse was built againe; which afterwards was furnished the City of the Thurians. All this he did, to rid the City of a number of idle people, who through idlenesse began to be curious, and to desire change of things, as also to provide for the necessity of the poore Towne-men that had nothing. For placing the naturall Citizens of Athens neere unto their subjects and friends, they served as a Garison to keepe them under, and did suppress them also from attempting any alteration or change. But that which delighteth most, and is the greatest ornament unto the City of Athens, which maketh strangers most to wonder, and which alone doth bring sufficient testimony, to confirme that which is reported of the ancient power, riches, and great wealth of Greece, to be true and not false; are the stately and sumptuous buildings which Pericles made to be built in the City of Athens: For it is the onely act of all other Pericles did, and which made his enemies most to spite him, and which they most accused him for, crying out upon him in all counsels and assemblies: that the people of Athens were openly defamed, for carrying away the ready Money of all Greece, which was left in the Isle of Delos, to be safely kept there. And although they could with good honesty have excused this fact, saying, that Pericles had taken it from them, for feare of the barbarous people, to the end to lay it up in a more stronger place, where it should be in better safety: yet was this too overgreat an injury offered unto all the rest of Greece, and too manifest a token of tyranny also, to behold before their eyes, how we doe employ the Money, which they were enforced to gather for the maintenance of the warres against the barbarous people, in gilding, building, and setting forth our City, like a glorious woman, all to be gauded with gold and precious stones; and how we doe make Images, and build up Temples of wonderfull and infinite charge. Pericles replied to the contrary, and declared unto the Athenians, that they were not bound to make any account of this Money unto their friends and allies, considering that they fought for their safety, and that they kept the barbarous people farre from Greece without troubling them to set out any one Man, Horse or Ship of theirs, the Money onely excepted, which is no more theirs that paid it, then theirs that received it, so they bestow it to that use they received it for.

And their City being already well furnished and provided of all things necessary for the wars, it was good reason they should employ and bestow the surplus of the treasure in things which in time to come (and being thoroughly finished) would make their fame eternall. Moreover he said that whilst they continue building, they should be presently rich, by reason of the diversity of works of all sorts, and other things which they should have need of, and to compass these things the better, and to set them in hand, all manner of artificers and workmen (that would labour) should be set on work; So should all the Town-men and Inhabitants of the City receive pay and wages of the common treasure, and the City by this means should be greatly beautified, and much more able to maintain it selfe. For such as were strong and able men of body, and of years to carry weapon, had pay and entertainment of the Common-wealth, which were sent abroad unto the warres, and other that were not meet for warres, as craft-men and labourers: He would also they should have part of the common treasure, but not without they earned it, and by doing somewhat. And this was his reason, and the cause that made him occupy the common people with great buildings and devises of works of diverse occupations, which could not be finished of long time; to the end that the Citizens remaining at home might have a meane way to take part of the common treasure, and enrich themselves as well as those that went to the wars, and served on the sea, or else that lay in garison to keep any place or fort. For some gained by bringing stuffe, as stones, brasse, ivory, gold, ebony, and cyprisse. Other got to work and fashion it, as Carpenters, Gravers, Founders, Casters of Images, Masons, Hewers of stone, Diers, Goldsmiths, Joyners working in Ivory, Painters, Men that let in sundry colours of peeces of stone or wood, and Turners. Others gained to bring stuffe, and to furnish them, as Merchants, Mariners, and Shipmasters, for things they brought them by Sea: And by Land others got also, as Cart-makers, Carriers, Carters, Cord-makers, Sadlers, Coller-makers, and Pyopers to make waies plain, and Miners, and such like. Furthermore every science and craft, as a Captain having Souldiers, had also their Army of the Workmen that served them, labouring truly for their living, who served as apprentices and Journeymen under the workmasters; So the work by this means did disperse abroad a common gain to all sorts of people and ages, what occupation or trade soever they had. And thus came the buildings to rise in greatnesse and sumptuousnesse, being of excellent workmanship, and for grace and beauty not comparable, because every workman in his Science did strive what he could to excell others, to make his work appear greatest in sight, and to be most workmanly done in shew. But the greatest thing to be wondred at was their speed and diligence. For where every man thought those works were not likely to be finished in many mens lives and ages, and from man to man; they were all done and finished, whilst one only governour continued still in credit and authority. And yet they say that in the same time as one Agatharchus boasted himselfe that he had quickly painted certaine beasts; Zenxis another Painter hearing him, answered, And I contrarily do rejoyce that I am a long time in drawing of them. For commonly sleight and sudden drawing of any thing, cannot take deepe colours, nor give perfect beauty to the worke; but length of time adding to the Painters diligence and labour in making of the worke, maketh the colours to continue for ever. For this cause therefore the workes Pericles made are more wonderfull because they were perfectly made in so short a time, and have continued so long a season. For every one of those which were finished up at that time, seemed then to be very ancient touching the beauty thereof; and yet for the grace and continuance of the same it looketh at this day as if it were but newly done and finished, there is such a certain kinde of flourishing freshnesse in it, which letteth that the injury of time cannot impair the sight thereof. As if every of those foresaid workes had some living spirit in it, to make it seeme young and fresh, and a soul that lived ever, which kept them in their good continuing state. Now the chief Surveyor General of all these workes was Phidias, albeit that there were many other excellent Workmasters in every science and occupation. For the Temple of Pallas which is called Parthenon (as a man would say, the Temple of the Virgin, and is surnamed Hecatompodon, for that it is a hundred foot every way) was built by Ictinus, and Galligrates; and the Chappell of Elenus (where the secret Ceremonies of the mysteries were made) was first founded by Corabus, who raised up the first pillars in order, standing beneath on the ground, and did set them up unto the Master Chaptrels. But after he was dead, Metagenes, born in the Town of Xypeta, turned the arches over, and then did set the pillars in order also which are above, and Xenochus of the Towne of Cholargea, was he that made the lanthorne or top of the steeple which covereth the Sanctuary; but the long wall which Socrates heard Pericles himselfe give order for the building of it, was done by Callicrates, who undertook the work. Crasinus the Poet, in a Comedy he made, laugheth at this work, to see how slowly it went forward, and how long it was a doing, saying,

*Pericles long agoe did end this worke begunne,
And build it high with glorious words, if so it had been done.
But as for deeds (in deed) he built nothing at all,
But let it stand; as yet it stands, much liker for to fall,*

And as for the Theater or place appointed for musick, where they heare all Musicians play, and is called Odeon: It is very well made within with divers seats and degrees, and many ranges of pillars, but the top of the rooff is altogether round, which is somewhat hanging downward round about of it selfe, coming together into one point. And it is said that this was made after the pattern and fashon of King Xerxes royall Pavilion, and that Pericles was the first deviser and maker of it. Wherefore Crasinus in another place of his comedy he maketh of the Thracians, doth play very pretily upon him, saying,

Pericles

Pericles here doth come, Dan Jupiter surnamed, (And onions head) which hath in his great noddle finely framed The plot of Odeon, when he delivered was

From banishment and dangers deepe, wherein he long did passe.

Pericles was the first that made marvellous earnest labour to the people that they would make an order, that on the day of the Feast called Panathenea, they would set up games for musicke. And he himselfe being chosen Ruler of these games, as judge to reward the best deserver; ordained the manner the Musicians should ever after keepe in their finging, playing on their flutes, or upon the Citherne, or other Instruments of musicke. So the first games that ever were for musicke, were kept within the Odeon, and so were the other after them also ever celebrated there. The gate and entring into the Castle was made and finished within the space of five yeares, under the charge of Menescles, that was Master of the Works. And whilst these gates were a building, there happened a wonderful chance, which declared very well that the goddesse Minerva did not mislike the Building, but that it pleased her marvellously. For one of the most painfulllest Workemen that wrought there fell by mischance from the height of the Castle to the ground, which fall did so sore bruise him, and he was so sick withall, that the Physicians and Surgeons had no hope of his life. Pericles being very sorry for his mischance, the goddesse appeared to him in his sleep in the night, and taught him a medicine, with the which he did easily heale the poore bruised man, and that in short time. And this was the occasion why he caused the Image of the goddesse Minerva (otherwise called of health) to be cast in brasse, and set up within the Temple of the Castle, neare unto the Altar which was there before, as they say. But the golden Image of Minerva was made by Phidias, and graven round about the base, who had the charge in manner of all other workes, and by reason of the good will Pericles bare him, he commanded all the other workemen. And this made the one to be greatly envied, and the other to be very ill spoken of. For their enemies gave it out abroad, that Phidias received the Gentlewomen of the City into his house, under colour to goe see his workes, and did convey them to Pericles. Upon this brute the Comical Poets taking occasion, did cast out many slanderous Speeches against Pericles, accusing him that he kept one Menippus Wife, who was his friend and Lieutenant in the warres: and burthened him further, that Pyrilampes one of his familiar friends also, brought up Fowl, and specially Peacocks, which he secretly sent unto the women that Pericles kept. But we must not wonder at those Satyres that make profession to speake slanderously against all the world; as it were to sacrifice the injuries and wrongs they cast upon honourable and good men, to the spite and envy of the people, as unto wicked spirits; considering that Stesimbrotus Thasian durst fallily accuse Pericles of detestable incest, and of abusing his owne Sons wife. And this is the reason in my opinion, why it is so hard a matter to come to the perfect knowledge of the truth of ancient things, by the Monuments of Historiographers; considering long processe of time doth utterly obscure the truth of matters done in former times. For every written History speaking of men that are alive, and of the time of things, whereof it maketh mention; sometime for hate and envy, sometime for favour or flattery, doth disguise and corrupt the truth. But Pericles perceiving that the Orators of Thucydides faction in their common Orations did still cry out upon him, that he did vainly waste and consume the common treasure, and that he bestowed upon the workes all the whole revenue of the City; One day when the people were assembled together before them all, he asked them if they thought that the cost bestowed were too much. The people answered him, a great deal too much. Well, said he then, the charges shall be mine (if you thinke good) and none of yours; provided that no mans name be written upon the workes but mine onely. When Pericles had said so, the people cried out aloud, they would none of that (either because that they wondred at the greatnesse of his minde, or else for that they would not give him the only honour and praise to have done so sumptuous and stately workes) but willed him that he should see them ended at the common charges, without sparing for any cost. But in the end, falling out openly with Thucydides, and putting it to an adventure which of them should banish other, with the banishment of Ostracism: Pericles got the upper hand; and banished Thucydides out of the City, and therewithall also overthrew the contrary faction against him. Now when he had rooted out all factions, and brought the City againe to unity and concord, he found then the whole power of Athenes in his hands, and all the Athenians matters at his disposing. And having all the treasure, armour, galleys, the Isles, and the Sea, and a marvellous feignory and kingdom (that did enlarge it selfe partly over the Grecians, and partly over the barbarous people) so well fortified and strengthened with the obedience of Nations subject unto them, with the friendship of Kings, and with the alliance of divers other Princes and mighty Lords; then from that time forward he began to change his manners towards the people, and not so easily to give place and frame himselfe to the peoples wils and desires, no more then as it were to contrary winds. Furthermore he altered his over-gentle and popular manner of government which he used until that time, as too delicate and too effeminate an harmony of musicke, and did convert it unto an imperious government, or rather to a Kingly authority; but yet held still a direct course, and kept himselfe ever upright without fault, as one that did, said, and counseled that which was most expedient for the Commonweale. He many times brought on the people by persuasions and reasons to be willing to grant that he preferred unto them; but many times also he drave them to it by force; and made them against their wils do that which was best for them. Following therein the devise of a wife Physician, who in a long and changeable disease doth grant his Patient sometime to take his pleasure of a thing he liketh, but yet after a moderate sort; and another time time also, he doth give him a sharpe or bitter medicine that doth vex him, though it heale him: For (as it falleth out commonly unto people that enjoy so great an Empire) many times misfortunes did chance, that filled them full of sundry passions, the which Pericles alone could finely steere and governe with two principall rudders, Feare and Hope; brideling with the one the fierce and insolent rashnesse of the common people in prosperity, and with the other comforting their grieie and discouragement in adversity. Wherein he manifestly proved, that Rhetoricke and Eloquence (as Plato saith) is an Art which quickeneth mens spirits at her pleasure, and her chiefe skill is to know how to move passions and affections throughly, which are as strops and founds of the Soul, that would be plaied upon with a fine sliogered hand of a cunning Master. All which, not the force of Eloquence only brought to passe, as Thucydides witnesseth, but the reputation of his life, and the opinion and confidence they had of his great worthinesse, because he would not any way be corrupted with gifts, neither had he any covetousnesse in him. For, when he had brought his City not onely to be great, but exceeding great and wealthy, and had in power and authority exceeded many Kings and Tyrants, yea, even those which by their Wils and Testaments might have left great possessions to their Children; he never for all that encreased his Fathers Goods and Patrimony left him the value of a groate in silver. And yet the Historiographer Thucydides doth set forth plainly enough the greatnesse of his power. And the Comical Poets also of that time doe report it maliciously under covert words, calling his familiar friends the new Pythiades, saying, how they must make him sweare and protest he would never be King, giving us thereby to understand that his authority was too exceeding great for a popular Government. And Teleclides (amongst other) saith, that the ATHENIANS had put into his hands the revenue of the Townes and Cities under their obedience, and the Townes themselves, to binde the one and lose the other, and to pull downe their wals, or to build them againe at his pleasure. They gave him power to make peace and alliance, they gave all their force, treasure, and authority, and all their goods wholly into his hands. But this was not for a little while, nor in a geere of favour, that should continue for a time, but this held out forty years together, he being alwaies the chiefe of his City amongst the Ephialtes, the Leocrates, the Miromides, the Cimons, the Tolmides, and the Thucydides. For after he had prevailed against Thucydides, and had banished him, he yet remained chiefe above all other, the space of fifteene yeares. Thus having attained a regal Dignity to command all, which continued as aforesaid, where no other Captaines authority endured but one yeare: he ever kept himselfe upright from bribes and money, though otherwise he was no ill husband, and could warily looke to his owne. As for his Lands and Goods left him by his Parents, that they miskaried not by negligence, nor that they should trouble him much, in buyling himselfe to reduce them to a value; he did to husband them as he thought was his best and easiest way. For he sold in grosse ever the whole years profit and commodity of his lands, and afterwards sent to the market daily to buy the cates, and other ordinary provision of household. This did not like his Sons that were men growne, neither were his women contented with it, who would have had him more liberrall in his house; for they complained of his overhard and straight ordinary, because in so noble and great a house as his, there was never any great remaine left of meate, but all things received into the house, ranne under account, and were delivered out by proportion. All this good husbandry of his was kept upright in this good order, by one Evangelus, steward of his house, a man very honest and skillful in all his household provision; and whether Pericles had brought him up to it, or that he had it by nature, it was not knowne. But these things were far contrary to Anaxagoras wisdom; For he despising the world, and casting his affection on heavenly things, did willingly forsake his house, and suffered all his land to run to layes and to pasture. But (in my opinion) great is the diversity betwixt a contemplative life and a civil life. For the one employeth all his time upon the speculation of good and honest things; and to attaine to that, he thinketh he hath no need of any exterior help or instrument. The other applying all his time upon vertue, to the common profit and benefit of men, he thinketh that he needeth riches as an Instrument not only necessary but also honest. As, looke upon the example of Pericles, who did relieve many people; And Anaxagoras specially among other; of whom it is reported, that Pericles being occupied about matters of state at that time, having no leisure to thinke upon Anaxagoras, he seeing himselfe old and forsaken of the world, laid him downe, and covered his head close, determining to starve himselfe to death with hunger. Pericles understanding this, ran presently to him as a man halfe cait away, and prayed him as earnestly as he could that he would dispose himselfe to live, being not onely sorry for him, but for himselfe also, that he should lose so faithfull and wife a Counsellour in matters of state and government. Then Anaxagoras shewed his face, and told him: O Pericles, those that will see by the light of a Lampe, must put oyle to it, to make the light burne. Now began the LACEDÆMONIANS to grow jealous of the greatnesse of the ATHENIANS, wherefore Pericles to make the ATHENIANS hearts greater, and so draw their minde to great enterprises; set downe an order they should send Ambassadors to perswade all the GRECIANS (in what part soever they dwelt in EUROPE or ASIA, as well the little as the great Cities) to send their Deputies unto ATHENS, to the general assembly that should be holden there to take order for the Temples of the gods which the barbarous people had burnt, and touching the sacrifices they had vowed for the preservation of GREECE, when they gave battel upon them; and touching Sea matters also, that every man might faile in safety where he would, and that all might live together in good peace and love one with another. To performe this commission, twenty persons were sent of this Ambassiate, every one of them being fifty years of age and upward.

ward. Whereof five of them went to the DORIANS dwelling in ASIA; and to the Inhabitants of the Isles, even unto the Isles of LESBOS, and of the RHODES. Five other went through all the Coun-trei of HELLES PONT, and of THRACIA, unto the City of BIZANTIUM. Other five were commanded to go into BOROTIA, into PHOCIDES, and through all PELOPONNESUS; and from thence by the Countrey of the LOCRIANS, into the upland Countrey joyning to it, until they came into the Countrey of ACHARNIA and of AMBRACIA. And the other five went first into the Isle of EUROPA, and from thence unto the ORBITANS and through all the gulfe of MALIA unto the PHYTIANS, unto the ACHAIANS, and the THESSALIANS, declaring to all the people, where they came the ATHENIANS Commission, perswading them to send unto ATHENS, and so be present at the Councell which should be holden there for the pacification and union of all GREECE.
But when all came to all nothing was done; and the said Cities of GREECE did not assemble, by practice of the LACEDÆMONIANS (as it is reported) who were altogether the let; for the first refusal that was made of their Summons was at PELOPONNESUS. This have I written to make Pericles noble courage to be knowne, and how profound a wife man he shewed himselfe unto the world. Furthermore when he was chosen Generall in the warres he was much esteemed, because he ever tooke great regard to the safety of his Souldiers. For by his good will he would never hazard battel, which he saw might fall out doubtful, or in any thing dangerous; And moreover he never praised them for good Generals; neither would he follow them that had obtained great Victories by hazard, howsoever other did esteem or commend them. For he was wont to say, that if none but himselfe did leade them to the flames, as much as lay in him, they should be immortal. And when he saw Tolmides, the Son of Tolmaus (trusting to his former Victories, and the praise and commendation of his good service) did prepare upon no occasion, and to no purpose, to enter into the Countrey of BOROTIA, and had procured also a thousand of the lustiest and most valiant men of the City, to be contented to go with him in that journey, over and above the rest of the Army he had levied; He went about to turne him from his purpose, and to keepe him at home, by many perswasions he used to him before the peoples face, and spake certain words at that time that were remembered long after, and these they were.
That if he would not beleve Pericles counsell, yet that he would tarry time at the least, which is the wisest Counsellor of men. These words were prettily liked at that present time. But within few daies after, when newes was brought that Tolmides selfe was slaine in a battel he had lost neare unto the City of CORONEA, wherein perished also many other honest and valiant men of ATHENS: His words spoken before did then greatly encrease Pericles his reputation and good will with the common people, because he was taken for a wife man; and one that loved his Citizens. But of all his journeys he made, being General over the army of the ATHENIANS, the journey of CHERONEA was best thought of and esteemed, because it fell out to the great benefit and preservation of all the GRECIANS inhabiting in that Countrey. For besides that he brought thither a thousand Citizens of ATHENS to dwell there (in which doing he strengthened the Cities with so many good men) he did fortifie the barre also, which did let it from being of an Isle, with a Fortification he drew from one Sea to another, so that he defended the Countrey against all the invasions and piracies of the THRACIANS inhabiting thereabouts, and delivered it of extreme warre, with the which it was plagued before, by the barbarous people their neighbours, or dwelling amongst them, who onely lived upon Piracy and robbing on the Seas. So was he likewise much honoured and esteemed of strangers when he did environ all PELOPONNESUS, departing out of the Haven of PEGES, on the Coast of MEGARA, with a Fleet of a hundred Gallies. For he did not only spoile the Towns all along the Sea side, as Tolmides had done before him; but going up further into the maine Land, farre from the Sea, with his Souldiers he had in the Gallies, he drave some of them to retire within their walles, he made them so afraid of him; and in the County of NEMEA he overcame the SICYONIANS in battel, that raised him in the field, and did erect a pillar for a notable marke of his Victory. And imbarcking in his Ships a new Supply of Souldiers which he tooke up in ACHAIA, being Friends with the ATHENIANS at that time, he passed over to the firme Land that lay directly against it. And pointing beyond the mouth of the River of Achelous, he invaded the Countrey of ACHARNANIA, where he shut up the OENEADES within their wals. And after he had laid waste and destroyed all the Champion Countrey, he returned home againe to ATHENS: Having shewed himselfe in this Journey a dreadfull Captaine to his enemies, and very carefull for the safety of his Souldiers. For there fell out no manner of misfortune all this Journey (by chance or otherwise) unto the Souldiers under his Charge. And afterwarde, going with a great Navy marvellous well appointed unto the Realme of PONTUS, he did there gently use and entreate the Cities of GREECE, and granted them all that were required of him, making the barbarous people inhabiting thereabouts, and the Kings and Princes of the same also, to know the great power and force of the ATHENIANS, who sailed without feare all about where they thought good, keeping all the Coasts of the Sea under their obedience. Furthermore, he left with the SINOPIANS thirteen gallies, with certaine number of Souldiers under Captaine Lamachus, to defend them against the Tyrant Timislaus, who being expulsed and driven away with those of his Faction, Pericles caused Proclamation to be made at ATHENS, that six hundred freemen of the City, that had any desire to go, without compulsion, might go dwell at SINOPA, where they should have divided among them the goods and lands of the Tyrant and his Followers. But he did not follow the foolish vaine humours of his Citizens, nor would not yeeld to their unsatiable covetousnesse, who being set on a jollity to see themselves so strong and of such a power, and besides, to have good lucke, would needs once againe; attempte to contempt EGYPT, and to revise all the Countreys upon the Seacoasts, from the Empire of the King of PERSIA, for there were many of them whose mindes were marvellously bent to attempt the unfortunate enterprize of entering SICILIA, which Alcibiades afterwards did much pricke forward. And some of them dreaming of the Conquest of THUSCAN, and the Empire of CARTHAGE. But this was not altogether without some likelihood, nor without occasion of hope, considering the large bounds of their kingdom, and the fortunate estate of their affaires; which fell out according to their owne desire. But Pericles did hinder their going out, and cut off altogether their curious desire, employing the most part of their power and force, to keepe that they had already gotten: judging it no small matter to keepe downe the LACEDÆMONIANS from growing greater. For he was alwayes an enemy to the LACEDÆMONIANS, as he shewed himselfe in many things, but specially in the warre he made, called the Holy warre. For the LACEDÆMONIANS having put the PHOCIANS from the charge of the Temple of Apollo, in the City of DELPHES, which they had usurped, and having restored the DELPHIANS againe unto the same, so soone as they were gone thence, Pericles went also with another Army, and restored the PHOCIANS againe. And whereas the LACEDÆMO-NIANS had caused to be graven in the forehead of a Wolfe of brasse, the priviledge the DEL-PHIANS had granted them, to be the first that should make their demands of the Oracle, he having attained the like priviledge of the PHOCIANS, made his Image also to be graven on the right side of the same Image of the brasse Wolfe. Now how wisely Pericles did governe GREECE by the power of the ATHENIANS, his deeds doe plainly shew. For first of all, the countrey of EUBOEA did rebell, against whom he brought the Army of the ATHENIANS. And suddenly in the necke of that, came newes from another Coast, that the MEGARIANS also were in armes against them, and how they were already entred into the countrey of ATTICA with a great Army, led by Plistonax, King of LACEDÆMON. This occasion drew him homeward againe, and so he marched backe with speede into his countrey, to make preparation to encounter his enemies, that were already entred into the territories of ATTICA. He durst not offer them battell, being so great a number of valiant Souldiers: but hearing that King Plistonax was yet a young man, and was ruled altogether by Cleandrides counsell and direction (whom the Ephores had placed about him to counsell and direct him) he sought privily to corrupt Cleandrides. When he had won him soone with his money, he perswaded him to draw backe the PELOPONNESIANS out of their countrey of ATTICA: and so he did. But when the LACEDÆMONIANS saw their Army cased, and that the people were gone their way, every man to his owne City or Towne, they were so mad at it, that the King was condemned in a great summe. The King being unable to answer his Fine, which was so extreme great, he was driven to absent himself from LACEDÆMON. Cleandrides on the other side, if he had not fled in time, even for spite had been condemned to death. This Cleandrides was Gylippus Father, that afterwards overcame the ATHENIANS in SICILIA, in whom it seemed nature bred covetousnesse, as a disease inheritable by succession from the Father to the Sonne. For he being shamefully convicted also, for certaine vile parts he had plaid, was likewise banished from SPARTA: as we have more amply declared in the Life of Lysander. And Pericles delivering up the account of his charge, and setting downe an Article of the expence of ten Talents he had employed, or should employ in needfull causes: the people allowed them him, never asking question how, or which way, nor whether it was true that they were bestowed. Now there are certaine writers (amongst whom the Philosopher Theophrastus is one) who write, that Pericles sent yearly unto SPARTA ten Talents, with the which he entertained those that were in authority there, because they should make no wars with them:

not to buy peace of them, but time, that he might in the meane season, with better commodity, and that leisure, provide to maintaine the warres. After that, as the Army of the PELOPONNESIANS were out of the countrey of ATTICA, he returned against the Rebels, and passed into the Isle EUBOEA with fifty saile, and five thousand Pootmen well armed: and there he overcame all the Cities that had taken armes against him, and drave away the Hyppobotes, who were the most famous men of all the CHALCIDIANS, as well for their riches, as for their valiantesie. He drave away also all the HESTIANS, whom he chased cleane out of all the Countrey, and placed in their City only the Citizens of ATHENS. And the cause why he dealt so rigorously with them was, because they having taken a Galley of the ATHENIANS prisoner, had put all the men to death that were in her. And peace being concluded afterwards betweene the ATHENIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS for thirty yeares: he proclaimed open warres against those of the Isle of SAMOS, burthening them; that they being commanded by the ATHENIANS to pacifie the quarrels which they had against the MILESIANS, they would not obey. But because some hold opinion, that he tooke upon him this warre against SAMOS, for the love of Alfasia, it shall be no great digression of our story, to tell you by the way, what manner of Woman she was, and what a marvellous gift and power she had, that she could entangle with her love the chieffest Rulers and Governours at that time of the Common-weale, and that the Philosophers themselves did so largely speake and write of her. First of all, it is certaine that she was borne in the City of MILETUM, and was the Daughter of one Asiochus: the following the steps and example of an old Curtisan of IONIA, called Thargelia, gave her selfe only to entertaine the greatest Persons and chieffest Rulers in her time. For this Thargelia being passing faire, and carrying a comely grace with her, having a sharp wit and pleasant tongue, she had the acquaintance and friendship of the greatest of all GREECE, and wan all those that did haunt her company, to be at the King of Perfians commandement. So that she sowed through all the Cities

OF GREECE, great beginnings of the faction of the MENDS: for they were the greatest men of power and authority of every City that were acquainted with her. But as for Apasia, some say that Pericles resorted unto her, because she was a wife woman, and had great understanding in matters of state and government. For Socrates himselfe went to see her sometimes with his friends: and those that used her company also, brought their Wives many times with them to heare her talke: though her traine were, to entertaine such as would warme them by her fire. Epichimus writeth, that Lysicles a Grasier, being before but a meane man, and of a clubbish nature, came to be the chiefe man of ATHENS, by frequenting the company of Apasia, after the death of Pericles. And to Plautus booke intituled Menexenus, although the beginning of it be but pleasantly written, yet in that, this story is written truly: that this Apasia was repaired unto by divers of the ATHENIANS, to learne the Art of Rhetoricks of her. Yet notwithstanding it seemeth most likely, that the affection Pericles did beare her, grew rather of love then of any other cause. For he was married unto a Kinswoman of his owne, and that before was Hipponicus Wife, by whom he had Callias, surnamed the rich: and had afterwards by Pericles, Xanippus and Paralus. But not liking her company, he gave her with her own goodwill and consent unto another, and married Apasia whom he dearely loved. For ever when he went abroad, and came home againe, he saluted her with a kisse. Whereupon in the ancient Comedies, she is called in many places, the new Omphale, and sometimes Deianira, and sometimes Phno. But Cratinus plainly calleth her Whore in these verses:

His Juno she him brought, Aspasia by Name, which was indeed an open whore, and past all kinde of shame.

And it seemeth that he had a Bastard: for Exopolis in a Comedy of his called Demofij, bringeth him in, asking Pironides thus:

I pray thee is my bastard-Sonne yet alive?

And then Pirrides answered him :

*A perfect man long since, he surely had been found;
If that this lewd and naughty whore, his virtue had not drown'd.*

To conclude, this Alpafia was so famous, that Cyrus (he that fought against King Artaxerxes his Brother, for the Empire of PERSIA) called Alpafia his best beloved of all his Concubines, which before was called Militio; and was borne in PHOCIDES, being Hermotimus Daughter: And Cyrus being slain in the field, Alpafia was carried to the King his Brother, with whom afterwards she was in great favour. As I was writing this Life, this story came in my minde: and me thought I should have dealt hardly, if I should have left it unwritten. But to our matter againe. Pericles was charged that he made warres against the SAMIANS, on the behalfs of the MILESIANS, at the request of Alpafia: for these two Cities were at warres together for the City of PRILENA, but the SAMIANS were the stronger. Now the ATHENIANS commanded them to lay aside their armes, and to come and pleade their matter before them, that the right might be decided: but they refused it utterly. Wherefore Pericles went thither and tooke away the government of the small number of Nobility, taking for hostages, fifty of the chiefeft Men of the City, and so many Children besides, which he left to be kept in the Ile of LEMNOS. Some say every one of these hostages offered to give him a Talent: and besides those, many other offered him the like, such as would not have the sovereign authority put into the hands of the people. Moreover Pisisthnes the PERSIAN, Lieutenant to the King of Persia, for the good will he bore those of SAMOS, did send Pericles ten thousand Crownes to release the hostages. But Pericles never tooke Penny: and having done that he determined at SAMOS, and established a popular government, he returned againe to Athens. Notwithstanding, the SAMIANS rebelled immediately after, having recovered their hostages againe by means of these Pisisthnes that stole them away, and did furnish them also with all their munition of warre. Whereupon Pericles returning against them once more, he found them not idle, nor amazed at his coming, but resolutely determined to receive him, and to fight for the seigniory by sea. So there was a great battell fought betwene them neere the Ile of THRACIA. And Pericles won the battell: having with forty foure saile onely nobly overcome his enemies, which were threefoore and ten in number, whereof twenty of them were Ships of warre. And so following his victory forthwith, he wan also the Port of SAMOS, and kept the SAMIANS besieged within their owne City: where they were yet so bold, as they would make sallies out many times, and fight before the wallles of the City. But when there arrived a new supply of Shippes, bringing a greater aide unto Pericles, then were they shut up on all sides. Pericles then taking threefoore Galleyes with him, lancht out into the sea, with intent (as some say) to goe meete certaine Shippes of the PHOENICIANS (that came to aide the SAMIANS) as farre from SAMOS as he could: or as Stesimbrotus saith; to goe into CYPRUS, which me thinketh is not true. But whatsoever was his intent; he committed a foule fault. For Melissus (the sonne of Ithageneis, a great Philosopher) being at that time Generall of the SAMIANS, perceiving that few shippes were left behind at the siege of the City, and that the Captaines also that had the charge of them were not very expert men of warre, perswaded his Citizens to make a sallie upon them. Whereupon they fought a battell, and the SAMIANS overcame: the ATHENIANS were taken prisoners, and they sunke many of their ships. Now they being Lords againe of the sea, did furnish their City with all manner of munition for warres, whereof before they had great want. Yet Aristotle writeth; that Pericles self was once overcome in a battell at sea by Melissus. Furthermore the SAMIANS, to be even with the ATHENIANS for the injury they had received of them before, did brand them in the forehead with the stampe of an inticed Menon, one of the Workmen that wrought under Phidias, and made him come into the market-place to pray assurance of the people that he might openly accuse Phidias, for a fault he had committed about Pallas Image. The people received his obedience, and his accusation was heard openly in the market-place, but no mention was made of any theft at all, because that Phidias (through Pericles counsell and device) had from the beginning so laid on the gold upon the Image, that it might be taken off and weighed every whit. Whereupon Pericles openly said unto his accusers, take off the gold and weigh it. The glory of his works did purchase him this envy: For he having graven upon the Scutcheon of the goddess, the battell of the AMAZONS, had cut out the portraiture of himselfe marvellous lively, under the person of an old bald man, lifting up a great stone with both his hands. Further, he had cut out Pericles Image excellently wrought and artificially, seeming in manner to be Pericles selfe, fighting with an AMAZON in this sort: the AMAZONS hand being lift up high, holdeth a dart before Pericles face, so passing cunningly wrought, as it seemed to shadow the likenesse and resemblance of Pericles: and yet notwithstanding appeareth plainly to be Pericles selfe on either side of the portraiture. So Phidias was clapt up in prison, and there died of a sicknesse, or else of poison (as some say) which his enemies had prepared for him; and all to bring Pericles into further suspition, and to give them the more cause to accuse him. But howsoever it was, the people gave Menon his freedom, and set him free from payment of all Subsidies, following the order Glycon made, and gave the Capitaines charge they should see him safely kept, and that he tooke no hurt. And about the same time also Aspasia was accused, that she did not beleve in the gods: and her accuser was Hermippus, maker of the Comedies. He burdened her further, that she was a Bawd to Pericles, and received Citizens Wives into her house, which Pericles kept. And Diophetes at the same time made a Decree, that they should make search and enquiry for Hereticks that did not beleve in the gods, and that taught certaine new Doctrine and opinion touching the operations of things above in the element, turning the suspition upon Pericles because of Anaxagoras. The people did receive and confirme this Inquisition: and it was moved also then by Dracondites, that Pericles should deliver an account of the Money he had spent, unto the hands of the Prytanes, who were treasurers of the common Fines and Revenues; and that the Judges deputed to give judgement, should give sentence within the City upon the Altar. But Agnon put that word out of the Decree, and placed in steade thereof, that the Cause should be judged by the fifteen hundred Judges, as they thought good, if any man brought his Action for Theft, for Battery, or for Injustice. As for Aspasia, he saved her, even for the very pity and compassion the Judges tooke of him, for the teares he shed in making his humble suit for her, all the time he pleaded her case; as Eschines writeth. But for Anaxagoras, fearing that he could not doe so much for him, he sent him out of the City, and himselfe did accompany him. And furthermore, seeing he had incurred the ill will of the people for Phidias fact, and for this cause fearing the issue of the judgement; he set the warres afire againe, that alwayes went backward, and did but smoke a little, hoping by this meanes to wear out the accusations against him, and to roote out the malice some did beare him. For the people having weighty matters in hand and very dangerous also, he knew they would put all into his hands alone, he having won already such great authority and reputation among them. And these be the causes why he would not (as it is said) suffer the ATHENIANS to yeeld unto the LACEDÆMONIANS in any thing: howbeit the truth cannot certainly be knowne. But the LACEDÆMONIANS knowing well, that if they could weede out Pericles, and overthrow him, they might then deale as they would with the ATHENIANS; they commanded them they should purge their City of Cylon rebellion, because they knew well enough that Pericles kinne by the Mothers side were to be touched withall, as Thucydides declareth. But this practice fell out contrary to their hope and expectation, that were sent to ATHENS for this purpose. For, weening to have brought Pericles into further suspition and displeasure, the Citizens honoured him the more, and had a better affiance in him then before, because they saw his enemies did so much feare and hate him. Wherefore, before King Archidamus entred with the Army of the PELOPONNESIANS into the Country of ATTICA, he told the ATHENIANS, that if King Archidamus fortun'd to waite and destroy all the Country about, and should spare his Lands and Goods for the old love and familiarity that was betweene them, or rather to give his enemies occasion fallly to accuse him: that from thenceforth, he gave all the Lands and Tenements he had in the Country, unto the Commonwealth. So it fortun'd that the LACEDÆMONIANS with all their friends and confederates, brought a marvellous Army into the Country of ATTICA, under the leading of King Archidamus: who burning and spoiling all the Country they came along, they came unto the Towne of ACHARNES, where they encamped, supposing the ATHENIANS would never suffer them to approach so neere, but that they would give them battell for the honour and defence of their Country, and to shew that they were no cowards. But Pericles wisely considered how the danger was too great to hazard battell, where the losse of the City of ATHENS stood in perill, seeing they were threecore thousand Footmen of the PELOPONNESIANS, and of the BOEOTIANS together: for so many was their number in the first voyage they made against the ATHENIANS. And as for those that were very desirous to fight, and to put themselves to any hazard, being mad to see their Country thus waisted and destroyed before their eyes, Pericles did comfort and pacifie them with these words: That Trees being cut and hewne downe, did spring againe in short time: but men being once dead, by no possibility could be brought againe. Therefore he never durst assemble the people in Councell, fearing lest he should be enforced by the multitude, to doe something still against his will. But as a wise Pilot, when he seeth a storme coming on the sea, doth doth straight give order to make all things safe in the Shippe, preparing every thing ready to defend the storme, according to his art and skill, not hearkening to the passengers fearfull cries and pitifull teares, who think themselves cast away: even so did Pericles rule all things according to his wisdom, having walled the City substantially about, and set good watch in every corner; and passed not for those that were angry and offended with him, neither would he be perswaded by his friends earnest requests and intreaties, neither cared for his enemies threats nor accusations against him, nor yet reckoned of all their foolish scoffing Songs then sung of him in the City to the shame and reproach of his government, saying that he was a cowardly Capitaine, and that for daftardinesse he let the enemies take all, and spoile what they would. Of which number Cleon was one that most defamed him, and began to enter into some pretty credit and favour with the common people, for that they were angry, and misliked with Pericles: as appeareth by these slanderous verses of Hermippus, which were then abroad:

*O King of Satyres thou, who with such manly speech, Of bloody warres and doughty deeds, dost daily to us preach:
Why art thou now afraid to take thy Lance in hand,
Or with thy Pike against thy foes, courageously to stand?
Since Cleon stout and fierce, doth daily thee provoke, With biting words, with trenchant blades, and deadly daunting strokes.*

All this notwithstanding, Pericles was never moved any thing, but with silence did patiently beare all injuries and scoffings of his enemies, and did send for all that, a navy of a hundred saile unto PELOPONNESUS, whether he would not goe in person, but kept himselfe at home, to keepe the people in quiet, untill such time as the enemies had raised their Campe, and were gone away. And to entertaine the common people that were offended and angry at this warre, he comforted the poor people againe, with causing a certaine distribution to be made amongst them of the common Treasure, and division also of the Lands that were got by Conquest. For after he had driven all the EGI- NETES out of their Country, he caused the whole Isle of EGINA to be divided by Lot amongst the Citizens of ATHENS. And then it was a great comfort to them in this adversity; to heare of their enemies hurt and losse in such manner as it did fall out. For their Army that was sent by sea unto PELOPONNESUS, had waisted and destroyed a great part of the champion countrey there, and had sacked besides many small Cities and Townes. Pericles selfe also entering into the MEGARIAN Countrey by land, did waste the whole Countrey all afore him. So the PELOPONNESIANS receiving by sea as much hurt and losse at the ATHENIANS hands, as they before had done by land unto the ATHENIANS; they had not holden out warres so long with the ATHENIANS, but would soone have given over (as Pericles had told them before) had not the gods above secretly hindred mans reason and policie. For first of all there came such a fore plague among the ATHENIANS, that it tooke away the flower of ATHENS youth, and weakened the force of the whole City besides. Furthermore, the bodies of them that were left alive being infected with this disease, their hearts also were so sharply bent against Pericles, that the sicknesse having troubled their braines, they fell to flat rebellion against him, as the Patient against his Physitian, or Children against their Father, even to the hurting of him, at the provocation of his enemies; who bruted abroad, that the plague came of no cause else, but of the great multitude of the countrey men that came into the City on heapes, one upon anothers necke in the heate of the Summer, where they were compelled to lie many together, smothered up in little Tents and Cabines, remaining there all day long, cowering downwards, and doing nothing, where before they lived in the Countrey in a fresh open ayre, and at liberty. And of all this (say they) Pericles is the onely cause, who precluding this warre, hath pent and shrouded the countrey men together within the walls of a City, employing them to no manner of use nor service, but keeping them like Sheep in a pinfold, maketh one to poison another with the infection of their plague sores running upon them, and giving them no leave to change aire, that they might so much as take breath abroad. Pericles to remedy this, and to doe their enemies a little mischief, armed a hundred and fifty Shippes, and shipped into them a great number of armed Footmen and Horsemen also. Hereby he put the Citizens in good hope, and the enemies in great feare, seeing so great a power. But when he had shipped all his men, and was himselfe also in the Admirall ready to hoise saile: suddenly there was a great eclipse of the Sunne, and the day was very darke, that all the Army was stricken with a marvellous feare, as of some dangerous and very ill token towards them. Pericles seeing the Master of his Galley in a maze withall, not knowing what to doe, cast his Cloake over the Masters face, and hid his eyes, asking him whether he thought that any harme or no. The Master answered him, he thought it none. Then said Pericles againe to him: There is no difference betweene this and that, saving that the body which maketh the darkenesse is greater, then my Cloake which hideth thy eyes. These things are thus disputed of in the Schooles of the Philosophers. But Pericles hoisting saile notwithstanding, did no notable nor special service, answerable to so great an Army and preparation. For he laying siege unto the Holy City of EPIDAUROM, when every man looked they should have taken it, was compelled to raise his siege; for the plague, that was so vehement, that it did not onely kill the ATHENIANS themselves, but all other also (were they never so few) that came to them or neere the Campe. Wherefore perceiving the ATHENIANS were marvellously offended with him, he did what he could to comfort them and put them in heart againe: Pericles depriv'd all was in vaine, he could not pacifie them: for by the most part of voices, they desired him of his charge of Generall, and condemned him in a marvellous great fine and summe of Money, the which charge those those that tell the least, doe write, that it was the summe of fiftene Talents: and those that say more, speake of fifty Talents. The accuser subscribed in this condemnation, was Gleom, as Idomenus, or Simmius say, or as Theophrastus writeth: yet Heraclides Ponticus saith, one Lacratides. Now his common griefes were soone blowne over; for the people did easily let fall their displeasures towards him, as the Waspe leaveth her sting behinde her with them she had stung. But his owne private affaires and household causes were in very ill case; both for that the plague had taken away many of his friends and kinsmen from him, as also for that he and his house had continued a long time in disgrace. For Xanippus (Pericles Sonne and Heire) being a man of a very ill disposition and nature, and having married a younge woman very prodigall and lavish of expence, the Daughter of Alander, Sonne of Epylichus, he grudged much at his Fathers hardnesse, who scantily gave him Money and but a little at a time. Whereupon he sent on a time to one of his Fathers friends in Pericles Name, to pray him to lend him some Money, who sent it unto him: But afterwards when he came to demand it againe, Pericles did not onely refuse to pay it him, but further also he put him in suite. But this made the younge man Xanippus to angry with his Father, that he spake very ill of him in every place where he came: and reported in way of mockery, how his Father spent his time when he was at home, and what talke he had with the Sophisters, and the Master Rhetoricians: For a mischance fortuning on a time, at the game of the throwing of the Dart, who should throw best, that he that threw, did unfortunately kill one Epiimemus a THESSALIAN: Xanippus went prating up and downe the Towne, that his Father Pericles was a whole day disputing with Protagoras the Rhetorician, to know which of the three by Law and reason should be condemned for this murder: The Dart, he that threw the Dart, or the deviser of the game. Moreover Stesimbrotus writeth, that the bruit that ranne thorough the City, that Pericles did keepe his Wife, was fowne abroad by Xanippus himselfe. But so it is, this quarrell and hate betwixt the Father and the Sonne continued without reconciliation unto the death. For Xanippus died in the great plague, and Pericles owne Sister also; moreover he lost at that time by the plague, the more part of his friends and kinsfolkes, and those specially that did him greatest pleasure in governing of the State. But all this did never pull down his countenance, nor any thing abate the greatnesse of his minde, what misfortune soever he had sustained. Neither saw they him weep at any time, nor mourne at the funerals of any of his kinsmen or friends, but at the death of Paralus, his youngest and lawfull begotten Sonne: for the losse of him alone did onely melt his heart. Yet he did strive to shew his naturall constancy, and to keepe his accustomed modesty. But as he would have put a Garland of Flowers upon his head, sorrow did so pierce his heart when he saw his face, that then he burst out in teares and cried amaine; which they never saw him doe before all the dayes of his life. Furthermore the people having proved other Captaines and Governours, and finding by experience that there was no one of them of judgement and authority sufficient for so great a charge: in the end, of themselves they called him againe to the Pulpit for Orations to heare their Counsels, and to the state of a Captaine also to take charge of the state. But at that time he kept himselfe close in his house, as one bewailing his late grievous losse and sorrow. Howbeit Alcibiades, and other his familiar friends, perswaded him to shew himselfe unto the people; who did excuse themselves unto him, for their ingratitude towards him. Pericles then taking the Governement againe upon him, the first matter he entred into was: that he prayed them to revoke the Statute he had made for base borne Children, fearing lest his lawfull Heires would faile, and so his house and Name should fall to the ground. But as for the Law, thus it stood: Pericles when he was in his best authority, caused a Law to be made, that they onely should be counted Citizens of ATHENS, which were natural ATHENIANS born by Father and Mother. Not long time after, it fortuned that the King of EGYPT having sent a gift unto the people of ATHENS, of fourty thousand bushels of Corne, to be distributed among the Citizens there: many by occasion of this Law were accused to be base borne, and especially men of the baser sort of people, which were not knowne before; or at the least had no reckoning made of them, and so some of them were falsely and wrongfully condemned. Whereupon so it fell out, that there were no lesse then five thousand of them convicted and sold for slaves: and those that remained as free-men, and were judged to be naturall Citizens, amounted to the number of fourteene thousand and forty persons. Now this was much disliked of the people, that a Law enacted, and that had bene of such force, should by the selfe same maker and deviser of the same be againe revoked and called in. Howbeit Pericles late calamity that fortuned to his house, did breake the peoples hardened hearts against him: who thinking these sorrowes smart, to be punishment enough unto him for his former pride, and judging that by Gods divine justice and permission this plague and losse fell upon him, and that his request also was tollerable: they suffered him to enrolle his base borne Sonne in the Register of the lawfull Citizens of his family, giving him his owne Name Pericles. It is the selfe same Pericles, who after he had overcome the PELOPONNESIANS in a great battell by sea, neere unto the Isles of ARGINUSES, was put to death by sentence of the people, with other Captains his companions. Now was Pericles at that time infected with the plague, but not so vehemently as other were, but more temperately: which by long space of time, with many alterations and changes, did by little and little decay and consume the strength of his body, and overcame his senses and noble minde. Therefore Theophrastus in his Morals declareth in a place where he disputeth, whether mens manners doe change with their misfortunes, and whether corporall troubles and afflictions doe so alter men, that they forget vertue, and abandon reason: that Pericles in his sicknesse shewed a friend of his that came to see him, I cannot tell what a preserving Charme, that the women had tied (as a Carcanet) about his necke, to let him understand he was very ill, since he suffered them to apply such such a foolish bable to him. In the end Pericles drawing fast unto his death, the Nobility of the City, and such his friends as were left alive, standing about his bed, began to speake of his vertue, and of the great authority he had borne, considering the greatnesse of his Noble acts, and counting the number of his victories he had wonne (for he had wonne Nine foughten battels being Generall of the ATHENIANS, and had set up so many tokens and triumphs in honour of his Countrey) they reckoned up among themselves all these matters, as if he had not underflood them, imagining his senses had beene gone. But he contrarily being yet of perfect memory, heard all what they had said, and thus he began to speake unto them: That he marvelled why they had so highly praised that in him, which was common to many other Captaines, and wherein fortune dealt with them in equality alike, and all this while they had forgotten to speake of the best and most notable thing that was in him, which was, that no ATHENIAN had ever worne blacke gowne through his occasion; and sure so was he a noble and worthy person. For he did not onely shew himselfe mercifull and courteous, even in weighty matters of government among so envious people and hatefull enemies; but he had this judgement also to thinke, that the most noble acts he did were these; that he never gave himselfe to hatred, envy nor choler, to be revenged of his most mortall enemy, without mercy shewed towards him, though he had committed unto him such absolute power and sole government among them. And this made his surname be Olympius (that is, divine or celestiall) which otherwise for him had bene too proud and arrogant a Name, because he was of so good and gentle a nature, and for that in so great liberty he had kept cleane hands and undefiled: even as we esteeme the gods authors of all good, and causers of no evil, and so worthy to governe and rule the whole Monarchy of the world. And not as Poets say, which doe confound our wits by their follies and fond feignings, and are also contrary to themselves, considering that they call Heaven (which containeth the gods) the everlasting seate, which trembleth not, and is not driven nor moved with windes, neither is darkned with clouds, but is always bright and cleare, and at all times shining equally with a pure bright light, as being the onely habitation and mansion place of the eternall God, onely happy and immortal: and afterwards they describe it themselves, full of dissensions and enmities, of anger and passions, which doe nothing become wise and Learned men. But this discourse peradventure would be better spoken of in some other Booke. Now the troubles the ATHENIANS felt immediately after Pericles death, made them then lament the losse of so Noble a member. For those who unpatiently did brooke his great authority while he lived, because it drowned their owne; when they came after his death to prove other speakers and Governours, they were compelled then to confesse, that no mans nature living could be more moderate nor grave, with lenity and mercy, then was his. And that most hated power, which in his life time they called Monarchy, did then most plainly appeare unto them, to have bene the manifest rampier and bulwarke of the safety of their whole State and Commonweale: such corruption and vice in government of the State did then spring up immediately after his death, which when he was alive, he did ever suppress and keep under, in such sort, that either it did not appeare at all, or at least it came not to that head and liberty, that such faults were committed, as were unpossible to be remedied.

The End of the Life of Pericles.

THE LIFE OF FABIUS MAXIMUS.

Ann. Mund.
3628.]

Ant. Christ.

Having already declared unto you such things worthy memory as we could collect and gather of the Life of Pericles: it is now good time we should proceed to write also of the Life of Fabius Maximus. It is said the first Fabius, from whom the House and Family of the Fabians did descend; (being the greatest and Noblest house of all other in Rome) was begotten by Hercules, whom he got of a Nymph, or (as other say) a Woman of the Country by the River of Tyber. And some say, that the first of this House, were called at the beginning Fodians, because they did hunt wilde beasts, with pitfalls and ditches. For unto this present the ROMANES call ditches Fosse; and to digge Fodere. Since that time, the two second Letters have beene changed and they have called them Fabians. But howsoever it was, this is certaine, that many Noble men have come out of that House: and among other, there was one of that House called Fabius Rullus, whom the ROMANES for his noble acts did surname Maximus, very great. After him Fabius Maximus, whose Life we have now in hand, was the fourth lineally descended of the same line, and he was surnamed Verrucosus, because of a certaine birth-marke he had upon one of his lips, like a little wart. And he was also surnamed Ovicula, a little Lambe, for his softnesse, slownesse, and gravity of his doings whilst he was a childe. But, because of nature he was dull, still, and very silent, and that he was seldome seene to play at any pastime among the boyes, and for that they saw he was but of slow capacity, and hard to learne and conceive, and withall that the boyes might doe to him what they would, he was so lowly to his fellows: this made men judge that looked not into him, that he would prove a very foole and idiot. Yet other were in contrary opinion of him: who considering more deeply the man, perceived in his nature a certaine secret constancy and the majesty of a Lyon. But Fabius selfe when he was called to serve the Commonweale, did quickly shew to the world, that which they tooke for dullnesse in him, was his gravity, which never altered for no cause or respect: and that which other judged fearefullnesse in him, was very wisdom. And where he shewed himselfe not hasty nor sodaine in any thing, it was found in him an assured and settled constancy. Wherefore when he came to consider the great sovereignty of the Commonweale, and the continuall warres it was in, he did use his body to all hardnesse, and brought up himselfe therewithall, that he might be the better able to serve in the field: and he gave himselfe much to eloquence also, as a necessary instrument to perswade Souldiers unto reason. His tongue likewise did agree with his conditions and manner of life. For he had no manner of affectation, nor counterfet finenesse in his speech, but his words (as were ever very grave and profound, and his sentences even grafted in him by nature, and (as some say) were much like Thucydides sayings: As appeareth in a funerall Oration he made before the

the people in the praise of his Sonne, who died when he came out of his Consulship, which is yet extant to be seene. Now as for him, having been five times chosen Consul, in his first yeare of his Consulship, he triumphed over the LIGURIANS (which be people of the mountaines, and upon the coast of GENOVA) who being overthrown by him in a great battell, where they had lost many men, they were compelled to goe their way, and to take the ALPS for their succour, and durst no more appeare upon the borders of ITALY, whereupon they did confine. Hannibal entring ITALY afterwards with a great Army, and having won the first battell neare unto the River of TREBIA: he passed further and went through THUSCAN, waisting and destroying all the Countrey as he passed by. This made ROME quake for feare. Besides they saw many signes and tokens, some common unto them, as thundring, lightning and such other like: but other also more strange, never seene nor heard of before. For it was reported that certaine Targets were waxen all bloody of themselves, and that about the City of ANTIUM they found Wheate eares, which were all bloody when they were reaped: that there fell from Heaven burning stones, all in a flame of fire: and in the Countrey of the PHALERIANS how the element seemed to open, and many little written scroles fell downe upon the ground, in one of the which were written these words, word for word: Mars doth now handle his Weapons. But all these signes and wonders did nothing appall nor daunt the boldnesse of Caius Flaminius Consul then: who besides the naturall great courage, and aspiring minde he had to honour, yet was it beyond all reason increased in him, by the wonderfull good successe he had before. For, notwithstanding the Senate called him home againe, and that his fellow Consul stood against his intent; he for all that did give battell to the GAULES, in despite of them all, and won the victory. Likewise, though all these signes and wonders in the ayre, did greatly trouble and amaze multitudes of people: yet did they nothing trouble Fabius, for he saw no apparent cause to be troubled withall. But he understanding the small number of his enemies, and lacke of Money that was among them: gave counsell, and was of opinion that they should patiently forbear a little, and not to hazard battell against a man, whose Army had been long trained in warres, and by many foughten fields was grown valiant and expert. Moreover, he thought good they should send aide to their subjects, and other in their allies and confederates, as need required, to keepe their Cities still under their obedience: and in the meane season by tract of time, to weare out Hannibals force and power, which was like straw set on fire, that straight giveth forth a blaze, and yet hath no substance to hold fire long. When Fabius had thus said enough to perswade Flaminius, yet it would not sinke into Flaminius head: for said he, I will not tarry until the warres come to ROME gates, neither will I be brought to fight upon the walles of the City to defend it, as Camillus did, that fought within the City himselfe in old time. Whereupon he commanded his Captaine to set out their bands to the field, and he himselfe tooke his Horsebacke; which upon the suddaine, without any cause, was so afraid, and tooke on so with himselfe, that he cast the Consul to the ground with his head forward. For all this fall he would not change his minde, but held on his journey towards Hannibal, and presented him battell in THUSCAN, by the Lake called Thrasimena, which is the Lake of PERUSIA. This battell was so fiercely fought on both sides, that notwithstanding there was such a terrible earthquake therewith, that some Cities were overthrowne and turned topsie turvie, some Rivers had their streames turned against their course, and the foote of the mountaines were torne in sunder and broken open; yet not one of them that were fighting, heard any such thing at all. Flaminius the Consul himselfe was slaine at that battell, after he had in his owne person done many valiant acts, and many of the worthiest Gentlemen and valiant Souldiers of his Army lay dead about him: the residue being fled, the slaughter was great, for the bodies slaine were Fifteene thousand, and so many Prisoners left alive. After this overthrow, Hannibal made all the search he could possibly to finde the body of Flaminius, to bury him honourably, because of his valiantnesse; but he could never be found amongst the dead bodies, neither was it ever heard what became of it. Now as touching the first overthrow at TREBIA, neither the Generall that wrote it, nor the Post that brought the first newes to Rome, told the troth of it as it was, but fained that the end was doubtfull, and that they could not tell who had the best. But of this battell, so soone as the Prator Pomponius had received the newes, he called all the people to counsell, where without disguising or dissembling at all, he plainly said thus unto them: My Lords, we have lost the battell, our Army is overthrowne and the Consul himselfe is slaine in the field: wherefore, consider what you have to doe, and provide for your safety. These words spoken to the people, as it had beene a boysterous storme of weather that had fallen on them from the sea to put them in danger, did so terrifie the multitude, and trouble the whole City for feare, that they were all in a maze, and knew not what to determine. Yet in the end they all agreed, that it stood them upon to have a chiefe Magistrate, called in Latine Dictator, that should be a man of courage, and could stoutly use it without sparing or fearing any person. And for this, Fabius Maximus was thought the onely man meete to be chosen, as he, whose noble courage and grave behaviour was answerable to the dignity and sovereignty of the Office: and moreover, that to his gravity and wisdom there was joyned (by reasonable age) strength of body, and valiantnesse with experience. This counsell being confirmed by them all, Fabius was chosen Dictator, who named Lucius Minutius Generall of the Horsemen. Then he first required the Senate, that they would grant him he might have his Horse in the warres: the which was not lawfull for the Dictator, but expressly forbidden by an ancient order. Either because they thought the chiefe force of their Army did consist in their Footemen, which caused the making of this Law; whereby the Generall should be amongst them in the day of the battell, and in no wise should forsake them: Or else else because the authority of this Magistrate in all other things was so great, that it was in manner after the state of a King: Yet all this notwithstanding, they were willing thereunto, and that the Dictator should have absolute power over the people. Fabius at his first coming, because he would shew the majesty and dignity of his Office, that every man should be the more obedient and ready at his commandment: when he went abroad, he had foure and twenty Sergeants before him, carrying the bundles of Rods and Axes. And when one of the Consuls came to him, he sent a Sergeant to command his bundle of Rods that were carried before him, to be put downe, and all other tokens of dignity to be laid aside: and that he should come and speake with him, as a private man. And first to make a good foundation, and to begin with the service of the gods, he declared unto the people, that the losse they had received, came through the rashnesse and willfull negligence of their Captaine, who made no reckoning of the gods nor Religion: and not through any default and cowardinesse of the Souldiers. And for this cause he did perswade them not to be afraid of their enemies, but to appease the wrath of the gods, and to serve and honour them. Not that he made them hereby superstitious, but did confirme their valiancy with true Religion and godlinesse: and besides did utterly take away and asswage their feare of their enemies, by giving them certaine hope and assurance of the aide of the gods. Then were the holy Bookes of the Sibylles Prophetes perused, which were kept very secret, and therein they found certaine ancient Prophetes and Oracles, which spake of the present misfortunes of the time: But what was contained therein, it is not lawfull to be uttered to any person. Afterwards the Dictator, before the open assembly of the people made a solemne vow unto the gods, that he would sacrifice all the profits and fruits that should fall the next yeare, of Sheep, of Sows, of milch-Kine, of Goats in the Mountaines, champion Country, Rivers or Meadows of ITALY. And he would celebrate playes of Musicke, and shew other fights in the honour of the gods, and would bestow upon the same the summe of three hundred three and thirty Sestericians, and three hundred three and thirty ROMANE Pence, and a third part over. All which summe reduced into GRECIAN Money, amounteth to fourescore and three thousand, five hundred and fourescore and three silver Drachmaes, and two Oboles. Now it was a hard thing to tell the reason why he doth mention this summe so precisely, and why he did divide it by three, unlesse it were to extoll the power of the number of Three: because it is a perfect number by the nature, and it is the first of the odd numbers, which is the beginning of divers numbers, and containeth in it selfe the first differences, and the first elements and principles of all the numbers united and joyned together. So Fabius having brought the people to hope and trust to have the ayde and favour of the gods, made them in the end the better disposed to live well afterwards. Then Fabius hoping after victory, and that the gods would send good lucke and prosperity unto men through their valianthesse and wisdom: did straight set forwards unto Hannibal, not as minded to fight with him, but fully resolved to weare out his strength and power, by delays and tract of time: and to increase his poverty by the long spending of his owne money, and to consume the small number of his people, with the great number of his Souldiers. Fabius camped alwayes in the strong and high places of the mountaines, out of all danger of his enemies Horsemen, and coasted still after the enemy: so that when Hannibal stayed in any place, Fabius also stayed: if Hannibal removed, he followed him straight, and would be alwayes neere him, but never forsooke the hills, neither would he come so neere him, as that he should be enforced to fight against his will. Yet alwayes he followed the enemy at his taile, and made him ever afraid of him, thinking still that he sought to get the vantage, to give the charge upon him. Thus by delaying, and prolonging the time in this sort, he became disliked of every body: for every man both in his owne Campe and abroad, spake very ill of him openly: and as for his enemies, they tooke him for no better then a ranke coward, Hannibal onely excepted. But he perceiving his great reach and policie, and foreseeing his manner of fight, saw there was no remedy, but by plaine force or slight to bring him to the fight: for otherwise his delay would overthrow the CARTHAGINIANS, when they should not come to handy strokes with him, wherein onely consisted all their hope and strength, and in the meane time his Souldiers should fall away and die, and his Money wax scant, and himselfe should grow the weaker. Thereupon Hannibal began to bethinke him, and devise all the stratagemes and policies of warre he could imagine: and like a cunning wrestler, to seeke out all the trickes he could to give his adversary the fall. For suddenly he would goe and give alarm to his Campe; by and by againe he would retire: Another time he would remove his Campe from one place to another, and give him some advantage, to see if he could plucke his lingring device out of his head, and yet to hazard nothing. But as for Fabius, he continued still resolute in the first determination: that delay of fight was the best way, so to overthrow him. Howbeit Minutius, Generall of his Horsemen, did trouble him much: for he being earnestly bent to fight without discretion, and braving of a lusty courage, crept into opinion with the Souldiers, by his hot fury and desire to fight: Which wrought much in them, and so stirred up their courages, that they mocked Fabius altogether, and called him Hannibals School-master: and contrariwise they commended Minutius, for a valiant Captaine and worthy ROMANE. This made Minutius looke high, and have a proud opinion of himselfe, mocking Fabius because he ever lodged on the hills, with saying the Dictator would make them goodly sports, to see their enemies waste and burne ITALY before their faces. Moreover he asked Fabius friends, Whether he would in the end lodge his Campe in the skie, that he did climbe so high upon mountaines, mistrusting the earth: or else that he was so afraid his enemies would finde him out, that he went to hide himselfe in the clotdes. Fabius friends made report of these jests, and advised him rather to hazard battell, then to beare such reproachfull words as were spoken of him. But Fabius answered them: If I should yeeld to that you counsell me, I should shew my selfe a greater coward then I am taken for now: by leaving my determination, for feare of their mocks and spightfull words. For it is no shame for a man to stand fearefull and jealous of the welfare and safety of his Countrey: but otherwise to be afraid of the wagging of every straw, or to regard every common prating, it is not the part of a worthy man of courage, but rather of a base minded person, to seeke to please those whom he ought to command and governe, because they are but fooles. After this Hannibal chanced to fall into a great error: for intending to leave Fabius to bring his Army into the plaines, where there was plenty of Victuals, and store of Pasture to feede his Horse and Cattell: he commanded his guides to bring him straight after supper, into the plaine of CASINUM. They mistaking his words, and not understanding well what he said, because his ITALIAN Tongue was but meane, tooke one thing for another, and so brought him and his Army to the end of the field neere the City of CASTILINUM, through the midst of which runneth a River, the ROMANES call Vulturum fl. Now the Countrey lying by it, was a Valley compassed in with Mountaines round about, saving that the River went to the Sea: where leaving its owne banks, it spreadeth abroad into the marishes and banks of sand very deepe, and in the end fell into that part of the Sea which is most dangerous, and where was neither succour nor covert. Hannibal being now fallen as it were into the bottome of a sacke; Fabius that knew the Countrey, and was very perfect in all the wayes thereabouts, followed him steppe by steppe, and stopped his passage, where they should have come out of the Valley, with foure thousand Footemen, which he planted there to keepe the straight, and disposed the rest of his Army upon the hangings of the hills, in the most apt and fit places all about. Then with his Light horsemen he gave a charge upon the rereward of his enemies battell: which put all Hannibals Army by and by out of order, and so there were slaine eight hundred of his men. Whereupon Hannibal would have removed his Campe thence immediately: and knowing then the fault his guides had made, taking one place for another, and the danger wherein they had brought him, he roundly trussed them up, and hung them by the neckes. Now to force his enemies to come downe from the tops of the hills, and to winne them from their strength, he saw it was impossible, and out of all hope. Wherefore perceiving his Souldiers both afraid and discouraged, for that they saw themselves hemmed in on all sides, without any order to escape; Hannibal determined to deceive Fabius by a device. He caused straight two thousand Oxen to be chosen out of the heard, which they had taken before in their spoiles, and tied to their hornes light bundles of reedes, and fallow faggots, or bunches of the dead cuttings of Vines: and commanded the Drovers that had the charge of them, that when they saw any signall or token lift up in the aire in the night, they should then straight set fire on those bundles and bunches, and drive up the beasts to the hills, towards the wayes where the enemies lay. Whilst these things were preparing, he on the other side ranged his Army in order of battell, and when night came, caused them to march faire and softly. Now these beasts, whilst the fire was but little that burnt upon their hornes, went but faire and softly up the hill, from the foote of the mountaines from whence they were driven: in such manner as the Heardmen that were on the top of the mountaines, wondered marvelously to see such flames of fire about the hornes of so many beasts, as if it had been an Army marching in order of battell with lights and torches. But when their hornes came to be burnt to the stumps, and that the force of the fire did fry their very flesh, then began the Oxen to fight together, and to shake their heads, whereby they did set one another on fire. Then left they their soft pace, and went no more in order as they did before, but for the extreme paine they felt, began to runne here and there in the mountaines, carrying fire still about their hornes, and in their tailes, and set fire of all the boughes and Coppies they passed by. This was a strange sight to looke upon, and did much amaze the ROMANES, that kept the passages of the mountaines, for they thought they had bene men that ranne here and there with Torches in their hands. Whereupon they were in a marvellous feare and trouble, supposing they had bene their enemies that ranne thus towards them, to environ them on all sides, so as they durst no more keepe the passages which they were commanded, but forsaking their straights, began to flie towards their maine and great Campe. Thereupon Hannibals Light horsemen immediately possessed the straights that were kept: by reason whereof, all the rest of his Army marched out at their ease and leisure, without feare or danger, notwithstanding they were laden and troubled with marvellous great spoiles, and of all kinde of forts. Fabius then perceived very well the same night, that it was but a sleight of Hannibal: for some of the Oxen that fled here and there fell upon his Army: Whereupon fearing to fall upon some ambush by reason of the darke night, he kept his Men in battell ray, without stirring, or making any noyse. The next morning by breake of day, he began to follow his enemies by the tracke, and fell upon the taile of the rereward, with whom he skirmished within the straights of the mountaines, and so did distresse somewhat Hannibals Army. Hannibal thereupon sent out of his vanguard a certaine number of SPANIARDS (very lusty and nimble fellows that were used to the mountaines, and acquainted with climbing up upon them) who coming downe, and setting upon the ROMANES that were heavy armed, slew a great number of them, and made Fabius to retire. Thereupon they despised Fabius the more, and thought worse of him then they did before, because his pretence and determination was, not to be brought brought to fight with Hannibal, but by wisdom and policie to overthrow him, whereas he himselfe by Hannibal was first finely handled and deceived. Hannibal then to bring Fabius further in disliking and suspicion with the ROMANS, commanded his Souldiers when they came neare any of Fabius Lands, that they should burne and destroy all round about them, but gave them in charge in no wise to meddle with Fabius Lands, nor any thing of his, and did purposely appoint a Garrison to see that nothing of Fabius should miscarry, nor yet take hurt. This was straight carried to ROME, which did thereby the more incense the people against him. And to helpe it forward, the Tribunes never ceased crying out upon him in their Orations to the people, and all by Metellus speciall procurement and perswasion: who of himselfe had no cause to dislike with Fabius, but onely because he was Minnitius Kinsman (General of the Horsemen) and thought that the ill opinion they beare to Fabius, would turne to the praise and advancement of Minnitius. The Senate also were much offended with Fabius, for the composition he made with Hannibal, touching the Prisoners taking of either side. For it was Articled between them, that they should change Prisoners, delivering Man for Man, or else two hundred and fifty silver Drachmas for a Man, if the one chanced to have more Prisoners then the other. When exchange was made between them, it appeared that Hannibal had left in his hands of ROMAN Prisoners, two hundred and forty more then Fabius had to exchange of his. The Senate commanded there should be no Money sent to redeeme them, and greatly found fault with Fabius for making this accord: because it was neither honourable nor profitable for the Commonweale, to redeeme men that cowardly suffered themselves to be taken Prisoners of their enemies. Fabius understanding it, did patiently beare this displeasure conceived against him by the Senate. Howbeit having no Money, and meaning to keepe his word, and not to leave the poore Citizens Prisoners behind him: he sent his Sonne to ROME, with Commission to sell his Lands, and bring him Money immediately. The young man went his way to ROME, and sold his Fathers Farmes, and brought him Money forthwith to the Campe: Fabius therewith redeemed the Prisoners, and sent their ranfome unto Hannibal. Many of the Prisoners whom he had redeemed, offered to repay him their ranfome; but he would never take any thing againe, and gave them all their ranfome freely. Afterwards being called to ROME by the Priests to doe certaine solemne Sacrifices, he left the Army in charge with Minnitius to governe the same in his absence: with condition not to set upon the enemy, nor to fight with him at all: the which not onely by his authority he did exprelly forbid him, but also as his very friend, he did warne and intreat him in no wise to attempt. Howbeit Minnitius little regarding his commandments or requests, so soone as Fabius backe was turned, began to be somewhat luffy, and doing with his enemies. So one day amongst the rest, Minnitius perceiving Hannibal had sent a great part of his Army abroad to forrage and get victuals, came and set upon them that remained behinde, and drave them into their Campe, with great slaughter, and did put them in a marvellous feare that were saved, as men that looked for no lesse, but to have been besieged in their Campe. Afterwards also, when their whole Army came together againe, he retired backe in sight of them all, and lost not a man. This exploit set Minnitius in a pride, and brought the Souldiers to be more rash then they were before. The newes of this overthrow went with speed to ROME, and there they made it a great deale more then it was. Fabius hearing of it, said; he was more afraid of Minnitius prosperity, then of his owne adversity. But the common people rejoiced marvellously, and made great shew of joy and downe the market-place. Whereupon Metellus one of the Tribunes going up into the Pulpit, made an Oration unto the people, in the which he highly magnified Minnitius, and commended his courage: and contrarily charged Fabius no more of cowardlinesse, but with flat treason. Furthermore, he did accuse the Nobility and greatest men of ROME, saying: that from the first beginning they had laid a Plot, to draw these warres out at length, onely to destroy the peoples power and authority, having brought the whole Commonweale to the state of a Monarchy, and into the hands of a private person; who by his remissenesse and delays, would give Hannibal leisure to plant himselfe in ITALY, and by time give open passage to the CARTHAGINIANS, at their pleasure to send Hannibal a second aide and Army, to make a full conquest of all ITALY. Fabius hearing these words, rose up straight and spake to the people, and taried not about the answering of the accusations the Tribune had burthened him withall; but prayed them they would dispatch these Sacrifices and Ceremonies of the gods, that he might speedily returne againe to the Campe, to punish Minnitius, for breaking his commandment, in fighting with the enemy. He had no sooner spoken these words, but there arose a marvellous tumult and hurlyburly presently among the people, for the danger Minnitius stood in then, because the Dictator had absolute power and authority to imprison and put to death whom he thought good, without ordinary course of Law or arraignment. Moreover, they did judge, since Fabius had of late left his accustomed mildnesse and affability, that he would grow to such severity in his anger, that it would be a hard thing to appeale him. Wherefore every man held his peace for feare, saving onely Metellus the Tribune: he having authority by vertue of his Office, to say what he thought good, and who onely of all other kept still his place and authority, when any Dictator was chosen. Then all the Officers that were put downe, instantly besought the people not to forsake Minnitius, nor to suffer the like to be done to him, as Manlius Torquatus did of late to his Sonne, who strook off his head, after he had valiantly fought with his enemies and overcome them; for breaking his commandment. And began to perswade them further, to take this tyrannicall power of the Dictatorship from Fabius; and to put their affaires into the hands of him, that would and could tell how to bring them safely to passe. The people were tickled marvellously with these seditious words, but yet they durst not force

Fabius to resigne his Dictatorship, though they bare him great grudge, and were angry with him in their hearts. Howbeit they ordained, that Minnitius thenceforth should have equal power and authority with the Dictator in the warres; a thing that was never seen nor heard of before, and yet the very same done in that sort againe, after the battell of CANNES. For Marcus Junius being at that time Dictator in the Campe, they did chuse another Dictator in ROME, which was Fabius Buteo, to Name and create new Senators in the place of those that were slaine in the battell. But after he had named them, and restored the full number againe of the Councill of the Senate, he discharged the selfe same day the Sergeants that carried the Axes before him, and sent away the traine that waited upon him, and did so put himselfe in prease of the people in the market-place, and followed his owne peculiar businesse as a private person. Now the ROMANS imagined, that when Fabius should see how they had made Minnitius equall in authority with him, it would grieve him to the heart for very anger: but they came short to judge of his nature, for he did not think that their folly should hurt or dishonour him at all. But as wife Diogenes answered one that said unto him, Looke, they mocke thee: Tush (said he) they mocke not me: meaning thereby, that he tooke them to be mocked, that were offended with their mockes. Thus Fabius tooke every think quietly, that the people offered him, and did comfort himselfe with the Philosophers rules and examples; who did maintaine, that an honest and wise man, can no way be injured nor dishonoured. For all the displeasure he received by the peoples folly, was in respect of the Commonweale; because they had put a Sword into a mad mans hand, in giving Minnitius authority to follow his rash humour and fond ambition in the warres. Wherefore, fearing lest he being blinded with vaine glory and presumptuous opinion of himselfe, should rashly (and upon a head) hasten to doe some great hurt before he came to the Campe, he departed suddenly out of ROME without any mans knowledge, to returne againe to the Campe, where he found Minnitius so proud and stout, that he was not to be dealt with. For he would needs have the authority to command the whole Army when it came to his turne. But Fabius would not consent to that, but divided the Army betweene them; thinking it better he should alone command the one halfe, then the whole Army by turnes. So he chose for himselfe the first and third Legion; and gave unto him the second and fourth; and divided also betweene them the aide of their Friends. And when Minnitius made his boast, that the Majesty of the highest Magistrate was brought lower for his sake; Fabius told him, that he might thinke, if he were wife, he had not to fight with him, but with Hannibal: and if he would needs contend against his Companion, yet he should have a speciall regard and consideration, that having wonne now the Citizens good wils, by whom he was so much honoured, he should have no lesse care of their health and safety; then he had, who was now trodden under foot, and ill intreated by them. Minnitius tooke his lesson for a counterfeit mock, after old mens manners and fashion: and so taking the one halfe of the Army unto him, went and lodged alone by himselfe. Hannibal hearing of their jarre and squaring together, sought straight opportunity to make their discord finely to serve his turne. Now there was a hill between both their Campes not very hard to be won, and it was an excellent place to lodge a Campe safely in, and was very fit and commodious for all things. The Fields that were about it, did seem afar off to be very plaine and even ground, because they had no covert of wood to shadow them, yet were there many ditches and little vallies in them: wherefore Hannibal though he might easily have taken it at his pleasure if he had list, did let it alone in the midst betweene them, for a baite to draw out his enemies to battell. Now when Hannibal saw Fabius and Minnitius lodged asunder, he placed certaine bandes in the night among those ditches and vallies. Afterwards the next morning by breake of day, he sent a small number of men openly to winne this hill: hoping by this policy to traine Minnitius out to the Field, as it fell out indeed. For first Minnitius sent thither his light horsemen, and afterwards all his men at armes: and lastly perceiving that Hannibal himselfe came to releve his men that were upon the hill, he himselfe marched forward also with all the rest of his Army in order of battell, and gave a hot charge upon them that defended the hill, to drive them thence. The fight continued equall a good space betweene them both, untill such time as Hannibal saw his enemy come directly within his danger, and shewed the rereward of his battell naked unto his men, whom before he had laid in ambush: he straight raised the signall he had given them. They upon that discovered all together, and with great cries did set upon the rereward of the ROMANS, and slew a great number of them at the first charge: and did put the rest in such a feare and disorder, as it is impossible to expresse it. Then was Minnitius rash bravery and fond boasts much cooled, when he looked first upon one Captain, then upon another, and saw in none of them any courage to tarry by it, but rather that they were all ready to run away: which if they had done, they had bene cast away every man: for the NUMIDIANS finding they were the stronger, did disperse themselves all about the plaine, killing all straglers that fled. Minnitius Souldiers being brought to this danger and distresse, which Fabius foresaw they would fall into and having upon this occasion his Army ready ranged in order of battell, to see what would become of Minnitius, not by report of Messengers, but with his owne eyes: he got him to a little hill before his Campe, where when he saw Minnitius and all his men compassed about on every side, and even staggering and ready to fly, and heard besides their cries, not like men that had hearts to fight, but as men scared, and ready to fly for feare to save themselves: he clapped his hand on his thigh, and fetched a great sigh, saying to those that were about them: O gods, how Minnitius is gone to cast himself away, sooner then I looked for, and later then he desired? But in speaking these words, he made his ensignes march on in haste, crying out aloud: O my friends, we must dispatch with speed to succour Minnitius: for he is a valiant man of person, and one that loveth more then ever had need of a good and wife Capitaine. But he refused the Gentlemans offer and his intreaty, and compelled him to take his Horfe back againe, though the teares ran downe the cheekes for pity: and raising himselfe up to take him by the hand, he said unto him: I pray you tell Fabius Maximus from me, and witness with me, that Paulus Emilius even to his last houre hath followed his counsell, and did never swerve from the promise he made him: but that first he was forced to it by Varro, and afterwards by Hannibal. When he had delivered these words, he bad Lentulus farewell: and running againe into the fury of the slaughter, there he died amongst his laine companies. It is thought there were laine at this battell Fifty thousand ROMANES, and Four thousand taken Prisoners; and other Ten thousand that were taken Prisoners in two Campes after the battell. When this noble victory was gotten, Hannibal's friends gave him counsell to follow his good fortune, and to enter ROME after the scattered number that fled thither; so as within few dayes following he might sup in their Capitoll. A man cannot easily guesse what was the cause that stayed him, that he went not, unlesse it was (as I thinke) some good fortune, or favourable God toward the ROMANES that withstood him, and made him afraid and glad to retire. Whereupon they say, that one Barca CARTHAGINIAN, in his anger said to Hannibal; Sir, you have the way to overcome, but you cannot use victorie. Notwithstanding, this victory made a marvellous change for him; for hereupon, all ITALY in manner came in to submit themselves to him; where before he had no Towne at commandment, nor any storehouse or Port through all ITALY: yea he did marvellous hardly, and with much ado victuall his Army with that he could daily rob and spoyle, having no certaine place to retire unto, nor grounded hope to entertaine these warres, but kept the field with his Army, removing from place to place, as they had been a great number of murderers and thieves together. For the most part of the Countrey did yeeld immediately unto him: as the City of CAPUA, being the chiefe and greatest City of all ITALY but ROME, and did receive Hannibal, and were at his devotion. Thus we may plainly see, that as the Poet Euripides saith; It is a great mischief not onely to be driven to make triall of friends, but proofe also of Captaines wisdom. For that which before they accounted cowardlinesse and faint heart in Fabius, immediately after the battell, they thought it more then mans reason, and rather an heavenly wisdom and influence, that so long foresaw the things to come, which the parties selves that afterwards felt them, gave little credit unto before. Upon this occasion, ROME repored incontinently all their hope and trust in Fabius, and they repaired to him for counsell, as they would have ran unto some Temple or Altar for sanctuary. So as the first and chiefe cause of staying the people together from dispersing themselves abroad, as they did when ROME was taken by the GAULES, was the onely opinion and confidence they had in Fabius wisdom. For where before he seemed to be a coward and timorous, when there was no danger nor misfortune happened; then when every man wept and cried out for sorrow, which could not helpe, and that all the world was so troubled that there was no order taken for any thing; he contrarily went alone up and downe the City very modestly, with a bold constant countenance, speaking courteously to every one, and did appeale their womanish cries and lamentations, and did forbid the common assemblies and fond ceremonies, of lamenting the dead corse at their burials. Then he perswaded the Senate to assemble in counsell, and did comfort up those that were Magistrates, and he alone was the onely force and power of the City: for there was not a man that bare any Office, but did cast his eye upon Fabius, to know what he should doe. He it was that caused the gates of the City straight to be warded, and to keepe those in for going their way, that would have forsaken the City. He moreover did appoint the time and place of mourning, and did command whosoever was disposed to mourne, that he should doe it privately in his owne house, and to continue onely but thirty dayes. Then he willed all mourning to be left off, and that the City might be cleane from such uncleane things. So the Feast of Ceres falling about that time, he thought it better to leave off the Sacrifices and Procession which they were wont to keepe on Ceres day; then by their small number that were left, and sorrow of those that remained, to let their enemies understand their exceeding great losse: For the gods delight to be served with glad and rejoycing hearts, and with those that are in prosperity. But all this notwithstanding, whatsoever the Priests would have done, either to pacifie the wrath of the gods, or to turne away the threatnings of these sinister signes, it was forthwith done. For they did fend to the Oracle of Apollo in the City of DELPHES, one of Fabius Kinsmen furnamed Pictor. And two of the Vestal Nunnes being deffoured, the one was buried alive according to the Law and custome, and the other made her selfe away. But herein the great courage and noble clemency of the ROMANES is marvellously to be noted and regarded; For the Consul Terentius Varro, returning back to ROME, with the shame of his extreme misfortune and overthrow, that he durst not looke upon any man; the Senate notwithstanding, and all the people following them, went to the gates of the City to meete him, and did honourably receive him. Nay furthermore, those that were the chiefe Magistrates and Senators, among whom Fabius was one, when silence was made, they commended Varro much because he did not despair of the preservation of the Commonweale after so great calamity, but did returne againe to the City, to helpe to reduce things to order, in using the authority of the Law, and the service of the Citizens, as not being altogether under foot, but standing yet in reasonable termes of good recovery. But when they understood that Hannibal after the battell was gone into other parts of ITALY, then they began to be of good cheere againe, and sent a new Army and Generals to the field, among which the two chiefe Generals were Fabius Maximus, and Claudius Marcellus, both which by contrary meanes in manner, wan alike glory and reputation. For Marcellus (as we have declared in his his Life) was a man of speedy execution, of a quick hand, of a valiant nature, and a right martiall man, as Homer calleth them that valiantly put themselves in any danger: by reason whereof, having to deale with another Capitaine alike venturous and valiant as himselfe, in all service and execution, he shewed the selfe boldnesse and courage that Hannibal did. But Fabius persisting still upon his first determination, did hope that though he did not fight with Hannibal, nor stirre him at all, yet continuall warres would consume him and his Army in the end, and bring them both to nought; as a common wrestler that forreth his body above his naturall strength, doth in the end become a lame and bruised man: Hereupon Possidonius writeth, that the one was called the ROMANES Sword, and the other their Target. And that Fabius constancy and resolutenesse in warres to fight with security, and to commit nothing to hazard and danger, being mingled with Marcellus heate and fury, was that onely which preserved the ROMANES Empire. For Hannibal meeting alwayes in his way the one that was furious as a strong running streame, found that his Army was continually turmoyled and overharrid; and the other that was slow as a little pretty River, he found that his Army ran softly under him without any noyse, but yet continually by little and little it did still consume and diminish him, untill he saw himselfe at the last brought to that passe, that he was weary of fighting with Marcellus, and afraid of Fabius, because he fought not. For during all the time of these warres, he had ever these two Captaines almost against him, which were made either Prators, Consuls or Proconsuls, for either of them both had been five times before chosen Consul. Yet as for Marcellus, Hannibal had laid in ambush for him in the first and last yeare of his Consulship, where he set upon him on a sudden, and slew him. But as for Fabius, he laid many baits for him, and did what he could by all the skill and reach he had, by ambushes, and other warlike policies to entrap him, but he could never draw him within his danger. Howbeit at one time he put him to a little trouble, and was in good hope then to have made him fall upon his ambush he had laid for him, and this policy: He had counterfeited Letters written and sent unto him from the City of METAPONT, to pray him to come to them, and they would deliver their City into his hands: and withall, that such as were privy to the contents of the same, desired no other thing but his repaire thither. These Letters prettily quickened Fabius, inasmuch as he was determined one night to have taken part of his Army, and to have gone to them: but because the signes of the Birds did promise him no good successe, he left off his purpose. Soone after he understood they were counterfeited Letters, made by Hannibal's fine device to have drawne him out, and to have entrapped him, for whom himselfe lay in person in ambush neare the City, looking and waiting for his coming: but the gods who would have him saved, were onely to be thanked for his happy scape. Furthermore concerning the revolt of the Cities that were subject unto him, and the rising of their allies and friends against them; Fabius thought it farre better to entreat them courteously, making them ashamed without occasion to rebell against them, rather than openly to suspect them, and to deale straightly with those that were so to be suspected. Now for this matter, it is reported that Fabius had a Souldier in his Campe that was a MARSIAN borne by Nation, a valiant man of his person, and also of as Noble a House as any that were of all the allies of the ROMANES; who had practised with other his fellowes of the Band he served in, to goe serve the enemy. Fabius hearing of this practise he went about, gave him no ill countenance for it, but calling him to him, he said: I must confesse there is no reckoning made of you, as your good service doth deserve; wherefore for this time (saith he) I blame the petty Captaines onely, which in such sort doe bestow their good will and favour at adventure, and not by desert: But henceforth it shall be your owne fault if you doe not declare your minde unto me, and betweene you and me make me privy of your lacke and necessity. When he had spoken these words to him, he gave him a very good Horfe for service, and did reward him with other honourable gifts, as men of good service and desert have commonly bestowed on them. And this did so encourage his Souldiers thenceforth, that he became a very faithfull and serviceable Souldier to the ROMANES. For Fabius thought it more fit, that hunters, riders of Horses and such like as take upon them to tame brut beasts, should sooner make them leave their savage and churlish nature by gentle usage and manning of them, then by beating and shacking of them. And so a Governour of Men, should rather correct his Souldiers by patience, gentlenesse and clemency, then by rigor, violence or severity: Otherwise he should handle them more rudely and sharply then Husbandmen doe Fig-trees, Olive-trees and wilde Pomegranates; who by diligent pruning and good handling of them, doe after their hard and wilde nature, and cause them in the end to bring forth good Figs, Olives and Pomegranates. Another time certaine Captaines of his brought him word, that there was one of their Souldiers which would ever goe out of the Campe and leave his Ensigne. He asked them, what manner of man he was: They answered him all together, that he was a very good Souldier, and that they could hardly finde out such another in all their Bands as he: and therewithall they told him of some notable service they had seene him doe in person. Whereupon Fabius made a diligent enquiry to know what the cause was, that made him goe so oft out of the Campe: in the end he found he was in love with a young Woman, and that to goe see her was the cause he did so oft leave his Ensigne, and did put his life in so great danger, for that the was so farre off. When Fabius understood this, he sent certaine Souldiers (unknowing to the Souldier) to bring the Woman away he loved, and willed them to hide her in his Tent; and then called he the Souldier to him, that was a LUCANIAN borne, and taking him aside, said unto him thus: My friend, it hath been told me, that thou hast been many nights out of the Campe, against the Law of Armes and Order of the ROMANES; but therewithall I understand also, that otherwise thou art an honest man, and therefore I pardon thy faults past, in consideration of thy good good service: but from henceforth I will give thee in custody to such a one, as shall make me account of thee. The Souldier was blanke when he heard these words. Fabius with that caused the Woman he was in love with to be brought forth, and delivered her into his hands, saying unto him: This Woman hereafter shall answer me thy body to be forthcoming in the Campe amongst us: and from henceforth thy deeds shall witness for the rest, that thy love unto this Woman, may be no cloke for thy departing out of the Campe for any wicked practise or intent. Thus much we finde written concerning this matter. Moreover, Fabius after such a sort recovered againe the City of TARENTUM, and brought it to the obedience of the ROMANES, which they had lost by treason. It fortuned there was a young man in his Campe, a TARENTINE borne, that had a Sister within TARENTUM, which was very faithfull to him, and loved him marvellous dearly: now there was a Capitaine, a BRUTIAN borne, that fell in love with her, and was one of those to whom Hannibal had committed the charge of the City of TARENTUM. This gave the young Souldier the TARENTINE, very good hope and way, to bring his enterprise to good effect: whereupon he revealed his intent to Fabius, and with his privy fled from his Campe, and got into the City of TARENTUM, giving it out in the City, that he would altogether dwell with his Sister. Now for a few dayes at his first coming the BRUTIAN Capitaine lay alone by himselfe; at the request of the maid his Sister, who thought her Brother had not knowne of her love: and shortly after the young fellow tooke his Sister aside, and said unto her: My good Sister, there was a great speech in the ROMANES Campe, that thou wert kept by one of the chiefe Captaines of the Garrison: I pray thee if it be so, let me know what he is; for so he be a good fellow, and an honest man (as they say he is) I care not: for warres that turneth all thing topsi-turvy, regardeth not of what place, or calling he is of, and still maketh vertue of necessity, without respect of shame. And it is a speciall good fortune, at such time as neither right nor reason rules, to happen yet into the hands of a good and gracious Lord. His Sister hearing him speake these words, sent for the BRUTIAN Capitaine, to bring him acquainted with her Brother, who liked well of both their loves, and endeavoured himselfe to frame his Sisters love in better sort towards him, then it was before: by reason whereof, the Capitaine also began to trust him very much. So this young TARENTINE saw it was very easie to winne and turne the minde of this amorous and mercenary man, with hope of great gifts that were promised him, and Fabius should performe. Thus doe the most part of writers let downe this story. Howbeit some writers say, that this Woman who wanne the BRUTIAN Capitaine, was not a TARENTINE, but a BRUTIAN borne, whom Fabius it is said, kept afterwards for his Concubine, and that the understanding the Capitaine of the BRUTIANS (who lay in garrison within the City of TARENTUM) was also a BRUTIAN borne, and of her owne native Countrey, made Fabius privy to her intent, and with his consent, she coming to the walls of the City, spake with this BRUTIAN Captain, whom she handled in such sort, that they wanne him. But whilst this gere was a brewing, Fabius, because he would traine Hannibal out of those quarters, wrote unto the Souldiers of RHEGIO, which belonged to the ROMANES, that they should enter the borders of the BRUTIANS, and lay siege to the City of CAULONIA, and raze it to the ground. These RHEGIAN Souldiers were about the number of Eight thousand, and the most of them Traitors and runagates from one Campe to another: and the worst sort of them and most defamed of life, were those that Marcellus brought thither out of SICILE, so that in losing them all, the losse were nothing to the Commonwealth, and the forrow much lesse. So Fabius thought, that putting these fellows out for a prey to Hannibal (as a stale to draw him from those quarters) he should plucke him by this meanes from TARENTUM; and so it came to passe. For Hannibal incontinently went thence with his Army to entrap them: and in the meane time Fabius went to lay siege to TARENTUM, where he had not lien six dayes before it, but the young man (who together with his Sister had drawne the BRUTIAN Capitaine to this treason) stole out one night to Fabius, to informe him of all, having taken very good marks of that side of the wall the BRUTIAN Capitaine had taken charge of, who had promised him to keepe it secret, and to suffer them to enter that came to assault that side. Yet Fabius would not ground his hope altogether upon the BRUTIANS executing this treason, but went himselfe in person to view the place appointed, howbeit without attempting any thing for that time: and in the meane season, he gave a generall assault to all parts of the City (as well by sea as by Land) with great shouts and cries. Then the BRUTIAN Capitaine seeing all the Citizens and garrisons run to that part where they perceived the noise to be greatest, made a signall unto Fabius, that now was the time. Who then caused scaling ladders to be brought apace, whereupon himselfe with his company scaled the wals, and so wan the City. But it appeared here, that ambition overcame him: for first he commanded they should kill all the BRUTIANS, because it should not be knowne he had won the City by treason. But this bloody policy failed him: for he missed not onely of the glory he looked for, but most deservedly he had the reproach of cruelty and falshood. At the taking of this City, a marvellous number of the TARENTINES were slaine, besides there were sold Thirty thousand of the chiefe of them, and all the City was sacked: and of the spoile there was carried to the common store treasure at Rome Three thousand Talents. It is reported also, that when they did spoile and carry away all other spoiles left behind, the Recorder of the City asked Fabius, what his pleasure was to doe with the gods, meaning the Tables, and their Images: and to that Fabius answered him; Let us leave the TARENTINES their gods that be angry with them. This notwithstanding, he carried from thence Hercules statue, that was of a monstrous bignesse, and caused it to be set up in the Capitoll, and withall did set up his owne Image in brasse on horsebacke by him.

But in that act he shewed himselfe farre harder hearted then Marcellus had done, or to say more truly, thereby he made the world know how much Marcellus curtesie, clemency, and bounty was to be wondred at, as we have written in his Life. News being brought so Hannibal, that TARENTUM was besieged, he marched presently with all speed possible to raise the siege: and they say he had almost come in time, for he was within forty furlongs of the City when he understood the troth of the taking of it. Then said he out aloud, Sure the ROMANES have their Hannibal too: for as we wan TARENTUM, so have we lost it. But after that, to his friends he said plainly (and that was the first time they ever heard him speake it) that he saw long before, and now appeared plainly, that they could not possibly with this small power keep ITALY. Fabius made his Triumph and entry into ROMES the second time, by reason of taking this City: and his second Triumph was much more honourable then the first, as of a valiant Captain that held out still with Hannibal, and easily met with all his fine policies, much like the flight tricks of a cunning wrestler, which carried not now the former roughnesse and strength any more, because that his Army was given to take their ease, and grown to delicacy, partly through the great riches they had gotten, and partly also for that it was sore wasted and diminished through the sundry foughten battels and blowes they had been at. Now there was one Marcius Livius a ROMANE, that was Governour of TARENTUM at that time when Hannibal tooke it, and nevertheless kept the Castle still out of Hannibals hands, and so held it still until the City came againe into the hands of the ROMANES. This Livius spited to see such honour done to Fabius, so that one day in open Senate, being drowned with envy and ambition, he burst out and said: that it was himselfe, not Fabius, that was cause of taking of the City of TARENTUM againe. Fabius smiling to hear him, answered him openly: Indeed thou sayest true, for if thou hadst not lost it, I had never won it againe. But the ROMANES in all other respects did greatly honour Fabius, and specially for that they chose his Sonne Confull. He having already taken possession of his Office, as he was dispatching certaine causes touching the Warres, his Father (whether it was for debility of his age, or to prove his Sonne) tooke his horse to come to him, and rode through the preale of the people that thronged about him, having businesse with him. But his Sonne seeing him coming a farre off, would not suffer it, but sent an Officer of his unto him, to command him to light off his horse, and to come on foote if he had any thing to do with the Confull. This commandment misliked the people that heard it; and they all looked upon Fabius, but said not a word: thinking with themselves, that the Confull did great wrong to his Fathers greatnesse. So he lighted straight, and went a good round pace to embrace his Sonne, and said unto him; You have reason Sonne, and do well to shew over whom you command, understanding the authority of a Confull, which place you have received: For it is the direct course, by the which we and our ancestors have encreased the ROMANE Empire: preferring ever the honour and state of our Countrey, above Father, Mother or Children. And truly they say, that Fabius Great-Grandfather, being the greatest and most Noble person of ROMES in his time, having five times been Confull, and had obtained many Triumphs, for divers Honourable and sundry Victories he had won: was contented after all these, to be his Sonnes Lieutenant, and to go to the warres with him, he being chosen Confull. And last of all, the Confull his Sonne returning home to ROMES a Conquerour, in his triumphing Chariot drawne with foure Horses, he followed him on Horsebacke also, in troop with the rest; thinking it honour to him, that having authority over his Sonne in the right of a Father, and being also the Noblest man of all the Citizens, so taken and reputed, nevertheless he willingly submitted himselfe to the Law and Magistrate, who had authority of him. Yet besides all this, he had farre more excellent vertues to be had in admiration, then those already spoken of. But it fortuned that this Sonne of Fabius died before him, whose death he took patiently, like a wife man, and a good Father. Now the custome being at that time, that at the death of a Noble man, their neere Kinsman should make a Funerall Oration in his praise at their Obsequies: he himselfe made the same Oration in honour of his Sonne, and did openly speake it in the market-place, and moreover wrote it, and delivered it out abroad. About this time, Cornelius Scipio was sent into SPAIN, who drave out the CARTHAGINIANS from thence, after he had overthrowen them in many battels, and had conquered many great Cities, and greatly advanced the honour and estimation of the State of ROMES: for the which at his returne, he was as much, or rather more honoured, beloved and esteemed, then any other that was in the City of ROMES. Hereupon Scipio being made Confull, considered that the people of ROMES looked for some great matter at his hands, above all other. Therefore he thought, to take upon him to fight against Hannibal in ITALY, he should but follow the old manner, and tread too much in the steps of the old man: whereupon he resolved immediately to make wars in AFRICKE, and to burne and destroy the Countrey even unto CARTHAGE gates, and so to transerre the wars out of ITALY into LYBIA, procuring by all possible device he could, to put it into the peoples heads, and to make them like of it. But Fabius contrarily, perswading himselfe that the enterprise this young rash youth took in hand, was utterly to overthrow the Commonweale, or to put the State of ROMES in great danger: devised to put ROMES in the greatest feare he could possible, without sparing speech, or deed he thought might serve for his purpose, to make the people change from that minde. Now he could so cunningly worke his purpose, what with speaking and doing, that he had drawn all the Senate to his opinion. But the people judged, it was the secret envy he bare to Scipios glory, that drew him to encounter this device, only to blemish Scipios Noble fortune; fearing, lest if he should happen to doe some honourable service (as to make an end altogether of this warre, or otherwise to draw Hannibal out of ITALY) that then it would appeare to the world, he had been too soft, or too negligent, to draw this warre out to such a length. For my part, me thinks the only matter that moved Fabius:

from the beginning to be againſt Scipio, was the great care he had of the ſafety of the Commonweale, by reaſon of the great danger depending upon ſuch a reſolution. And yet I doe think alſo, that afterwards he went further then he ſhould, contending too ſore againſt him (whether it were through ambition or obſtinacy) ſeeking to hinder and ſuppreſſe the greatneſſe of Scipio: conſidering alſo he did his beſt to perſwade Craſſus, Scipio's companion in the Conſulſhip, that he ſhould not grant unto him the leading of the Army, but if he thought good to goe into AFRICK, to make warres upon the CARTHAGINIANS, that he ſhould rather goe himſelfe. And moreover, he was the let that they gave him no Money for maintenance of theſe warres. Scipio hereupon being turned over to his own credit, to furniſh himſelfe as he could, he leavied great ſummes of Money in the Cities of THUSCAN, who for the great love they bare him, made contribution towards his journey. And Craſſus remained at home, both becauſe he was a ſoft and no ambitious nor covetous man of nature; as alſo, becauſe he was the chiefeſt Prelate and high Biſhop, who by the Law of their Religion, was conſtrained to keep ROME. Fabius ſeeing his labour loſt that way, tooke againe another courſe to croſſe Scipio, deviſing to ſtay the young men at home, that had great deſire to goe this journey with him. For he cried out with open mouth, in all aſſemblies of the Senate and people, that Scipio was not contented onely to ſlie Hannibal, but that he would carry with him beſides the whole force of ITALY that remained: alluring the youth with ſweet baits of vaine hope, and perſwading them to leave their Wives, their Fathers, Mothers, and their Countrey, even now when their enemy knocked at ROME gates, who did ever conquer, and was never yet conquered. Theſe words of Fabius did ſo dampe the ROMANS, that they appointed Scipio ſhould furniſh his journey onely with the Army that was in SICILIA, ſaying that he might ſupply to them if he would, three hundred of the beſt Souldiers that had ſerved him faithfully in SPAIN. And ſo it doth appeare even to this preſent, that Fabius both did and ſaid all things according to his wonted manner, and naturall diſpoſition. Now Scipio was no ſooner arrived in AFRICK, but newes were brought to ROME incontinently, of wonderfull exploits, and noble ſervice done beyond meaſure; and of great ſpoiles taken by him, which argued the troth of the newes. As, the King of the NUMIDIANS taken Priſoner, two Campes of the enemies burnt and deſtroyed at a time, with loſſe of a great number of people, armour and houſes that were conſumed in the ſame: Letters and Poſts for life running in the necke one of another from CARTHAGE to call Hannibal home, and to pray him to hunt no longer after vaine hope that would never have end, haſting himſelfe with all ſpeed poſſible to come to the reſcue of his Countrey. Theſe wonderfull great fortunes of Scipio, made him of ſuch renowne and fame within ROME, that there was no talke but of Scipio. Fabius notwithstanding deſiſted not to make a new requeſt, being of opinion they ſhould ſend him a Succellor; alledging no other cauſe nor reaſon, but a common ſpeech of every body; that it was a dangerous thing to commit to the fortune of one man alone, ſo great exceeding proſperity and good ſucceſſe, becauſe it is a rare matter to ſee one man happy in all things. Theſe words did ſo much miſlike the people, that they thought him an envious troubleſome man, or elſe they thought his age had made him fearfull; and that his courage failed with his ſtrength, fearing Hannibal more doubtfully then he needed. For now though Hannibal was forced to leave ITALY, and to returne into AFRICK, yet Fabius would not grant, that the peoples joy and ſecurity they thought they were in, was altogether clear, and without fear and miſtruſt; but gave it out, that then they were in greateſt danger, and that the Common-weal was breeding more miſchief now then before. For when Hannibal (ſaid he) ſhall returne home into AFRICK, and come before CARTHAGE wals, the ROMANS ſhall be leſſe able to abide him there, then they have been before: and Scipio moreover ſhall meet with an Army yet warm, and embred with the bloud of ſo many Prators, Dictators, and Conſuls of ROME, which they have overcome, and put to the Sword in ITALY. With theſe uncomfortable ſpeeches, he ſtill troubled and diſquieted the whole City, perſwading them that notwithstanding the war was transferred out of ITALY into AFRICK, yet that the occaſion of feare was no leſſe near unto ROME, then it was ever before. But within ſhort ſpace after, Scipio having overcome Hannibal in plain battell in the field, and troden under foot the glory and pride of Carthage, he brought a greater joy to Rome then they ever looked for; And by this noble victory of his, he raiſed up again the declining ſtate of the Empire of ROME, which a little before was falling downright. Howbeit Fabius lived not to the end of this War, nor ever heard while he lived the joyful newes of Hannibal's happy overthrow, neither were his years prolonged to ſee the happy aſſured proſperity of his Countrey; For about that time that Hannibal departed out of ITALY, a ſickeſſe took him, whereof he died. The ſtorieſ declare that the THEBANS buried Epaminondas at the common charges of the people; becauſe he died in ſo great poverty, that when he was dead, they found nothing in the houſe but a little iron ſpit. Now the ROMANS buried not Fabius ſo at the common charge of the City, but every man of benevolence gave towards his Funeral charge, a peece of coin that carried the leaſt value of their currant money; not for that he lacked ability to bring him to the ground, but onely to honour his memory, in making his obſequies at their charges, as of one that had been their common Father. So had his vertuous life an honourable end and buriall.

The end of Fabius Maximus Life.

THE COMPARISON OF PERICLES with FABIUS.

Here have you heard what is written of theſe two great Perſons. And for as much as they have both left behind them, many notable examples of vertue, as well in martiall matters, as in civil government, let us begin to compare them together. Firſt of all, Pericles began to govern the Commonweale, at what time the people of ATHENS were in their chiefeſt proſperity; and of greater power and wealth, then ever they had been of before or ſince. The which might ſeeme to be a cauſe of the continuall maintenance of the ſame in ſecurity without danger of falling, not ſo much for their worthineſſe, as for their common power and felicity: where contrariwiſe Fabius acts felt out in the moſt diſhonourable and unfortunate time that ever happened to his countrey, in which he did not onely keepe the City in good ſtate from declining, but raiſed it up; and delivered it from calamity, and brought it to be better then he found it. Furthermore, Cimon's great good fortune and ſucceſſe, the victories and triumphs of Myronides, and of Leocrates, and many notable valiant deeds at armes of Tolmides, gave good cauſe to Pericles, to entertaine his City in Feaſts and Playes, whileſt he did govern the ſame: and he did not finde it in ſuch ill caſe and diſtreſſe, that he was driven to defend it by force of armes, or to conquer that againe which before was loſt. But Fabius in contrary manner, when he ſaw before him many overthrowes, great flying away, much murder, great ſlaughters of the Generals of the ROMAN Armies, the Lakes, the Plaines, the Woods filled with ſcattered Men, the people overcome, the Floods and Rivers running all agore-bloud (by reaſon of the great ſlaughter) and the ſtream carrying downe the dead bodies to the maine ſea: did take in hand the government of his Countrey, and by a courſe farre contrary to all other, he did ſo underprop and beare up the ſame, that he kept it from falling flat to the ground, amongſt thoſe ruines and overthrowes other had brought it to before him. Yet a man may ſay alſo, that it is no matter of ſo great difficulty to rule a City already brought low by adverſity, and which compelled by neceſſity, is contented to be governed by a wiſe man: as it is to bridle and keepe under the inſolency of a people, puſt up with pride and preſumption of long proſperity, as Pericles found it amongſt the ATHENIANS. The great multitude alſo of ſo many grievous calamities as lighted on the ROMAN's necks at that time, did plainly ſhew Fabius to be a grave and conſtant man; which would never give way unto the importunate cries of the common people, nor could ever be removed from that he had at the firſt determined. The winning and recovering againe of TARENTUM, may well be compared to the taking of SAMOS, which Pericles wan by force: and the Cities of CAMPANIA, unto the Iſle of EUROEA: excepting the City of CAPUA, which the Conſuls Fulvius and Appius recovered againe. But it ſeemeth that Fabius never wan battell, ſave that onely for which he triumphed the firſt time: where Pericles ſet up nine Triumphs, of Battels and Victories he had won, as well by Sea as by Land. And ſo alſo, they cannot alledge ſuch an act done by Pericles as Fabius did, when he reſcued Minutius out of the hands of Hannibal, and ſaved a whole Army of the ROMANS: which doubtleſſe was a famous act, and proceeded of a noble minde, great wiſedome, and an honourable heart. But Pericles, againe did never commit ſo groſſe an error as Fabius did, when he was out-reached and deceived by Hannibal's fine ſtratageme of his Oxen: who having found his enemy by chance to have ſhut himſelfe up in the ſtraight of a valley, did ſuffer him to eſcape in the night by a ſubtilty, and in the day by plaine force: for he was prevented by overmuch delay, and fought withall by him he kept incloſed. Now if it be requiſite, a good good Captaine doe not onely use well what he hath in his hands, but that he wisely judge also what will follow after, then then the warres of the ATHENIANS fell out in such sort, as Pericles said they would come to passe: for with ambition to embrace too much, they overthrew their estate. But the ROMANES contrariwise, having sent Scipio into AFRICK to make warres with the CARTHAGINIANS, was all that they tooke in hand: where their Generall did not overcome the enemy by fortune, but by valiantesse. So that the wisdom of the one is witnessed, by the ruine of his Country: and the error of the other testified, by the happy event of that he would have let. Now the fault is alike in a Generall, to fall into danger, for lacke of foresight: as for cowardinesse to let slip a fit opportunity offered, to doe any notable peece of service. For like default and lacke of experience maketh the one too hardy, and the other too fearefull. And thus much touching the warres. Now for civil government: it was a foule blot to Pericles, to be the author of warres. For it is thought, that he alone was the cause of the same, for that he would not have them yeeld to the LACEDÆMONIANS in any respect. And yet me thinkes Fabius Maximus also would no more give place unto the CARTHAGINIANS, but stood firme and bold in all danger, to maintaine the Empire of his Country against them. But the goodnesse and clemency Fabius shewed unto Minutius, doth much commend Pericles accusations and practises, against Cimon and Thucydides: both of them being Noble and good men, and taking part with the Nobility, whom he expelled out of ATHENS, and banished for a time. So was Pericles power and authority in the Commonweale greater: by reason whereof he did ever foresee, that no Generall in all his time did rashly attempt any thing hurtfull unto the Commonweale, except Tolmides only: who fled from him, and in despite of him went to fight with the BOEOTIANS, where he was slaine. As for all other Generalls, they wholly put themselves into his hands, and did obey him for the greatnesse of his authority. But Fabius, although for his part he never committed any fault, and that he went orderly to worke in all government; yet because he was not of power to keepe other from doing ill, it seemeth in this respect he was defective. For if Fabius had carried like authority in ROME, as Pericles did in ATHENS, the ROMANES had not fallen into so great misery as they did. And for Liberality, the one shewed it, in refusing the Money offered him: and the other in giving unto those that needed, and redeeming his poore captive Countreyemen. And yet Fabius might dispend no great Revenue, for his whole Receipts came onely to six Talents. But for Pericles, it is hard to say how rich he was, who had coming in to him, great Presents by his authority, as well of the Subject, as of the Friends and Allies of the ATHENIANS, as also of Kings and strange Princes: yet he never tooke Bribe for all that of any person living. And to conclude, as for the sumptuous building of Temples, the stately Works and common Buildings: put all the Ornaments together that ever were in ROME, before the times of the Caesars, they are not to be compared with those, wherewith Pericles did beautifie and adorne the City of ATHENS. For neither in quality nor quantity was there any proportion or like comparison, betwene the exceeding sumptuousnesse of the one, and of the other.

THE LIFE OF ALCIBIADES.

Ann. Mund. 3532.

Ant. Christ. 416.

ALCIBIADES by his Fathers side, was anciently defended of Euripides, that was the Sonne of Ajax, and by his Mothers side of Alcmaeon, for his Mother Dinomacha, was the Daughter of Megacles. His Father Clinias having armed and set forth a Galley at his owne proper costs and charges, did win great honour in the battell by sea, that was fought along the coast of ARTEMISIUM, and he was slaine afterward in another battell fought at CORONEA, against the BOEOTIANS. His Sonne Alcibiades Tutors, were Pericles and Ariphron, Xanthippus Sonnes: who were also his neer Kinsmen. They say, and truly, that Socrates good will and friendship did greatly further Alcibiades honour. For it appeareth not, neither was it ever written, what were the Names of the Mothers of Nicias, of Demosthenes, of Lamachus, of Phormion, of Thrafsibulus, and of Themistocles; all which were notable famous men in their time. And to the contrary, we finde the Nurce of Alcibiades, that she was a LACEDÆMONIAN borne, and was called Amicla, and that his Schoollmaster was called Zopyrus: of the which, Antisthenes mentioneth the one, and Plato the other. Now for Alcibiades beauty, it made no matter if we spake not of it, yet I will a little touch it by the way: for he was wonderfull faire, being a Childe, a Boy, and a Man, and that at all times, which made him marvellous amiable, and beloved of every man. For where Euripides saith, that of all the faire times of the yeare, the Autumne or later season is the fairest: that commonly falleth not out true. And yet it proved true in Alcibiades, though in few other; for he was passing faire even to his latter time, and of good temperature of body. They write of him also, that his tongue was somewhat fat, and it did not become him ill, but gave a certaine naturall pleasant grace in his talke: which Aristophanes mentioneth, mocking one Theorus that did counterfet a lisping grace with his tongue:

Into mine eares, this trusty tale, and Song full of merrung:
Looks upon Theolus (quoth he) to there he bowes, Behold his comely crown-bright face with fat and *flashing blowes.
The Sonne of Clinias, would lisse it thus somewhiles,
And sure he lissed never a lye, but rightly hit his wiles.
And Archippus another Poet also, mocking the Sonne of Alcibiades, saith thus:
Because he would be like his Father every way,
In his long trailing gowne he would go jetting day by day.
And counterfet his speech, his countenance and face;
As though dame nature had him given therein a perfect grace;
To lisse and looke aside, and hold his head awry, Even as his Father lookt, and list so would he prate and pry.*

For his manners they altered and changed very oft with time, which is not to be wondred at, seeing his marvellous great prosperity, as also adversity that followed him afterwards. But of all the great desires he had, and that by nature he was most inclined to, was ambition, seeking to have the upper hand in all things, and to be taken for the best person: as appeareth by certaine of his deeds, and notable sayings in his youth, extant in writing. One day wrestling with a companion of his, that handled him hardly, and thereby was likely to have given him the fall; he got his fellowes arme in his mouth, and bit so hard, as he would have eaten it off. The other feeling him bite so hard, let go his hold straight, and said unto him: What Alcibiades, bitest thou like a Woman? No marry doe I not (quoth he) but like a Lyon. Another time being but a little boy, he played at Skales in the middest of the street.

* The equivocation of these two Greeke words Kops and Kops, is hard to be expressed in English, in stead whereof I have set flashing blowes, for flattering browes, observing the grace of lisping as neere as I could, like to the Latine aut French translations, likewise Theorus for Theorus.

with other of his companions, and when his turn came about to throw, he cast a cart laden by chance that way: Alcibiades prayed the carter to stay a while, until he had played out his game, because the skales were set right in the high way where the cart should passe over. The carter was a stubburne knave, and would not stay for any request the Boy could make, but drove his Horse on still, in so much as other boys came backe to let him go on: but Alcibiades fell flat to the ground before the cart, and had the carter drive over and he durst. The carter being affraid, plucked backe his Horse to stay them: the neighbours flocked to see the danger, and the Boy in all haste crying out. Afterwards when he was put to schoole to learne, he was very obedient to all his Masters that taught him any thing, so that he desired to learne to play on the flute or recorder: saying, that it was no gentlemanly quality. For he did he to play on the viol with a fluke, doth not after mans favour, nor disgrace any gentleman: but otherwise, to play on the flute, his countenance alwayeth and changed in sport, that his familiar friends could not know him. Moreover, the harpe or viol doth not let him that playeth of them, from speaking, or fingring as he playeth: where he that playeth on the flute, holdeth his mouth so hard to it, that it taketh not onely his words from him but his voyce. Therefore said he, let the Children of the THEBANS play on the flute, that cannot tell how to speake: as for the ATHENIANS, we have (as our forefathers tell us) for Protecters and Patrones of our Countrey, the goddesse Pallas, and the god Apollo: of the which the one in old time (as it is said) brake the flute, and the other pulled his skinne over his eares, that played upon a flute. Thus Alcibiades alledging these reasons, partly in sport, and partly in good earnest, did not onely himselfe leave to learne to play on the flute, but he turned his companions minds also quite from it. For these words of Alcibiades, ran from boy to boy incontinently: that Alcibiades had reason to despise playing on the flute, and that he mocked all those that learned to play on it. So afterwards, it fell out at ATHENS, that teaching to play on the flute, was put out of the number of Honest and liberrall exercises, and the flute it selfe was thought a vile instrument, and of no reputation. Furthermore, in the accusations Anisphon wrote against Alcibiades, it is declared: that when he was a Boy, he fled out of his tutors house, into the house of Democritus one of his lovers, and how Anisphon one of his tutors thought to have made a beards cry him through the City: but Pericles would not suffer him, saying, that if he were dead, they should know it but one day sooner by crying of him: and if he were alive, that it would be such a shame to him while he lived, that he had bin better he had never bin heard of againe. The same Anisphon accuseth him further, that he had killed a servant of his that attended on him, in the wrastring place of Silyrius, with a blow of a staffe. But there is no reason to credit his writing, who confesseth he speaketh all the ill he can of him, for the ill will he did beare him. Now straight there were many great and rich men that made much of Alcibiades, and were glad to get his good will. But Socrates Love unto him had another end and cause, which witnessed that Alcibiades had a naturall inclination to vertue. Who perceiving that vertue did appeare in him, and was joynted with the other beauty of his face and body, and fearing the corruption of riches, dignity and authority, and the great number of his companions, as well of the chieftest of the City, as of strangers, seeking to entice him by flattery, and by many other pleasures: he tooke upon him to protect him from them all, and not to suffer so goodly an ympe to loose the hope of the good fruit of his youth. For fortune doth never so intangle nor share a man without, with that which they commonly call riches, as to let and hinder him so, that Philosophy should not take hold on him with her free, severe and quick reasons. So Alcibiades was at the beginning, assailed with all delights, and shut up as it were in their company that feasted him with all pleasures, onely to turne him that he should not hearken to Socrates words, who sought to bring him up at his charge, and to teach him. But Alcibiades notwithstanding, having a good naturall wit, knew what Socrates was, and went to him, refusing the company of all his rich friends and their flatteries, and fell in a kinde of familiar friendship with Socrates. Whom when he had heard speake, he noted his words very well: that they were no persuasions of a man seeking his dishonesty, but one that gave him good counsell, and went about to reforme his faults and imperfections, and to plucke downe the pride and presumption that was in him: then, as the common Proverbe saith.

Like to the craven Cocks, he drooped downe his wings, Which cowardly doth runne away, or from the pit out-flings.

And thinke with himselfe, that all Socrates love and following of young men, was indeede a thing sent from the Gods, and ordained above for them, whom they would have preserved and put into the path-way of honour. Therefore he began to despise himselfe, and greatly to reverence Socrates, taking pleasure in his good using of him, and much imbraced his vertue: so as he had (he wist not how) an image of love graven in his heart, or rather (as Plato saith) a mutuall love, to wit, an holy and honest affection towards Socrates. Inomuch as all the world wondered at Alcibiades, to see him commonly at Socrates boord, to play, to wrestle, and to lodge in the wars with Socrates: and contrarily to chide his other well-willers, who could not so much as have a good looke at his hands; and besides became dangerous to some, as it is said he was unto Anytus, the Sonne of Anthemion, being one of those that loved him well. Anytus, making good cheere to certaine strangers his friends that were come to see him, went and prayed Alcibiades to come and make merry with them: but he refused to goe. For he went to make merry with certaine of his companions at his owne house, and after he had well taken his cups, he went to Anytus house to counterfeit the foole amongst them; and staying at the hall doore, and seeing Anytus table and cubbord full of plate of silver and gold, he commanded his servants to take away halfe of it, and carry carry it home to his house. But when he had thus taken his pleasure, he would come to heere into the house, but went his way home. Anytus friends and guests mistaking this strange part of Alcibiades said it was shamefully and boldly done to abuse Anytus. Nay, gently done of him, said Anytus for he hath left us some where he might have taken all. All other also that made much of him, he setved after that sort, saying a stranger that came to dwell in ATHENS, who being but a poore man as the voice went, sold all that he had, whereof he made about a hundred Straters; which he brought unto Alcibiades, and prayed him to take it at his hands. Alcibiades began to be merry, and being very glad to understand his good will towards him, tooke his honest offer, and prayed him to come to supper to him: so he welcomed him very heartily and made him good cheere. When supper was done, he gave him his Money againe, and commanded him not to faile the next morning to meete him where the Farnes and Lands of the City are wont to be let out to those that bid most, and charged him he should outbid all. The poore man would faine have excused himselfe, saying the Farnes were too great for him to hire: But Alcibiades threatned to whip him, if he would not doe it: For besides the desire he had to pleasure him, he bare a private grudge against the ordinary Farmers of the City. The next morning the stranger was ready in the market-place, where they did cry out the letting of their Farnes, and he raised one to a Talent more then all other did offer. The other Farmers were as mad with him as could be; that they all did set upon him, crying out; Let him put in security straight, supposing he could have found none. The stranger was marvellous blanke thereat, and began to shrink backe. Then cried Alcibiades out aloud to the Officers that sat there to take the best offers: I will be his surety, saith he, put me in the Booke, for he is a friend of mine. The Farmers hearing him say so, were at their wits end, and wist not what to doe. For they being alwayes accustomed to pay their yearly Rent as it went before, by the helpe of the rest of the yeares that followed after: perceiving now that they should not be able to pay the arrearages of the Rent due to the Commonweale, and seeing no other remedy, they prayed him to take a piece of Money, and to leave the bargain. Then Alcibiades would in no wise he should take lesse then a Talent, which they gave him willingly. So Alcibiades suffered the stranger then to depart, and made him gaine by his device. Now Socrates love which he bare him, though it had many mighty and great adversaries, yet it did stay much Alcibiades, sometime by gentle nature, sometime by his grave counsell and advice: so as the reason thereof tooke so deepe root in him, and did so pierce his heart, that many times the teares ran downe his cheeks. Another time also being carried away with the enticement of flatterers, that held up his humour with all pleasure and delights, he stole away from Socrates, and made him run after him to fetch him againe, as if he had beene a slave that had run away from his Masters house: for Alcibiades stood in awe of no man but Socrates onely, and indeed he did reverence him, and did despise all other. And therefore Cleanthes was wont to say, that Alcibiades was held of Socrates by the eares: but that he gave his other lovers hold, which Socrates never fought for: for to say truly, Alcibiades was much given over to lust and pleasure. And peradventure it was that Thucydides meant of him, when he wrote that he was incontinent of body, and dissolute of life. These that marred Alcibiades quite, did still pricke forward his ambition and desire of honour, and did put him in the head to thrust himselfe into great matters betimes, making him beleeve that if he did but once begin to shew himselfe to deale in matters of state, he would not onely blissh and defeat all other Governours, but farre excell Pericles, in authority and power among the GREEKS: For like as Iron by fire is made soft, to be wrought in any forme, and by cold also is shut and hardened againe: even so Alcibiades being puffed up with vanity and opinion of himselfe, as oft as Socrates took him in hand, was made soft and firme againe by his good persuasions, in so much that when he saw his owne fault and folly, and how farre wide he had strayed from vertue, he became suddenly very humble and lowly againe. Now on a time when he was growne to mans state, he went into a Grammar schoole, and asked the Schoolemaster for one of Homers bookes. The Schoolemaster answered him, He had none of them: Alcibiades up with his fist and gave him a good boxe on the eare, and went his way. Another Grammarian told him on a time he had Homer which he had corrected. Alcibiades replied, Why what meanest thou, to stand teaching little Children their A, B, C, when thou art able to correct Homer, and to teach young men not boyes? Another time he came and knocked at Pericles gate, desirous to speake with him: answer was made him He was not at leisure now, for that he was busily occupied by himselfe, thinking on his reckonings he had to make with the ATHENIANS. Why, said he, going his way, it were better he were occupied, thinking how to make no account at all. Moreover, being but a young boy, he was at the journey to PORTIENE, where he lay still with Socrates, who would never let him be from him in all battels and skirmishes he was in: among which there was one very hot and bloody, where they both fought valiantly, and Alcibiades was hurt. But Socrates stepped before him, and did defend him so valiantly before them all, that he saved him and his weapon out of the enemies hand. So the honour of this fight out of doubt, in equity and reason, was due unto Socrates: but yet the Captaines would faine have judged it on Alcibiades side, because he was of a Noble house. But Socrates, because he would increase his desire of honour, and would pricke him forward to honest and commendable things, was the very first that witnessed Alcibiades had deserved it, and therefore prayed the Captaines to judge him the Crowne and complete armour. Afterwards, in the battell of DELION, the ATHENIANS having received the overthrow, Socrates retired with a few other on foot. Alcibiades being on horsebacke, and overtaking him, would not goe from him, but kept him company, and defended him against a troope of his enemies that followed him, and slew many of his company. But that was a pretty while after, and before he gave a boxe on the eare unto Hippomachus, Callias Father; who was one of the greatest men of power in the City.

declaring unto them, that they should not feare the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor yeeld to them at all, but to stick to the ATHENIANS, who would soone repent them of the peace they had made, and breake it with them. Afterwards when the LACEDÆMONIANS had made league with the BOEOTIANS, and had delivered the City of PANACTUM to the ATHENIANS, all defaced and spoiled, contrary to the league: Alcibiades perceiving how the people were much offended thereat, made them more earnest against them, and therewithall brought Nicias in disgrace with the people, and charged him with many matters of great likelihood. As at that time when he was General: that he would never take any of the LACEDÆMONIANS, when they were shut up within the Ille SPHACTERIA, and much lesse distresse them when he might: and moreover when other had taken them prisoners by force, that he had found the meanes to deliver them, and fend them home againe, to gratifie the LACEDÆMONIANS. Furthermore, that being their friend, he did not his duty to disswade the people from making of league offensive and defensive with the BOEOTIANS and the CORINTHIANS: and againe also, if there were any people of GREECE that had a desire to become friends and allies with the ATHENIANS, that he did the best he could to let them, if the LACEDÆMONIANS had no liking of the matter. Now as Nicias was thus in disgrace with the people, for the causes abovesaid: in the midst of this stir, Ambassadors came by chance from LACEDÆMON to ATHENS, who at their coming gave very good words, saying they had full power and commission to compound all controversies, under reasonable and equall conditions. The Senate heard them, and received them curteously, and the people the next day should assemble in counsell to give them audience: which Alcibiades fearing much, he went to labour the Ambassadors, and spake with them apart in this sort. What meane you, my Lords of SPARTA: doe ye not know that the Senate hath alwayes accustomed to be gracious and favourable unto those that sue unto them for any matter, and that the people contrarily are of a proud nature, and desirous to imbrace all great matters? If therefore at the first sight, ye doe give them to understand that you are come hither with full power, to treat freely with them in all manner of causes: doe you not thinke that they will make you stretch your authority, to grant them all that they will demand? Therefore, my Lords Ambassadors, if you looke for indifferency at the ATHENIANS hands, and that they shall not presse you too farre against your wills, to grant them any thing of advantage: I would wish you a litle to cover your full Commission, and in open manner to propound certaine Articles, and reasonable capitulations of Peace, not acquainting them otherwise with your full power to agree in all things: and for my part, I will assure you of my good will in favour of the LACEDÆMONIANS. When he had told them this tale, he gave them his faithfull promise, and vowed as it were to performe his word. Hereupon Alcibiades turned the Ambassadors from the truit they repofed in Nicias, and wan them on his side: in so much as they gave credit to no man but to him, wondering much at his great wisdom and ready wit, and they thought him a rare and notable man. The next morning the people were assembled to give the Ambassadors audience. They were sent for, and brought into the market-place. There Alcibiades gently asked them, what was the cause of their coming. They answered; that they were come to treat of Peace, but they had no power to determine any thing. Then began Alcibiades to be angry with them, as if they had done him wrong, and not he any to them: calling them unfaithfull, unconstant, and fickle men, that were come neither to doe, nor say any thing worth the hearing. The Senate also were offended with them, and the people rated them very roughly: whereat Nicias was so ashamed and amazed withall, that he could not tell what to say, to see so sudden a change, knowing nothing of Alcibiades malice and subtill practise with the Ambassadors. So the Ambassadors of LACEDÆMON were dispatched without any thing done, and Alcibiades chosen General: who presently brought the ARGIVES, the ELIANS, and the MANTINIANS in league with the ATHENIANS. Though no man did commend this practise of his, in working it after this sort: yea it was a marvellous thing of him to devise to put all PELOPONNESUS in armes, and to procure such a number of Souldiers against the LACEDÆMONIANS, as he did before the City of MANTINEA, and to shift off the miseries of warre and hazard of battell, so farre from ATHENS. Which if the LACEDÆMONIANS did win, could not profit them much; and if they lost it, they could hardly save their City of SPARTA. After this battell of MANTINEA, the thousand men whom the City by an ancient Order did keepe continually in pay, as well in peace as in warre, within the City of ARGOS, thinking now opportunity served them very trimly: attempted to take the soveraigne authority from the common people, and to make themselves Lords of the City. And to bring this to passe, the LACEDÆMONIANS coming in the mean time, did aide them in their purpose, and so did put downe the government of the people: notwithstanding immediately after the people tooke armes againe, and became the stronger. Alcibiades coming thither even at that time, did warrant them the victory, and to set up againe the authority of the people. Then he perswaded them to make their walles longer to joine the City to the Sea, to the end they might more easily be aided by Sea, by the ATHENIANS. He brought them also from ATHENS, many Carpenters, Masons, Stone-hewers, and other Workmen: and to conclude, he shewed them by all the meanes and wayes he could, that he did beare good will unto them, and thereby wan himselfe no lesse favour particularly among them, then generally he did good unto his Country. He did perswade also his Citizens of PATRAS, to joine their Towne to the Sea, by making long walles, which they built out even to the cliffes of the Sea. And when one said unto them, Alas, poore people of PATRAS! what doe you meane? the ATHENIANS will eate you out: Alcibiades answered him, it may well be, but it shall be by litle and litle, beginning first at the feet, but the LACEDÆMONIANS will devoure you all at once, and begin at the head. Now although Alcibiades did make the City of Alcibiades chosen General.

The walles brought to the Sea by the ARGIVES.

ATHENS strong by sea, yet he did not leave to perswade the ATHENIANS also to make themselves strong by land. For he did put the young men oftentimes in minde of the Oath they were made to sweare in AGRANLOS, and did advise them to accomplish it indeed, Which was that they should take all Corn-fields, Vines, and Olive-Trees, to be borders and confines of ATTICA, whereby they were taught to reckon all Land theirs that was manured and did bring forth fruit. Yet with all these goodly deeds and fair words of Alcibiades, and with this great courage and quicknesse of understanding, he had many great faults and imperfections. For he was too dainty in his fare, wantonly given to light women, riotous in banquets, vain and womanish in apparell; He wore ever a long purple gown that swept the Market-place as he walked up and down, it had such a train, and was too rich and costly for him to wear. And following these vain pleasures and delights, when he was in his galley, he caused the planks of the poepe thereof to be cut and broken up, that he might lie the softer; for his bed was not laid upon the overlop, but laid upon girthes strained over the hole, cut out and fastened to the sides, and he carried to the wars with him a gilded Scuchion wherein he had no cognizance nor ordinary device of the ATHENIANS, but only had the Image of Cupid in it, holding lightning in his hand. The Noble men and best Citizens of ATHENS perceiving this, they hated his fashions and conditions, and were much offended at him, and were afraid withall of his rashnesse and infolency; he did so contemne the Lawes and customes of their Country, being manifest tokens of a man that aspired to be King, and would subvert and turn all overhand. And as for the good-will of the common people towards him, the Poet Aristophanes doth plainly expresse it in these words:

Alcibiades sycor.

The people most desire what most they hate to have,

And what their minde abhors, even that they seem to crave.

And in another place he said also, aggravating the suspition they had of him:

For State or Commonwealth, much better should it be,

To keepe Within the Country, none such Lions look as he;

But if they needs Will keepe a Lion to their cost,

Then must they needs obey his Will, for he Will rule the roff.

For to say truly, his courtesies, his liberalities, and noble expences to shew the people so great pleasure and pastime as nothing could be more: the glorious memory of his ancestors, the grace of his Eloquence, the beauty of his person, the strength and valiantnesse of his body joyned together with his wisdom and experience in martiall affaires; were the very causes that made them to beare with him in all things, and that the ATHENIANS did patiently endure all his light parts, and did cover his faults with the best words and termes they could, calling them youthfull and gentlemen sports. As when he kept Agarbarcus the Painter prisoner in his house by force, until he had painted all his wals within: and when he had done, did let him goe, and rewarded him very honestly for his paines. Againe, when he gave a boxe on the eare to Taurus, who did pay the whole charges of a company of common Plaiers, in spite of him, to carrie away the honour of the Games. Also when he tooke away a young woman of MELIA by his authority that was taken among certaine prisoners in the Warres, and kept her for his Concubine: By whom he had a Childe, which he caused to be brought up: which they called a worke of charity, albeit afterwards they burthened him, that he was the onely cause of murdering of the poore MELIANS, saving the little Children, because he had favoured and perswaded that unnatural and wicked Decree, which another had propounded. Likewise where one Aristophon a Painter had painted a Curtisan named Nemæa, holding Alcibiades in her armes, and sitting in her lap, which all the people ranne to see, and tooke great pleasure to behold it: the grave and ancient men were angry at these foolish parts, accounting them impudent things, and done against all civill modesty and temperancy. Wherefore it seemed Archestratus words were spoken to good purpose, when he said: that GREECE could not abide two Alcibiades at once. And on a day as he came from the Councell and assembly of the City, where he had made an excellent Oration, to the great good liking and acceptation of all the hearers, and by meanes thereof had obtained the thing he desired, and was accompanied with a great traine that followed him to his honour: Timon surnamed Misanthropus (as who would say, Loup-garon, or the man-hater) meeting Alcibiades thus accompanied, did not passe by him, nor gave him way (as he was wont to do all other men), but went straight to him, and tooke him by the hand, and said: O, thou dost well my Sonne, I can thee thanke, that thou goest on, and climest up still: for if ever thou be in authority, woe be unto those that follow thee, for they are utterly undone. When they heard these words, those that stood by fell a laughing: other reviled Timon, other again marked well his words, and thought of them many a time after: such sundry opinions they had of him for the unconfancy of his life, and waywardnesse of his nature and conditions. Now for the taking of SICILE, the ATHENIANS did marvellously covet it in Pericles life, but yet they did not meddle withall, until after his death: and then they did it at the first under colour of friendship, as ayding those Cities which were oppressed and spoiled by the SYRACUSANS. This was in manner a plaine bridge made, to passe afterwards a greater power and Army thither. Howbeit the onely procurer of the ATHENIANS, and perswader of them, to send small Companies thither no more, but to enter with a great Army at once to conquer all the Country together, was Alcibiades, who had so allured the people with his pleasant tongue, that upon his perswasion, they built Castles in the aire, and thought to doe greater wonders by winning onely of SICILIA. For where other did set their mindes upon the conquest of SICILE, being that they only hoped after: it was to Alcibiades, but but a beginning of further enterprizes. And where Nicias commonly in all his persuasions, did turne the ATHENIANS from their purpose to make warres against the SYRACUSANS, as being too great a matter for them to take the City of SYRACUSA: Alcibiades againe had a further reach in his head, to goe conquer LYBIA, and CARTHAGE, and that being conquered, to passe from thence into ITALY, and so to PELOPONNESUS: so that SICILIA should serve but to furnish them with victuals, and to pay the Souldiers for their conquests which he had imagined. Thus the young men were incontinently carried away with a marvellous hope and opinion of this journey, and gave good ear to old mens tales that told them wonders of the Countries: inofmuch as there was no other pastime nor exercise among the youth in their meetings, but companies of men to sit round together, draw plats of SICILE, and describe the situation of LYBIA and CARTHAGE. And yet they say, that neither Socrates the Philosopher, nor Meton the Astronomer did ever hope to see any good successe of this journey. For the one by the revealing of his familiar spirit, who told him all things to come, as was thought, had no great opinion of it: and Meton, whether it was for feare of the successe of the journey he had by reason, or that he knew by divination of his Art what would follow, he counterfeited the mad man, and holding a burning Torch in his hand, made as though he would have set his house on fire. Other say, that he did not counterfeit, but like a mad man indeed did set his house on fire one night, and that the next morning betimes he went into the marketplace to pray the people, that in consideration of his great losse and his grievous calamity so late happened him, it would please them to discharge his Sonne from going this voyage. So by this mad device, he obtained his request of the people for his Sonne, whom he abused much. But Nicias against his will was chosen Captaine, to take charge of Men in these Warres: who mistliked this journey, as well for his companion and affocate in the charge of these Warres, as for other misfortunes he foresaw therein. Howbeit the ATHENIANS thought the Warre would fall out well, if they did not commit it wholly to Alcibiades rashnesse and hardinesse, but did joyne with him the wisdom of Nicias: and appointed Lamachus also for their third Captaine, whom they sent thither, though he were waxen now somewhat old, as one that had shewed himselfe no lesse venterous and hardy in some battels, then Alcibiades himselfe. Now when they came to resolve of the number of Souldiers, the furniture and order of these Warres; Nicias sought crookedly to thwart this journey, and to breake it off altogether: but Alcibiades withstood him, and got the better hand of him. There was an Orator called Demoftratus, who moved the people also that the Captaines whom they had chosen for these Warres, might have full power and authority to leavie men at their discretion, and to make such preparation as they thought good: whereunto the people consented, and did authorize them. But when they were even ready to goe their way, many signes of ill successe lighted in the necke one of another: and amongst the rest this was one; That they were commanded to take Ship on the day of the celebration of the Feast of Adonia, on the which the custome is, that Women doe set up in divers places of the City, in the midst of the streets, Images like to dead corfes which they carry to burial, and they represent the mourning and lamentations made at the funerals of the dead, with blubbering and beating themselves, in token of the sorrow the goddesse Venus made, for the death of her friend Adonis. Moreover, the Hermes (which are the Images of Mercury, and were wont to be set up in every lane and street) were found in a night all hacked and hewed, and mangled, specially in their faces: which put diverse in great feare and trouble, yea even those that made no account of such toys. Whereupon it was alledged, that it might be the CORINTHIANS that did it, or procured that leud act to be done, favouring the SYRACUSANS, who were their neere Kinsmen, and had been the first founders of them; imagining upon this ill token, it might be a cause to breake off the enterprize, and to make the people repent them, that they had taken this Warre in hand. Nevertheless the people would not allow this excuse, neither hearken to their words that said, they should not reckon of any such signes or tokens, and that they were but some light brained youths, that being tiptled, had played this shamefull part in their bravery, or for sport. But for all these reasons, they tooke these signes very grievously, and were indeed not a little afeard, as thinking undoubtedly that no man durst have been so bold to have done such an abominable fact, but that there was some conspiracy in the matter. Hereupon they looked upon every suspition and conjecture that might be (how little or unlikely foever it were) and that very severely: and both Senate and people also met in councill upon it, very oft in few dayes. Now whilst they were busily searching out the matter, Androcles a common Counsellor, and Oratour in the Commonwealth, brought before the Counsell certaine slaves and strangers that dwelt in ATHENS: who deposed, that Alcibiades, and other of his friends and companions, had hacked and mangled other Images after that sort, and in a mockery had counterfeited also in a banquet that he made, the Ceremonies of the holy Mysteries; declaring these matters particularly: How one Theodorus counterfeited the Herald, that was wont to make the Proclamations: Polytion the Torch-bearer, and Alcibiades the Priest, who sheweth the holy signes and Mysteries: and that his other companions were the Assistants, as those that make suit to be received into their Religion and Order, and into the brotherhood, of their holy Mysteries, whom for this cause they call Mystes. These very words are written in the Accusation Thestalus (Cimons Sonne) made against Alcibiades, charging him that he had wickedly mocked the two goddeses, Ceres and Proserpina. Whereat the people being marvellously moved and offended, and the Orator Androcles his mortall enemy, aggravating and stirring them up the more against him: Alcibiades a little at the first began to be amazed at it. But afterwards, hearing that the Mariners which were prepared for the voyage of

SICILIA, and the Souldiers also that were gathered, did beare him great good will, and specially how the aide, that came from ARGOS, and MANTINEA (being a thousand Footmen well armed and appointed) did say openly, how it was for Alcibiades sake they did take upon them so long a voyage beyond Sea, and that if they went about to do him any hurt or wrong, they would presently returne home againe from whence they came: he began to be of a good courage againe, and determined with this good favourable opportunity of time, to come before the Counsell, to answer to all such Articles and Accusations as should be laid against him. Thereupon his Enemies were a little cooled, fearing lest the People in this judgement would have shewed him more favour, because they stood in neede of him. Wherefore to prevent this danger, they had fed other Orators, who set a good face on the matter, as they had beene Alcibiades friends, and yet they wished him no lesse evil then the rankest Enemies he had. These fine fellows rose up in open Assembly, and said: It was no reason, that he that was now chosen one of the Generals of so mighty and puissant an Army (being ready to hoise saile, and the aide also of their Allies and friends) should be driven to stay now, and to lose time and occasion of well doing, whilst they should go about to choose Judges, and appoint him his houres and time of answer. Therefore they said, it was fit he should take his journey betimes, and when Warres were done, that he should present himselfe to require justice, and to purge himselfe of such matters as should be objected against him. But Alcibiades smelling straight their fetch, and perceiving the practice of his stay, slept up (and declared how they did him great wrong, to make him depart with the charge of a Generall of so great an Army, his minde being troubled with continuall feare of so grievous curses, as he should leave upon him: and that he deserved death, if he could not purge and justifie himselfe of all the unjust and surmized accusations against him. And if he had once cleared himselfe of all things, and had published his innocency, he should then have nothing in his head to trouble him, nor to thinke upon, but to go on lustily to fight with his Enemies, and to cast behinde him the danger of all his slanderous detractors. But all this could not persuade them. And so he was presently commanded in the behalfe of the People, to imbarke and ship away his men. Thus he was compelled to take the Seas with his other companions, having in their Navie about a hundred and forty Galleys, all having three Oares to a banke: and five thousand one hundred Footmen, very well armed and appointed, and throwers with flings, Archers, and other light armed men to the number of thirteene hundred, sufficiently furnished of all warlike and necessary munition. Now after they were arrived on the Coast of ITALY, they landed in the City of RHEGIO: where, holding councill in what sort they should direct these Warres, it was resolved in the end that they should straight go unto SICILIA. This opinion was followed, although Nicias did contrary it, when Lamachus gave his consent thereunto, and at his first coming, he was the occasion of winning the City of CATHANA. But he never after did any exploit, for he was called home immediately by the ATHENIANS, to come and answer certaine Accusations laid to his charge. For as we told you before, there was at the beginning certaine light suspitions and accusations put up against him, by some Slaves and strangers. But afterwards when he was gone, his Enemies enforced them, and burthened him more cruelly, adding to his former fault, that he had broken the Images of Mercury: and had committed Sacriledge, in counterfeiting in jest and mockery the holy Ceremonies of the Mysteries: and blew into the eares of the People, that both the one and the other proceeded of one set conspiracy, to change and alter the Governement of the state of the City. Upon these informations, the People tooke it in foill part, that they committed all to prison, that were in any sort accused or suspected thereof, and would never let them come to their answer: and moreover did much repent them that they had not condemned Alcibiades, upon so great complaints and informations as were exhibited against him, while his offence was in question before them, and the fury and hatred of the People was such towards him, that if any of Alcibiades friends and acquaintance came within their danger, they were the worse handled for his sake. Thucydides did not name his Accusers, but some other do name Diocles and Tencer: amongst whom Phrynicus the Comical Poet is one, who discovereth it in his Verses, by bringing in one that speaketh to the Image of Mercury:

*My good friend Mercury, I pray thee take good heed, That thou fall not and breake thy neck: for so thou mightst me breed Both danger and distrust, and though I guiltlesse be,
Some Diocles falsly might accuse and trouble me.*

Mercury answereth:

*Take thou no thought for me, my selfe I shall well save:
And will foresee full well therewith, that Tencer (that false knave) Shall not the money get, which he by Law hath won,
For his promoters bribing part and accusation.*

And yet for all this, these tokens do shew no certainty of any thing. For one of them being asked how he could know them by their faces in the night, that had broken and defaced these Images? he answered, that he knew them well enough by the brightnesse of the Moone. And hereby it appeareth plainly that he was perjured, because that the same night, on the which this fact was committed, there was a conjunction of the Moone. This did a little trouble and stay men of judgement: howbeit the common sort of People this notwithstanding, did not leave to be as sharpe set, to receive all Accusations and Informations that were brought in against him, as ever they were before. Now there was among the Prisoners whose cause was hanging before them, the Phrynicus the Comical Poet.

Orator

Andocides the Orator cast into prison.

Orator, Andocides (whom Hellanicus the Historiographer describeth to descend of the race of Ulysses) whom they tooke to be a man that hated the Government of the common People, and bent altogether to favour the small number of the Nobility. But one of the chiefeft occasions why he was suspected to be one of them that had broken the Images, was: for that hard by his house there was a faire great Image set up in old time by the Family or Tribe of the Ægides, and that alone amongst all the rest of so many famous Images, was left whole and unbroken: whereupon it is called at this day, the Mercury of Andocides, and is so called generally of every body, albeit the Inscription sheweth the contrary. Andocides being in prison, chanced to fall in acquaintance with one Timon, with whom he was more familiar then with all the rest, who was also prisoner with him for the self cause. This Timon was a man not so well knowne as he, but besides, a wife man, and very hardy. He perswaded him, and put into his head, that he should accuse himselfe, and certaine other with him: for taking the matter upon him, and confessing it, he should receive grace and pardon, according to the courtesie and promise of the Law: where contrarily, if he should stand upon the courtesie of the Judges sentence, he might easily endanger himselfe: because Judgements in such cases are uncertaine to all People, and most to be doubted and feared toward the rich. And therefore he told him, it were his best way, if he looked into the matter wisely, by lying to save his life, rather then to suffer death with shame, and to be condemned upon this false accusation. Also he said, if he would have regard to the Common-wealth, that it should in like case be wisely done of him, to put in danger a few of those (which stood doubtfull whether in troth they were any of them or no) to save from the fury of the People, and terror of death, many honest men, who indeede were innocent of this lewd Fact. Timon words and perswasions wrought such effect with Andocides, that they made him yeeld unto them, and brought him to accuse himselfe, and certaine other with him: by means whereof Andocides according to the Law had his pardon: but all such as he named and accused, were every man put to death, saving such as saved themselves by running away. Furthermore, to shadow his Accusation with some appearance of troth, Andocides among those that were accused, did accuse also certaine of his owne Servants. Now though the People had no more occasion to occupie their busie heads about the breakers of these Images, yet was not their malice thus appeased against Alcibiades, untill they sent the Galley called Salaminiensis, commanding those they sent by a speciall Commission to seeke him out, in no case to attempt to take him by force, nor to lay hold on him by violence: but to use him with all the good words and courteous manner that they possibly could, and to will him onely to appeare in person before the People, to answer to certaine Accusations put up against him. If otherwise they should have used force, they feared much lest the Army would have mutined on his behalfe within the Countrey of their Enemies, and that there would have growne some sedition amongst their Souldiers. This might Alcibiades have easily done, if he had bene disposed: for the Souldiers were very sorry to see him depart: perceiving that the Warres should be drawne out now in length, and be much prolonged under Nicias, seeing that the Warres were taken from them, who was the onely spur that pricked Nicias forward to do any Service: and that Lamachus also, though he were a valiant man of his hands, yet he lacked Honour and Authority in the Army, because he was but a meane man borne, and poore besides. Now Alcibiades for a farewell, disappointed the ATHENIANS of winning the City of Messina: for they having intelligence by certaine private persons within the City, that it would yeeld up into their hand, Alcibiades knowing them very well by their names, bewrayed them unto those that were the SYRACUSANS friends: whereupon all this practise was broken utterly. Afterwards when he came to the City of Thurie, so soone as he had landed, he went and hid himselfe incontinently in such sort, that such as sought for him could not finde him. Yet there was one that knew him where he was, and said: Why, how now Alcibiades, darest thou not trust the justice of thy Countrey? Yes very well (quoth he) and it were in another matter: but my life standing upon it, I would not trust mine owne mother, fearing lest negligently she should put in the black beane, where she should cast in the white: for by the first, condemnation of death was signified: and by the other, pardon of life. But afterwards, hearing that the ATHENIANS for malice had condemned him to death: Well, quoth he, they shall know I am yet alive. Now the manner of his Accusation and Indictment framed against him, was found written in this sort: Thessalus the Sonne of Cimon, of the Village of Laciades, hath accused, and doth accuse Alcibiades, the Sonne of Clinias, of the Village of Scambonides, to have offended against the goddesse, Ceres and Proserpina, counterfeiting in mockery their holy mysteries, and shewing them to his familiar friends in his house, himselfe apparelled and arrayed in a long Vestment or Cope, like unto the Vestment the Priest weareth when he sheweth these holy Sacred Mysteries: and naming himselfe the Priest, Polytion the Torch-bearer, and Theodorus of the Village of Paygra the Verger, and the other lookers on Brethren, and fellow-scorers with them, and all done in manifest contempt and derision of holy Ceremonies and Mysteries of the Eumolpides, the religious Priests and Ministers of the sacred Temple of the City of Ereus. So Alcibiades for his contempt and not appearing, was condemned, and his Goods confiscate. Besides this condemnation, they decreed also, that all the religious Priests and women should banne and accurse him. But hereunto answered one of the Nunnes called Theano, the Daughter of Menon, of the Village of Agraula, saying that she was professed religious, to pray and to blesse, not to curse and banne. After this most grievous sentence and condemnation passed against him, Alcibiades departed out of the City of Thurie, and went into the Countrey of Peloponnesus, where he continued a good season in the City of Argos.

ARGOS. But in the end fearing his Enemies, and having no hope to returne againe to his owne Countrey with any safety: he sent unto SPARTA, to have safe conduct and license of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that he might come and dwell in their Countrey, promising them he would do to them more good being now their friend, then he ever did them hurt, while he was their Enemy. The LACEDÆMONIANS granted his request, and received him very willingly into their City: where even at his first coming, he did three things. The first was: that the LACEDÆMONIANS by his perswasion and procurement, did determine speedily to send aide to the SYRACUSANS whom they had long before delayed: and so they sent Gylippus their Captaine to overthrow the ATHENIANS Army, which they had sent thither. The second thing he did for them, was: that he made them of GREECE to begin Warre upon the ATHENIANS. The third, and greatest matter of importance, was: that he did counsel them to fortifie the City of Decælea, which was within the Territories of ATTICA selfe: which consumed, and brought the Power of the ATHENIANS lower then any other thing whatsoever he could have done. And if he were welcome, and well esteemed in SPARTA, for the service he did to the Common-wealth: much more he was the love and good wills of private men, for that he lived after the LACONIAN manner. So as they that saw his skin scraped to the flesh, and saw him wash himselfe in cold water, and how he did eat brown bread, and sup of their black broth: would have doubted (or to say better, never have believed) that such a man had ever kept Cooke in his house, nor that he ever had seene so much as a perfuming panne, or had touche cloth of Tissue made in Miletum. For among other qualities and properties he had (whereof he was full) this as they say was one whereby he most robbed mens hearts: that he could frame altogether with their manners and fashions of life, transforming himselfe more easily to all manner of shapies, then the Camelion. For it is reported, that the Camelion cannot take white colour: but Alcibiades could put upon him any manners, customes or fashions, of what Nation soever, and could follow, exercise, and counterfeite them when he would, as well the good as the bad. For in SPARTA, he was very painfull, and in continuall exercise: he lived sparingly with little, and led a streight life. In IONIA, to the contrary, there he lived daintily and superfluously, and gave himselfe to all mirth and pleasure. In THRASIA, he was alwaies on horseback. If he came to Tijaphernes, Lieutenant of the mighty King of PERSIA, he far exceeded the magnificence of PERSIA in pompe and sumptuousnesse. And these things notwithstanding, never altered his naturall condition from one fashion to another, neither did his manners (to say truly) receive all sorts of changes. But because peradventure, if he had shewed his naturall disposition, he might in divers places where he came, have offended those whose company he kept, he did with such a vizard and cloake disguise himselfe, to fit their manners whom he companied with, by transforming himselfe into their naturall countenance: as he that had seene him when he was at SPARTA, to have looked upon the outward man, would have said as the common Proverbe saith:

It is not the sunne of Achilles, but Achilles selfe.

Even so, it is even he whom Lycurgus brought up. But he that had inwardly seene his naturall doings, and good will indeede lye naked before him, would contrarily, have used this common saying:

This woman is no changeling.

For he entertained Queene Timea, King Agis wife of SPARTA, so well in his absence, he being abroad in the Warres, that he got her with childe, and she her selfe denied it not. For she being brought to bed of a sonne, who was named Leotychides, openly to the world called him by that name: but when she was amongst her familiars and very friends, she called him softly Alcibiades, she was so farre in love with him. And Alcibiades, jesting out the matter, said he had done it for no hurt, nor for any lust of flesh to satisfie his desire: but onely to leave of his race, to reigne amongst the LACEDÆMONIANS. This matter was brought by divers unto King Agis, who at the length believed it: but specially when he began to make a reckoning of the time how long it was since he lay with his wife. For lying with his wife one night when there was a terrible Earthquake, he ranne out of his chamber for feare the house would fall on his head: so that it was tenne moneths after ere he lay againe with her. Whereupon her Sonne Leotychides being borne at the end of tenne moneths, he said it was none of his: and this was the cause that Leotychides did not succede afterwards in the Kingdome, because he was not of the blood-royall. After the utter overthrow of the ATHENIANS in SICILIA, those of the Isles of Chio and Lesbos, with the CYZICENIANS, did send altogether their Ambassadors to SPARTA, to let the LACEDÆMONIANS understand, they had good will to leave the ATHENIANS, so they would send them aide to defend them. The BOEOTIANS favoured those of LESBOS: Pharnabazus, the King of PERSIANS Lieutenant, favoured the CYZICENIANS. This notwithstanding the LACEDÆMONIANS were better affected to helpe those of CHIO first, by the perswasion of Alcibiades, who took their matter in hand: and he tooke Sea himselfe and went into ASIA, where he almost turned the Countrey of IONIA against the ATHENIANS: and keeping alwaies with the Generals of the LACEDÆMONIANS, he did much hurt the ATHENIANS. Yet notwithstanding, King Agis did beare him ill will, partly for the injury he did him in dishonouring and defiling his wife, and partly also, for that he envied his glory: because the rumour ranne all about, that the most part of the goodly exploits of those Warres did happen well by Alcibiades means. Other also of the greatest Authority among the SPARTANS, that were most ambitious among them, began in their mindes

to be angry with Alcibiades, for the envie they bare him: who were of so great power, that they procured their Governours to write Letters to their Captaines in the Field to kill him. Alcibiades hearing of this, did no whit desist to do all that he could for the benefit of the LACEDÆMONIANS: yet he had an eye behinde him, flying all occasions to fall into their hands. So in the end, for more fury of his person, he went unto Tisaphernes one of the King of PERSIA's Lieutenants, with whom he wanne incontinently such credit, that he was the first and chiefeest person he had about him. For this barbarous man being no simple person, but rather malicious, and subtil of nature, and that loved fine and crafty men: did wonder how he could so easily turne from one manner of living to another, and also at his quick wit and understanding. Moreover, his company and manner to passe the time away, was commonly marvellous full of mirth and pleasure, and he had such pleasant comely devices with him, that no man was of so fullen a nature, but he would make him merry, nor so churlish, but he would make him gentle. So that both those that feared him, and also they that envied him, were yet glad to see him, and it did them good to be in his company, and use talke with him. Inasmuch as this Tisaphernes (that otherwife was a churlish man, and naturally hated the GRECIANS) did give himselfe so much unto Alcibiades flatteries, and they pleased him so well, that he himselfe did studie to flatter Alcibiades againe, and made much of him. For he called Alcibiades his faire house of pleasure, and goodly prospect: notwithstanding he had many goodly Gardens, sweete Springs, greene Arbours, and pleasant Meadows, and those in all royall and magnificent manner. Alcibiades despairing utterly to finde any safety or friendship among the SPARTANS, and fearing on the other side King Agis also: he began to speake ill of them, and to disgrace all that they did, to Tisaphernes. By this practise he stayed Tisaphernes from aiding them so friendly as he might; and that he did not utterly destroy the ATHENIANS: for he perswaded him that he should furnish the LACEDÆMONIANS but with little money, to let them diminish and consume by little and little, to the end that after one had troubled and weakened the other, they both at the length should be the easier for the King to overcome. This barbarous man did easily consent to this device. All the world then saw he loved Alcibiades, and esteemed of him very much: inasmuch as he was fought to, and regarded of all hands of the GRECIANS. Then were the ATHENIANS sory, and repented them when they had received so great losse and hurt, for that they had decreed so severely against Alcibiades, whom in like manner was very sorrowfull, to see them brought to so hard termes, fearing, if the City of ATHENS came to destruction, that he himselfe should fall in the end into the hands of the LACEDÆMONIANS, who maliced him to the death. Now about that time, all the power of the ATHENIANS was almost in the Isle of SAMOS, from whence with their Army by Sea, they sought to suppress the Rebels that were up against them, and to keepe all that which yet remained. For they were yet prettily strong to resist the Enemies, at the least by Sea: but they stood in feare of the power of Tisaphernes, and of the hundred and fifty Gallies which were reported to be coming out of their Countrey of PHOENICIA to the aid of their Enemies, which if they had come, the City of ATHENS had been utterly spoiled, and for ever without hope of recovery. The which Alcibiades understanding, sent secretly unto the chiefeest men that were in the Army of the ATHENIANS at SAMOS, to give them hope he would make Tisaphernes their friend: howbeit not of any desire he had to gratifie the People, nor that he trusted to the Commonalty of ATHENS, but onely to the honourable and honest Citizens, and that conditionally, so as they had the heart and courage, to bridle a little the over-licentiousness and insolency of the common People, and that they would take upon them the Authority to govern, and to redresse their State, and to preserve the City of ATHENS from finall and utter destruction. Upon this advertisement, all the heads and chiefe men did give very good care unto it: saving onely Phryniscus, one of the Captaines, and of the Towne of DIRADES: who mistrusting (that was true indeede) that Alcibiades cared not which end went forward, nor who had the chiefe government of ATHENS, the Nobility or the Commonalty, and did but seeke all the devices and waies he could, to returne againe if it might be possible, in any manner of sort, and that he did but curry favour with the Nobility, blaming and accusing the People: he stood altogether against the motion, whereupon Alcibiades device was not followed. And having now shewed himselfe open Enemy to Alcibiades, he did secretly advertise Astiochus, then Admirall to the LACEDÆMONIANS, of Alcibiades practise, and warned him to take heed of him, and to lay him up safe, as a double-dealer, and one that had intelligence with both sides: but he understood not how it was, one Traytor to speak to another. For this Astiochus was a follower of Tisaphernes for his private commodity: and perceiving Alcibiades in such credit with him, he did discover to Alcibiades all that Phryniscus had advertised him. Alcibiades straight sent men of purpose to SAMOS, unto the Captaines there, to accuse Phryniscus of the treason he had revealed against them. Those of the Councell there, receiving this intelligence, were highly offended with Phryniscus. So, he seeing no better way to save himself for making of this fault, went about to make amends with committing a worse fault. Thereupon he sent againe to Astiochus, complaining much he had disclosed him: and yet nevertheless he promised him, if he would keepe his counsell, that he would deliver the whole Fleete and Army of the ATHENIANS into his hands. Howbeit this treason of Phryniscus did the ATHENIANS no hurt at all, by reason of Astiochus counter-treason: for he did let Alcibiades againe understand what offer Phryniscus had made him. Phryniscus looking to be charged with this againe the second time before the Councell, by means of Alcibiades, did first advertise the chiefe of the Army of the ATHENIANS: that their Enemies would come and set upon them, and where, and how, and gave them warning to keepe neere their Ships,

to make a strong watch, and to fortifie themselves with all speed, the which forthwith they did. And as they were about it, there came other Letters from Alcibiades, by the which he did warn them again to take heed of Phryniscus, because he had practised againe with their Enemies, to deliver the whole Army of ATHENS into their hands. But they gave no credit to his second Letters: for they thought that he knowing the preparation and mines of the enemies, would serve his owne turne with the false accusing of Phryniscus. Notwithstanding this, there was some fallshood in fellowship: for one Hermomon, openly in the Market-place stabbed Phryniscus in with a dagger, and killed him. The fact being pleaded in Law, and thoroughly considered of, the dead body by the sentence of the People was condemned for a Traytor: and Hermomon the murderher and his fellows, were crowned in recompence of their fact they had done to kill a Traytor to the Common-wealth. Wherefore those that were Alcibiades friends, being at that time the stronger and greatest men of the Councell in the Army of SAMOS: they sent one Pisander to ATHENS, to attempt to alter the Government, and to encourage the Noblemen to take upon them the Authority, and to pluck it from the People: assuring them that Tisaphernes would give them aide to do it, by means of Alcibiades, who would make him their friend. This was the colour and cloke wherewith they served their turnes, that did change the Government of ATHENS, and that brought it into the hands of a small number of Nobility: for they were in all but foure hundred, and yet they called themselves five thousand. But so soone as they felt themselves strong, and that they had the whole authority of Government, without contradiction in their hands, they made then no more reckoning of Alcibiades, and so they made Warres more coldly and slackly then before. Partly because they mistrusted their Citizens, who found the change of Government very strange: and partly also because they were of opinion that the LACEDÆMONIANS (who at all times did most favour the Government of Nobility) would be better inclined to make peace with them. Now the common People that remained still in the City, stirred not, but were quiet against their wills, for feare of danger, because there were many of them slaine, that boldly tooke upon them in open preference to resist these foure hundred. But those that were in the Campe in the Isle of SAMOS, hearing these newes, were so grievously offended, that they resolved to returne incontinently againe, unto the haven of PIRÆA. First of all, they sent for Alcibiades: whom they chose their Captaine, then they commanded him straightly to leade them against these Tyrants, who had usurped the liberty of the People of ATHENS. But nevertheless he did not herein, as another would have done in this case, seeing himselfe so suddenly crept againe in favour with the common People: for he did not thinke he should incontinently please and gratifie them in all things, though they had made him now their Generall over all their Ships, and so great an Army, being before but a banished man, a vagabond, and a fugitive. But to the contrary, as it became a Generall worthy of such a charge, he considered with himselfe, that it was his part wisely to stay those, who would in a rage and fury carelessly cast themselves away, and not suffer them to do it. And truly Alcibiades was the cause of the preserving of the City of ATHENS at that time from utter destruction. For if they had suddenly (according to their determination) departed from SAMOS to goe to ATHENS: the Enemies finding no man to lett them, might easily have wonne all the Countrey of IONIA, of HELLESPOINT, and of all the other Isles without stroke striking, whilst the ATHENIANS were busie fighting one against another in civil Warres, and within the compasse of their owne walls. This Alcibiades alone, and no other, did prevent, not onely by perswading the whole Army, and declaring the inconvenience thereof, which would fall out upon their suddain departure: but also by intreating some particularly apart, and keeping a number backe by very force. To bring this about, one Thrafsibulus of the Towne of STIRA, did helpe him much: who went through the Army, and cried out upon them that were bent to enterprise this journey: for he had the biggest and loudest voyce, as they say, of any man that was in all the City of ATHENS. This was a notable act, and a great piece of service done by Alcibiades: that he promised the five hundred saile of the PHOENICIANS (which the LACEDÆMONIANS assuredly looked for, in their aide from the King of PERSIA) should not come at all, or else if they came, it should be in the favour of the ATHENIANS. For he departed immediately, and went with great speed to Tisaphernes: whom he handled in such sort, that he brought not the Ships that lay at rode before the City of AFRANDA, and so he brake promise with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Therefore Alcibiades was marvellously blamed and accused, both of the one and the other side, to have altered Tisaphernes minde, but chiefly the LACEDÆMONIANS: who said, that he had perswaded this barbarous Captaine, he should neither aide the one nor the other, but rather to suffer themselves to devoure and destroy each other. For it had been out of doubt, if this great Fleet and Navie of the Kings had come, to joyne their force with either party: that they had taken from the one of them the feignory and domination of the sea. Shortly after, the 400 Noblemen that had usurped the authority and government of ATHENS, were utterly driven away and overthrowne, by means of the friendly aid and assistance that Alcibiades friends gave those that tooke the Peoples part. So the Citizens were very well pleased with Alcibiades, inasmuch as they sent for him to returne when he thought good. But he esteeming it no honour unto him to returne without some well-deserving, and before he had done some greater exploit, as only upon the Peoples favour and good will: to the end that his returne might be glorious and triumphant: he departed first from SAMOS with a small number of Gallies, and went sailing up and downe the Isles of COS and of GYTOS. There he was advertised, that Mindarus, the Admirall of the LACEDÆMONIANS, was gone with all his Fleete unto the Straights of HELLESPOINT, and that the Captaines of the ATHENIANS gave chase unto him. Thereupon he went also and joyned thither, with speed, to aide the ATHENIANS: and by very good fortune came with eightene Gallies, even at the very instant when they were both in the midst of their fight, with all their Ships before the City of ABYDOS. The battell was cruelly foughten between them from morning till night, both the one and the other having the better in one part of the battell, and the worst in another place. Now at the first discovery of Alcibiades coming, both parts had indeede contrary imaginations of him. For the enemies tooke heart unto them: and the ATHENIANS began to be afraid. But Alcibiades setting up a Flag in the top of his Admirall Galley, to shew what he was, he presently set upon the PELOPONNESIANS that had the better, and had certaine Gallies of the ATHENIANS in chase: whereupon the PELOPONNESIANS gave over their chase, and fled. But Alcibiades followed them so lustily, that he ran divers of them aground, and brake their Ships, and slew a great number of men that leapt into the Sea, in hope to save themselves by swimming a land: notwithstanding that Pharnabazus was come thither to aide the LACEDÆMONIANS, and did his best endeavour to save their Gallies by the Sea shore: yet the ATHENIANS in the end wanne 30. Gallies of their Enemies, and saved all their owne, and so did set up certaine Flags of triumph and victory. Alcibiades having now happily gotten this glorious victory, would needs go shew himselfe in triumph unto Tisaphernes. So having prepared to present him with goodly rich presents, and appointed also a convenient Traine and number of Saile meete for a General, he tooke his course directly to him. But he found not that entertainment he hoped for: for Tisaphernes standing in great hazard of displeasure, and feare of punishment at the Kings hands, having long time before beene defamed by the LACEDÆMONIANS, who had complained of him, that he did not fulfill the Kings commandment, thought that Alcibiades was arrived in very happy houre: whereupon he kept him prisoner in the City of SARDIS, supposing the wrong he had done, would by this meanes easily discharge and purge him to the King. Yet at the end of thirty daies, Alcibiades by fortune got a horse, and stealing from his keepers, fled unto the City of CLAZOMENES; and this did more increase the suspicion they had of Tisaphernes, because they thought that underhand he had wrought his liberty. Alcibiades tooke then Sea againe, and went to seeke out the Army of the ATHENIANS. Which when he had found, and heard newes that Mindarus and Pharnabazus were together in the City of CYZICUM, he made an Oration to his Souldiers, and declared unto them how it was very requisite they should fight with their Enemies, both by Sea and by Land, and moreover that they should assault them within their Forts and Castles, because otherwise they could have no money to defray their charges. His Oration ended, he made them immediately hoise saile, and so to go lie at anker in the Ile of PROCONNESUS: where he tooke order that they should keepe all the Pinaces and Brigantines among the Ships of warre, that the Enemy might have no manner of intelligence of his coming. The great shoures of raine also, with thunder and dark weather that fell out suddenly upon it, did greatly further him in his attempt and enterprize: inso much as not onely his Enemies, but the ATHENIANS that were there before, knew nothing of his coming. So some made their reckoning, that they could do little or nothing all that day: yet he made them suddenly imbarke, and hoise saile. They were no sooner in the maine Sea, but they discried afar off the Gallies of their Enemies, which lay at rode before the haven of CYZICUM. And fearing lest the great number of his Fleet would make them sicke, and take Land before he could come to them: he commanded certaine Captaines to flye behinde, and to row softly after him, and himselfe with forty Gallies with him, went towards the Enemies to provoke them to fight. The Enemies supposing there had beene no more Ships then those that were in fight, did set out presently to fight with them. They were no sooner joyned together, but Alcibiades Ships that came behinde, were also discried. The Enemies were so affraid thereof, that they cast about and fled straight. Alcibiades leaving his Fleet, followed the chase with twenty of the best Gallies he had, and drave them a land. Thereupon he landed also, and pursued them so courageously at their heeles, that he slew a great number of them on the maine Land, who thought by flying to have saved themselves. Moreover, Mindarus and Pharnabazus, being come out of the City to rescue their People, were overthrowne both. He slew Mindarus in the Field, fighting valiantly: as for Pharnabazus, he cowardly fled away. So the ATHENIANS spoiled the dead bodies (which were a great number) of a great deale of armour and riches, and tooke besides all their Enemies Ships. After they tooke the City of CYZICUM, Pharnabazus having left it. Then the PELOPONNESIANS being slaine, they had not onely the possession of the whole Countrey of HELLESPOINT, which they kept: but they drave their Enemies by force out of all parts of the Sea. There were at that time certaine Letters intercepted, whereby a Secretary gave advertisement unto the Ephors at SPARTA, of the overthrow in this sort: All is lost, Mindarus is slaine, our People die for hunger, and we know not what to do. Now the Souldiers of ATHENS that had beene at this journey and overthrow, grew to such pride and reputation of themselves, that they would not, and disdaind also to serve with other Souldiers that had beene beaten many times, and went away with the worse: where they to the contrary had never beene overcome as a little before happened, that the Captaine Thersippus had beene overthrowne by the City of EPHESUS: and for this overthrow, the EPHESIANS had set up triumph and token of brasse, to the utter shame and ignominy of the ATHENIANS. For the which Alcibiades Souldiers did very much rebuke Thersippus men, and did exceedingly extoll their Captaine and themselves, and would neither encampe with them, neither have to do with them, nor yet keepe them company: untill such time as Pharnabazus came with a great Army against them, as well of Footmen as Horsemen, when they ran a foraging upon the ABYDENIANS: and then Alcibiades went to the rescue of them, and gave Pharnabazus battell, and

and overthrow him once againe, and did together with Thersippus, chase him even untill darke night. Then both Alcibiades and Thersippus Souldiers did company together, one rejoicing with another: and so returned all with great joy into one Campe. The next morning Alcibiades set up a Triumph for the Victory he had the day before, and then went to spoile and destroy Pharnabazus Countrey where he was Governour, and no man durst once come out to meete him. In this rode there were taken Prisoners, certaine Priests and Nuns of the Countrey: but Alcibiades freely delivered them afterwards without ranfome. And preparing to make Warres against the CHALCEDONIANS, who were revolted from the ATHENIANS, and had received a Garison and Governour of the LACEDÆMONIANS into their City, he was advertised that they had brought all their Goods and Cattels out of their Fields, and had delivered them to the safe custody of the BYTHINIANS, who were their neighbours and friends. Hereupon he led his Army into their Borders, and sent a Herald to summon the BYTHINIANS, to make amends for the wrong they had done the ATHENIANS. The BYTHINIANS fearing lest Alcibiades would set upon them, did straight deliver him their goods they had before in their custody, and moreover made a league with the ATHENIANS besides. That done, he went and laid siege to the City of CHALCEDON, the which he environed all about from the one side of the Sea to the other. Pharnabazus came thither, thinking to have raised the siege. And Hippocrates a Captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that was Governour of the City, assembled all the force he was able to make within the same, and made a sallie out also upon the ATHENIANS at the very same time. Whereupon Alcibiades putting his men in order of battell, so as they might give charge upon them both at one instant, fought so valiantly, that he forced Pharnabazus to runne his way with shame enough, and slew Hippocrates in the Field, with a great number of his men. Then tooke he the Seas againe, to go towards the Countrey of HELLESPOINT, to get some Money, where on the sudden he did take the City of SELYBREA: because he valiantly put himselfe in hazard before the time appointed him. For certaine of his friends within, with whom he had secret practise, had given him a token, that when time served, they would shew a burning torch in the aire at midnight: but they were compelled to shew this fire in the aire before they were ready, for feare lest one of their confederacy would betray the matter, who suddenly repented him. Now this torch burning in the aire, was set before Alcibiades was ready with his company. But he perceiving the signe set, tooke about thirty men with him in his company, and ranne with them to the walls of the City, having commanded the rest of his Army to follow him with all speede possible. The gate was opened to him, and to his thirty men: besides them there followed twenty other light armed men. Howbeit they were no sooner entred the City, but they heard the Citizens armed come against them: so that there was no hope to scape, if they did tarry their coming. Neverthelesse, considering that untill that present time, he was never overcome in battell where he had taken charge, it grieved him very much to flye: wherefore it straight came in his head to make silence by sound of Trumpet, and after silence made, he caused one of them that were about him to make Proclamation with a loud voyce, that the SELYBRIANIANS should not take Armes against the ATHENIANS. This cooled them a little that would faine have bene doing, because they supposed that all the Army of the ATHENIANS had beene already in the City: the other on the contrary side, were very glad to talke of peace, without any further danger. And as they began to parle upon composition, the rest of Alcibiades Army was come on. Now he thinking indeede (which was true) that the SELYBRIANIANS fought nothing but peace, and fearing lest the THRACIANS (which were many in number, and came with good will to serve him in that journey) would sacke and spoile the City, he made them all to go out againe: and so concluding peace with the chiefe of the SELYBRIANIANS, he did them no more hurt upon their humble submission, but made them pay him a summe of money, and so leaving a Garison of the ATHENIANS within the City, he departed thence. Whilst Alcibiades was in treaty with the SELYBRIANIANS, the other ATHENIAN Captaines that lay at the siege of CHALCEDON, made an agreement with Pharnabazus, that he should give them a summe of money, and give up the Towne into the ATHENIANS hands, to enjoy it as they did before. And with expresse condition also, that the ATHENIANS should make no rodes into Pharnabazus Dominions, to hurt or spoile any of his: and he likewise should be bound to give good safe conduct unto the Ambassadors of the ATHENIANS, to go and come safe from time to time, to the King of PERSIA. The other Captaines being sworne to this peace, Pharnabazus conditioned also that Alcibiades at his returne should likewise be sworne to the peace and conditions thereof. But Alcibiades said he would not be sworne at all, unless Pharnabazus were first sworne for his part. Thus when Oathes were taken on either side, Alcibiades went also against those of BYZANTIUM, who in like case had rebelled against the ATHENIANS. At his first coming thither, he environed the City round about with a wall. Afterwards he practised with two secret friends of his, Ananias and Lycurgus, and certaine other within the City, who promised him to deliver it into his hands, so they might be assured he would do them no hurt. To colour this practise, he gave it out that he must needs leave the siege, and depart with speede, for certaine newes that were come out of IONIA: and thereupon he imbarked presently, and went out of the haven at noone daies with all his Ships, howbeit he returned againe the same night. And going a land with the choicest and best armed men he had, he approached the walls of the City, without any manner of noise, and having left order with them that remained in the Ships, that in the meane season they should rowe with all force into the haven, with as great cries and shouts as might be, to feare and trouble the Enemies: partly to feare the BYZANTIANS: the withstand all envie, and drive away the Lawes and Customes of trying of matters by the voyces of the People, and all such fonde devices as did destroy the state of the Common-weale. And furthermore, they said it was very needfull that he alone should take upon him the whole Rule and Government of the City, that he might dispose all things according to his will, and not stand in feare of slanderous and wicked tongues. Now, whether Alcibiades ever had any minde to usurpe the Kingdom, the matter is somewhat doubtfull. But this is certaine, the greatest men of the City fearing lest indeede he meant some such thing, did hasten his departure as soone as they could possible, doing all other things according to his minde: and did assigne him such Associates in his charge of Generall, as he himselfe best liked. So in the end he departed with a Fleete of an hundred Gallies, and first of all he fell with the Isle of ANDROS, where he overcame by fight the Inhabitants of the said Isle, and certaine LACEDÆMONIANS that were amongst them: but he tooke not the City, which was one of the first matters his Enemies did accuse him for. For if ever man was overthrowne and envied for the estimation they had of his valour and sufficiency, truly Alcibiades was the man. For his notable and sundry services he had done, wonne him such estimation of wisdom and valiantnesse, that where he slackened in any service whatsoever, he was presently suspected, judging the ill successe not in that he could not, but for that he would not: and that where he undertooke any Enterprise, nothing could withstand or lye in his way. Hereupon the People perswading themselves, that immediately after his departure, they should heare that the Isle of CHIO was taken, with all the Countrey of IONIA, they were angry they could have no newes so suddenly from him as they looked for. Moreover, they did not consider the lacke of money he had, and specially making Warre with such Enemies, as were ever relieved with the great King of PERSIAES aide, and that for necessities sake he was sundry times driven to leave his Campe, to seeke money where he could get it, to pay his Souldiers, and to maintaine his Army. Now for testimony hereof, the last Accusation that was against him, was onely for this matter. Lyfander being sent by the LACEDÆMONIANS for Admirall and Generall of their Army by Sea, used such policy with Cyrus the King of PERSIAES brother, that he got into his hands a great summe of money: by meanes whereof he gave unto his Mariners foure Oboles a day for their Wages, where before they were wont to have but three, and yet Alcibiades had much ado to furnish his with three onely a day. For this cause, to get money, Alcibiades sailed unto CARIA. But in the meane time Antiochus, whom Alcibiades had left his Lieutenant behinde him, and had given him charge of all the Ships in his absence, being a very skilfull Sea-man, but otherwise a hasty harebraynd foole, and of small capacity: he being expressly commanded by Alcibiades not to fight in any case, though the Enemies offered him Battell, was so foolish rash, and made so little reckoning of his straight commandment, that he armed his owne Galley, whereof himselfe was Captaine, and other besides, and went to the City of EPHESUS, passing all along his Enemies Gallies, reviling and offering villany to those that stood upon the Hatches of their Gallies. Lyfander being marvelously provoked by these words, went and encountred him at the first with a few Shippes. The other Captaines of the Gallies of the ATHENIANS, seeing Antiochus in danger, went to aide him, one after another. Then Lyfander of his part also set out all his whole Fleete against him, and in the end overcame them: Antiochus selfe was killed in the conflict, and many Gallies and men were taken Prisoners: wherefore Lyfander set up shewes of triumph in token of victory. Alcibiades hearing this illfavoured newes, returned presently with all possible speede to SAMOS: and when he came thither, he went with all the rest of his Fleete to offer Lyfander battell. But Lyfander quietly contenting himselfe with his first Victory, went not out against him. Now this Victory was no sooner wonne, but one Thrafybulus the Sonne of Thrason, Alcibiades Enemy; went incontinently from the Campe, and got him to ATHENS, to accuse Alcibiades to the People: whom he informed how all went to wracke, and that he had lost many Ships, for that he regarded not his charge, carelessly putting men in trust, whom he gave too great credit to, because they were good fellows, and would drinke drunke with him, and were full of Mariners mocks and knavish jests, such as they use commonly amongst themselves. And that he in the meane time tooke his pleasure abroad, here and there, scraping money together where he could come by it, keeping good cheare, and feasting of the ABYDENIAN and IONIAN Curtizans, when the Enemies Army was so neare theirs as it was. Moreover, they laid to his charge, that he did fortifie a Cattle in the Countrey of THRACIA, neare unto the City BISANTHE, for a place to retire himselfe unto, either because he could not, or rather that he would not live any longer in his owne Countrey. Upon those accusations, the ATHENIANS giving credit to the report, did immediately choose new Captaines, and thereby declared their mistaking. Alcibiades hearing of this, and fearing lest they would do him some worse harme, did leave straight the ATHENIANS Campe, and gathering a certaine number of strangers together, went of himselfe to make Warre upon certaine free People of the THRACIANS, who were subject to no Prince nor State: where he got a marvellous masse of money together, by meanes whereof he did assure the GRECIANS inhabiting those marches, from all invasion of foraigne Enemies. Now Tydemus, and Menander, and Adimantus, the ATHENIANS Captaines, being afterwards in a place commonly called the Goates River, with all the Gallies the City of ATHENS had at that time upon the Coast: used every morning to go into the Sea, to offer Battell to Lyfander, who rode at

at Anker before the City of Lampsachus, with all the LACEDÆMONIANS Army by Sea, and commonly returned againe to the place from whence they came, in very ill order, without either watch or ward, as men that were carelesse of their Enemies. Alcibiades being on the Land not farre off, and finding their great fault and negligence, tooke his Horse, and went to them, and told them that they lay on an ill shoare, where there was no good rode, nor Towne, and where they were driven to seeke their Victuals, as far as to the City of SESTOS, and that they suffered their Mariners to leave their Shippes, and go aland when they lay at anker, stragling up and downe the Countrey as they would themselves, without regard that there lay a great Army of their Enemies before them, ready to be set out at the Generals commandment: and therefore he advised them to remove thence, and go to cast anker before the City of SESTOS. Howbeit the Captaines would not be advised by him: and that which was worit of all, Tydemus, one of the Captaines, stoutly commanded him to get him away, as one that had nothing to do with the matter, and that other had charge of the Army. Whereupon Alcibiades fearing they would purpose some Treason against him, did depart presently from them. And as he went his way, he said to some of his friends which accompanied him out of the Campe at his returne: that if the Captaines of the ATHENIANS had not beene so round with him, he would have forced the LACEDÆMONIANS to have come to battell in despite of their beards, or else he would have driven them to forsake their Shippes. Some tooke this for a glorious brag: other thought he was like enough to have done it, because he could have brought from Land a great number of THRACIANS, both Archers and Horsemen, with whom he might have given a charge upon the LACEDÆMONIANS, and done great mischief unto their Campe. But now, how wisely Alcibiades did foresee the faults he told the ATHENIANS Captaines of, their great misfortune and losse that followed incontinently, did too plainly witness it to the World. For Lyfander came so fiercely upon them on a sudden; that of all the Shippes that they had in their whole Fleete, onely eight Gallies were saved, with whom Conon fled: and the other being not much lesse then two hundred in number, were every one of them taken and carried away, with three thousand Prisoners, whom Lyfander put to death. Shortly after, he tooke the City selfe of ATHENS, and razed their long Walls even to the ground. After this great and notable Victory, Alcibiades fearing sore the LACEDÆMONIANS, who then without lett or interruption of any, were onely Lords and Princes by Sea and by Land: he went into the Countrey of BYTHINIA, and caused great Goods to be brought after him, and tooke a marvellous summe of money with him, besides great Riches he left also in the Castles of THRACIA, where he did remaine before. Howbeit he lost much of his Goods in BYTHINIA, which certaine THRACIANS dwelling in that Countrey, had robbed him of, and taken from him. So he determined to repaire forthwith unto King Araxerxes, hoping that when the King had once proved him, he should finde him a man of no lesse service, then he had found Themistocles before him: besides that the occasion of his going thither, should be much juster then his was: for he did not go thither, to make Warre against the City of ATHENS and his Countrey, as Themistocles did: but of a contrary intent, to make intercession to the King, that it would please him to aide them. Now Alcibiades thinking he could use no better meane then Pharnabazus helpe onely, to see him safely conducted to the Kings Court: he tooke his journey to him into the Countrey of PHRYGIA, where he abode a certaine time to attend upon him, and was very honourably entertained and received of Pharnabazus. All this while the ATHENIANS found themselves desolate, and in miserable state to see their Empire lost: but then much more, when Lyfander had taken away their Liberties, and set thirty Governours over their City. Now too late, after all was lost (where they might have recovered againe, if they had beene wise) they began together to bewaile and lament their miseries and wretched state, looking backe upon all their wilfull faults and follies committed: among which, they did reckon their second time of falling out with Alcibiades, was their greatest fault: for they banished him onely of malice and displeasure, not for any offence himselfe in person had committed against them, saving that his Lieutenant in his absence had shamefully lost a few of their Shippes: and they themselves more shamefully had driven out of their City, the noblest Souldier, and most skilfull Captaine that they had. And yet they had some little poore hope left, that they were not altogether cast away, so long as Alcibiades lived, and had his health. For before, when he was a forsaken man, and led a banished life, yet he could not live idly, and do nothing: wherefore now much more, said they to themselves, if there be any helpe at all, he will not suffer out of doubt the infolency and pride of the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor yet abide the cruelties and outrages of these thirty Tyrants. And surely the common People had some reason to have these thoughts in their heads, considering that the thirty Governours themselves did what they could possibly to spie out Alcibiades doings, and what he went about. Inomuch as Critias at the last, declared to Lyfander, that so long the LACEDÆMONIANS might reckon themselves Lords over all GREECE, as they kept from the common People the Rule and Authority of the City of ATHENS. And further he added, that notwithstanding the People of ATHENS could well away to live like Subjects under the Government of a few: yet Alcibiades whilest he lived, would never suffer them so to be reigned over, but would attempt by all device he could, to bring a change and innovation among them. Yet Lyfander would not credit these perswasions, before speciall commandment was sent to him.

from the Senate of LACEDÆMON, upon his Allegiance, that he should devise to kill Alcibiades by all meanes he could procure: either because in troth they feared the subtilty of his wit, and the greatnesse of his courage, to enterprife matters of great weight and danger, or else that they sought to gratifie King Agis by it. Lyfander being thus straightly commanded, did send and practise incontinently with Pharnabazus to execute the Fact: who gave his Brother Magamus, and his Uncle Sufamithres Commission to attempt the matter. Now was Alcibiades in a certaine Village of PHRYGIA, with a Concubine of his called Timandra. So he thought he dreamed one night that he had put on his Concubines Apparell, and how she dandling him in her armes, had dressed his head, frizeled his haire, and painted his face, as he had beene a woman. Other say, that he thought Magamus strake off his head, and made his body to be burnt: and the voyce goeth, this Vision was but a little before his death. Those that were sent to kill him, durst not enter the house where he was, but set it on fire round about. Alcibiades spying the fire, got such Apparell and Hangings as he had, and threw it on the fire, thinking to have put it out: and so casting his Cloake about his left arme, tooke his naked Sword in his other hand, and ranne out of the house, himselfe not once touched with fire, saving his clothes were a little singed. These murderers, so soone as they spied him, drew backe, and stoode asunder, and durst not one of them come neare him, to stand and fight with him: but asfarre off, they bestowed so many Arrowes and Darts on him, that they killed him there. Now when they had left him, Timandra went and tooke his body, which she wrapped up in the best Linen she had, and buried him as honourably as she could possiblie, with such things as she had, and could get together. Some hold opinion that Laïs, the onely famous Curtizan, which they say was of CORINTH (though indeede she was borne in a little Towne of SICILIA, called HICCARA, where she was taken, was his Daughter. Notwithstanding, touching the death of Alcibiades, there are some that agree to all the rest I have written, saving that they say, it was neither Pharnabazus, nor Lyfander, nor the LACEDÆMONIANS, which caused him to be slaine, but that he keeping with a young Gentlewoman of a Noble house, whom he had stolne away, and inticed to folly: her Brethren to revenge this injury, went to set fire upon the house where he was, and that they killed him as we have told you, thinking to leap out of the fire.

THE LIFE OF CAIUS MARTIUS CORIOLANUS.

THE House of the Martians at ROME was of the number of the Patricians, out of the which have sprung many noble personages, whereof Anacrus Martius was one, King Numa's Daughters Sonne, who was King of ROME after Tullus Hostilius. Of the same House were Publius and Quintus, who brought to ROME their best water they had by Conduits. Censorinus also came of that Family, that was so surnamed, because the People had chosen him Censor twice. Through whose perswasion they made a Law, that no man from thenceforth might require, or enjoy the Censorship twice. Caius Martius, whose Life we intend now to write, being left an Orphan by his Father, was brought up under his Mother a Widow, who taught us by experience, that Orphanage bringeth many discomforts to a Child, but doth not hinder him to become an honest man, and to excell in vertue above the common sort: as they that are meanly borne, wrongfully do complaine, that it is the occasion of their casting away, for that no man in their youth taketh any care of them to see them well brought up, and taught that were meete. This man also is a good prooffe to confirme some mens opinions: That a rare and excellent wit untaught, doth bring forth many good and evill things together: as a fat foyle that lieth unmannured bringeth forth both herbes and weedes. For this Martius naturall wit and great heart did marvellously stirre up his courage to do and attempt notable acts. But on the other side for lacke of education, he was so cholericke and impatient, that he would yeeld to no living creature: which made him churlish, uncivill, and altogether unfit for any mans conversation. Yet men marvelling much at his constancy, that he was never overcome with pleasure, nor money, and how he would endure easily all manner of paines and travels: thereupon they well liked and commended his stoutnesse and temperancy. But for all that, they could not be acquainted with him, as one Citizen useth to be with another in the City: his behaviour was so unpleasant to them by reason of a certaine insolent and sterne manner he had, which because he was too Lordly, was disliked. And to say truly, the greatest benefit that Learning bringeth unto men, is this: that it teacheth men that be rude and rough of nature, by compasse and rule of reason, to be civill and courteous, and to like better the meane state, then the higher. Now in those dayes, valiantnesse was honoured in ROME, above all other vertues: which they call virtus, by the name of vertue it selfe, as including in that generall name, all other speciall vertues besides. So that virtus in the Latine, was as much as valiantnesse. But Martius being more inclined to the Warres, then any other Gentleman of his time, began from his childhood to give himselfe to handle Weapons, and daily did exercise himselfe therein: and he esteemed outward Armour to no purpose, unlesse one were naturally armed within. Moreover, he did so exercise his body to hardnesse and all kinde of activity, seeing they were never a whit the better, nor more gently intreated, and that the Senate would give no eare to them, but made as though they had forgotten their former promise, and suffered them to be made Slaves and Bond-men to their Creditors; and besides, to be turned out of all that ever they had: they felt then even to stir rebellion and mutiny, and to stir up dangerous tumults within the City. The ROMANS Enemies hearing of this rebellion, did straight enter the Territories of ROME with a marvellous great Power, spoiling and burning all as they came. Whereupon the Senate immediately made open Proclamation by sound of Trumpet, That all those that were of lawfull age to carry Weapon, should come and enter their names into the Muster-masters Booke, to go to the Warres: but no man obeyed their commandement. Whereupon their chiefe Magistrates, and many of the Senate, began to be of divers opinions among themselves. For some thought it was reason, they should somewhat yeeld to the poore Peoples request, and that they should a little qualifie the severity of the Law. Other held hard against that opinion, and that was Marius for one. For he alledged that the Creditors losing their Money they had lent, was not the worst thing that was herein: but that the lenity that was favoured, was a beginning of disobedience, and that the proud attempt of the Commonalty, was to abolish Law, and to bring all to confusion. Therefore he said, if the Senate were wise, they should sometimes prevent and quench this ill favoured and worse meant beginning. The Senate met many daies in consultation about it: but in the end they concluded nothing. The poore common People seeing no redresse, gathered themselves one day together, and one encouraging another, they all forsooke the City, and encamped themselves upon a hill, called at that day the holy hill, along the River of Tiber, offering no creature any hurt or violence, or making any shew of actual rebellion, saving that they cried as they went up and downe, that the rich men had driven them out of the City, and that throughout all ITALY they might finde aire, water, and ground to bury them in. Moreover they said, to dwell at ROME was nothing else but to be flaine, or hurt with continuall Warres, and fighting for defence of the rich mens Goods. The Senate being afraid of their departure, did send unto them certaine of the pleasantest old men, and the most acceptable to the People among them. Of those Minimus Agrippa was he, who was sent for chiefe man of the Message from the Senate. He after many good perswasions and gentle requests made to the People, on the behalfe of the Senate, knit up his Oration in the end, with a notable tale, in this manner: That on a time all the Members of mans body did rebell against the belly, complaining of it, that it onely remained in the midst of the body, without doing any thing, neither did beare any labour to the maintenance of the rest: whereas all other parts and Members did labour painfully, and were very careful to satisfie the appetites and desires of the body. And so the belly, all this notwithstanding, laughed at their folly, and said: It is true, I first receive all meates that nourish mans body: but afterwards I send it againe to the nourishment of other parts of the same. Even so (quoth he) O you, my Masters, and Citizens of ROME, the reason is alike between the Senate and you. For matters being well digested, and their counsels thoroughly examined, touching the benefit of the Common-wealth, the Senators are cause of the common commodity that cometh unto every one of you. These perswasions pacified the People, conditionally, that the Senate would grant there should be yearly chosen five Magistrates, which they now call Tribuni plebis, whose Office should be to defend the poore People from violence and oppression. So Junius Brutus, and Sicinius Velutus, were the first Tribunes of the People that were chosen, who had onely bene the causers and procurers of this sedition. Hereupon the City being growne againe to good quiet and unity, the People immediately went to the Warres, shewing that they had a good will to do better then ever they did, and to be very willing to obey the Magistrates in that they would command, concerning the Warres. Marius also, though it liked him nothing to see the greatnesse of the People thus increased, considering it was to the prejudice and imbasing of the Nobility, and also saw that other noble Patricians were troubled as well as himselfe: he did perswade the Patricians, to shew themselves no lesse forward and willing to fight for their Country, then the common People were: and to let them know by their deeds and acts, that they did not so much passe the People in power and riches, as they did exceed them in true Nobility and valiantnesse. In the Country of the VOLSCES, against whom the ROMANS made Warre at that time, there was a principall City of most fame, that was called CORIOLES, before the which the Confull Cominius did lay siege. Wherefore all the other VOLSCES fearing lest that City should be taken by assault, they came from all parts of the Country to save it, intending to give the ROMANS battell before the City, and to give an onset on them in two severall places. The Confull Cominius understanding this, divided his Army also into two parts, and taking the one part with himselfe, he marched towards them that were drawing to the City out of the Country: and the other part of his Army he left in the Campe with Titus Latinius (one of the valiantest men the ROMANS had at that time) to resist those that would make any sallie out of the City upon them. So the CORIOLANS making small account of them that lay in Campe before the City, made a Sallie out upon them, in the which at the first the CORIOLANS had the better, and drove the ROMANS backe againe into the Trenches of their Camp. But Marius being there at that time running out of the Campe with a few men with him, he slew the first Enemies he met withall, and made the rest of them flay upon the fudden, crying out to the ROMANS that had turned their backs, and calling them againe to fight with a loud voice. For he was even such another, as Cato would have: Souldier and a Captaine to be, not onely terrible and fierce to lay about him, but to make the Enemy afraid with the sound of his voice, and grimmesse of his countenance. Then there flocked about him immediately, a great number of ROMANS: whereat the Enemies were so afraid, that they gave backe presently. But Martius not staying so, did chafe and follow them to their owne Gates, that fled for life. And there perceiving that the ROMANS retired backe, for the great number of Darts and Arrows which flew about their eares from the Walls of the City, and that there was not one man amongst them that durst venture himselfe to follow the flying Enemies into their City, for that it was full of men of Warre, very well armed and appointed, he did encourage his fellows with words and deeds, crying out to them, that fortune had opened the Gates of the City, more for the followers than the flyers. But all this notwithstanding, few had the hearts to follow him. Howbeit Martius being in the throng amongst the Enemies, thrust himselfe into the Gates of the City, and entered the same amongst them that fled, without that any one of them durst at the first turne their face upon him, or offer to stay him. But he looking about him, and seeing he was entred the City with very few men to helpe him, and perceiving he was environed by his Enemies that gathered round about him, did things as it is written, wonderfull and incredible, aswell for the force of his hand, as also for the agility of his body, and with a wonderfull courage and valiantnesse he made a lane through the midst of them, and overthrew also those he layed at: that some he made runne to the furthest part of the City, and other for feare he made yeeld themselves, and to let fall their weapons before him. By this meanes, Martius that was gotten out, had some leisure to bring the ROMANS with more safety into the City. The City being taken in this sort, the most part of the Souldiers began incontinently to spoile, to carry away, and to looke up the booty they had wonne. But Martius was marvellous angry with them, and cried out on them, that it was no time now to looke after spoile, and to runne fragling here and there to enrich themselves, whilst the other Confull and their fellow Citizens peradventure were fighting with their Enemies: and how that leaving the spoile, they should seeke to winde themselves out of danger and perill. Howbeit, cry and say to them what he could, very few of them would hearken to him. Wherefore taking those that willingly offered themselves to follow him, he went out of the City, and tooke his way toward that part, where he understood the rest of the Army was, exhorting and intreating them by the way that followed him, not to be faint-hearted; and oft holding up his hands to Heaven, he besought the gods to be gracious and favourable unto him, that he might come in time to the Battell, and in a good houre to hazard his life in defence of his Countrey-men. Now the ROMANS when they were put in battell ray, and ready to take their Targets on their armes, and to gird them upon their arming Coats, had a custome to make their Wills at that very instant, without any manner of writing, naming him onely whom they would make their Heire in the presence of three or foure Witnesses. Martius came juit to that reckoning, whilst the Souldiers were doing after that sort, and that the Enemies were approached so neare, as one tooke in view of the other. When they saw him at his first coming all bloody, and in a sweate, and but with a few men following him: some thereupon began to be afraid. But soone after, when they saw him runne with a lively cheere to the Confull, and to take him by the hand, declaring how he had taken the City of CORIOLES, and that they saw the Confull Cominius also kisse and embrace him: then there was not a man but tooke heart againe to him, and began to be of good courage, some hearing him report from point to point, the happy successe of this Exploit, and other also conjecturing it by seeing their gestures asfarre off. Then they all began to call upon the Confull to march forward, and to delay no longer, but to give charge upon the Enemy. Martius asked him how the order of their Enemies Battell was, and on which side they had placed their best fighting men. The Confull made him answer, that he thought the Bands which were in the vaward of their Battell, were those of the ANTIATES, whom they esteemed to be the warlikest men, and which for valiant courage would give no place, to any of the Host of their Enemies. Then prayed Martius, to be set directly against them. The Confull granted him, greatly praising his courage. Then Martius, when both Armies came almost to joyne, advanced himselfe a good space before his Company, and went so fiercely to give charge on the vaward that came right against him, that they could stand no longer in his hands: he made such a lane through them, and opened a passage into the Battell of the Enemies. But the two Wings of either side turned one to the other, to compasse him in betweene them: which the Confull Cominius perceiving, he sent thither straight of the best Souldiers he had about him. So the Battell was marvellous bloody about Martius, and in a very short space many were slaine in the place. But in the end the ROMANS were so strong, that they distressed the Enemies, and brake their array: and scattering them, made them flye. Then they prayed Martius that he would retire to the Campe, because they saw he was able to do no more, he was already so wearied with the great paine he had taken, and so faint with the great wounds he had upon him. But Martius answered them, that it was not for Conquerors to yeeld, nor to be faint-hearted: and thereupon began afresh to chafe those that fled, untill such time as the Army of the Enemies was utterly overthrowne, and numbers of them slaine and taken Prisoners. The next morning betimes, Martius went to the Confull, and the other ROMANS with him. There the Confull Cominius going up to his Chaire of State, in the presence of the whole Army, gave thanks to the gods for so great, glorious, and prosperous a Victory: then he spake to Martius, whose valiantnesse he commended beyond the Moone, both for that he himselfe saw him do with his eyes, as also for that Martius had reported unto him. So in the end he willed Martius, that he should choose out of all the Horses they had taken of their Enemies, and of all their Goods they had wonne (whereof there was great store) tenne of every sort which he liked best, before any distribution should be made to other. Besides this great honourable offer he had made him, he gave him in testimony that he had wonne that day day the price of prowesse above all other, a goodly Horse with a Capparison, and all Furniture to him: which the whole Army beholding, did marvellously praise and commend. But Martius stepping forth, told the Confull, he most thankfully accepted the gift of his Horse, and was a glad man besides, that his service had deserved his Generals commendation: and as for his other offer, which was rather a mercenary reward, then an honourable recompence, he would have none of it, but was contented to have his equall part with the other Souldiers. Onely this grace (said he) I crave and beseech you to grant me: Among the VOLSCES there is an old friend and Hoste of mine, an honest wealthy man, and now a Prisoner, who living before in great wealth in his owne Countrey, liveth now a poore prisoner, in the hands of his Enemies: and yet notwithstanding all this his misery and misfortune, it would do me great pleasure if I could save him from this one danger, to keep him from being sold as a Slave. The Souldiers hearing Martius words, made a marvellous great shout among them, and there were more that wondered at his great contentation and abstinence, when they saw so little covetousnesse in him, then they were that highly praised and extolled his valiantnesse. For even they themselves that did somewhat malice and envie his glory, to see him thus honoured and passingly praised, did thinke him so much the more worthy of an honourable recompence for his valiant service, as the more carelessly he refused the great offer made unto him for his profit: and they esteemed more the vertue that was in him, that made him refuse such rewards, then that which made them to be offered to him, as unto a worthy person. For it is farre more commendable, to use Riches well, then to be valiant: and yet it is better not to desire them then to use them well. After this shout and noise of the Assembly was somewhat appeased, the Confull Cominius began to speak in this sort. We cannot compell Martius to take these Gifts we offer him if he will not receive them, but we will give him such a reward for the noble service he hath done, as he cannot refuse. Therefore we do order and decree, that henceforth he be called Coriolanus, unlesse his valiant acts have wonne him that name before our nomination. And so ever since, he still bare the third name of Coriolanus. And thereby it appeareth, that the first name the ROMANS have, as Caius, was as our Christian name now. The second, as Martius, was the name of the House and Family they came of. The third, was some addition given, either for some act or notable service, or for some marke on their face, or of some shape of their body, or else for some speciall vertue they had. Even so did the GRECIANS in old time give additions to Princes, by reason of some notable act worthy memory. As when they have called some, Soter and Callinicos, as much to say as Saviour and Conqueror. Or else of some notable apparent marke on ones face, or on his body, they have called him Phiscon and Grypos: as ye would say, gorebelly, and hooke-nosed; or else for some vertue, as Euergetes, and Philadelphes, to wit, a Benefactor, and lover of his brethren. Or otherwise for ones great felicity, as Eudemon: as much to say, as fortunate. For so was the second of the * Battes surnamed. And some Kings have had surnames of jest and mockery. As one of the Antigones that was called Dofon, to say, the Giver: who was ever promising, and never giving. And one of the Ptolomees was called Lamyros: to say, conceitive. The ROMANS use more then any other Nation, to give names of mockery in this sort. As there was one Metellus surnamed Diadematus, the banded, because he carried a bande about his head of long time, by reason of a sore he had in his forehead. One other of his owne Family was called Celer, the quicke Flie, because a few daies after the death of his Father, he shewed the People the cruell fight of Fencers at unrebated Swords, which they found wonderfull for the shortnesse of time. Other had their Surnames derived of some accident at their birth: As to this day they call him Proculcius, that is borne, his Father being in some far voyage: and him Posthumus, that is borne after the death of his Father. And when of two Brethren twins, the one doth die, and the other surviveth: they call the survivor, Vopiscus. Sometimes also they give surnames derived of some marke or misfortune of the body: as Sylla, to say, crooked nosed: Niger, blacke: Rufus, red: Cacius, blinde: Clandus, lame. They did wisely in this thing to accustom men to thinke, that neither the losse of their fight, nor other such misfortunes as may chance to men, are any shame or disgrace unto them, but the manner was to answer boldly to such names, as if they were called by their proper names. Howbeit these matters would be better amplified in other Stories then this. Now when this Warre was ended, the flatterers of the People began to stir up sedition againe, without any new occasion, or just matter offered of complaint. For they did ground this second insurrection against the Nobility and Patricians, upon the Peoples misery and misfortune, that could not but fall out, by reason of the former discord and sedition betweene them and the Nobility. Because the most part of the arable Land within the Territory of ROME, was become heathy and barren for lack of ploughing, for that they had no time nor meane to cause Corne to be brought them out of other Countreys to sow, by reason of their Warres which made the extreme dearth they had among them. Now those busie prattlers that sought the Peoples good will by such flattering words, perceiving great scarcity of Corne to be within the City, and though there had been plenty enough, yet the common People had no money to buy it: they spread abroad false tales and rumours against the Nobility, that they in revenge of the People, had practised and procured the extreme dearth among them. Furthermore, in the midst of this stir, there came Ambassadors to ROME from the City of VELITRES, that offered up their City to the ROMANS, and prayed them they would send new Inhabitants to replenish the same: because the plague had bin so extreme among them, and had killed such a number of them, as there was not left alive the tenth person of the people that had bin there before. So the wife men of ROME began to thinke, that the necessity of the VELITRIANS fell out in a most happy hour, & how by this occasion it was very meet in so great a scarcity of victuals,

Rome by rea-

Volscires made a Colony to Rome. Two praefices to remove the sedition at Rome. Sicinius and Brutus Tribunes of the People, against both thole devices.

Coriolanus invadeth the Antiates, and bringeth rich spoiles home.

The manner of suing for office at Rome.

to disburden ROME of a great number of Citizens : and by this meane as well to take away this new sedition, and utterly to rid it out of the City, as also to cleare the same of many mutinous and seditious persons, being the superfluous ill humours that grievously fed this disease. Hereupon the Consuls prick out all thole by a Bill, whom they intended to send to VALITRES, to go dwell there as in forme of a Colony : and they leaved out all the rest that remained in the City of ROME, a great number to go against the VOLSCES, hoping by the meane of foraigne Warre, to pacifie their sedition at home. Moreover they imagined, when the poore with the rich, and the meane fort with the Nobility, should by this device be abroad in the Warres, and in one Campe, and in one Service, and in one like danger : that then they would be more quiet and loving together. But Sicinius and Brutus, two seditious Tribunes, spake against either of these devices, and cried out upon the Noblement, that under the gentle name of a Colony, they would cloake and cover the most cruell and unnatural fact as might be : because they sent their poore Citizens into a fore infected City and pestilent aire, full of dead bodies infected his People. This were (said they) even as much, as if the Senate should had so cruelly persecuted his People. This were (said they) even as much, as if the Senate should headlong cast downe the People into a most bottomlesse pit. And are not yet contented to have famished some of the poore Citizens heretofore to death, and to put other of them even to the mercy of the plague : but aresh they have procured a voluntary Warre, to the end they would leave behinde no kinde of misery and ill, wherewith the poore silly People should not be plagued, and onely because they are weary to serve the rich. The common People being set on a broile and bravery with these words, would not appeare when the Consuls called their names by a Bill, to prest them for the Warres, neither would they be sent out to this new Colony : infomuch as the Senate knew not well what to say or to do in the matter. Martius then, who was now grown to great credit, and a stout man besides, and of great reputation with the noblest men of ROME, rose up, and openly spake against these flattering Tribunes. And for the replenishing of the City of VALITRES, he did compell those that were chosen to go thither, and to depart the City, upon great penalties to him that should disobey : but to the Warres, the People by no meanes would be brought or contrained. So Martius taking his friends and followers with him, and such as he could by faire words in that to go with him, did runne certaine forreys into the Dominion of the ANTIANES, where he met with great plenty of Corne, and had a marvellous great spoile, as well of Cattell as of men he had taken Prisoners, whom he brought away with him, and reserved nothing for himselfe. Afterwards, having brought backe againe all his men that went out with him, safe and sound to ROME, and every man rich and laden with spoile : then the home-tarriers and house-doves that kept ROME still, began to repent them that it was not their hap to go with him, and so envied both them that had sped so well in this journey, and also of malice to Martius, they spited to see his credit and estimation increase still more and more, because they accounted him to be a great hinderer of the People. Shortly after this, Martius stood for the Consulship : and the common People favoured his sute, thinking it would be a shame to them to deny and refuse the chieftest Noblemen of bloud, and most worthy person of ROME, and specially him that had done so great service and good to the Common-wealth. For the custome of ROME was at that time, that such as did sue for any Office, should for certaine dayes before be in the Market-place, onely with a poore Gowne on their backs, and without any Coate underneath, to pray the Citizens to remember them at the day of election : which was thus devised, either to move the People the more, by requesting them in such meane Apparell, or else because they might shew them their wounds they had gotten in the Warres in the service of the Common-wealth, as manifest markes and testimonies of their valiantnesse. Now it is not to be thought, that the suters went thus loose in a simple Gowne in the Market-place, without any Coate under it, for feare, and suspicion of the common People : for Offices of dignity in the City were not then given by favour or corruption. It was but of late time, and long after this, that buying and selling fell out in election of Officers, and that the voyces of the Electors were bought for money. But after corruption had once gotten way into the election of Offices, it hath run from man to man, even to the very sentence of Judges, and also among Captaines in the Warres : so as in the end, that onely turned Common-wealths into Kingdoms, by making Armes subject to Money. Therefore methinks he had reason that said : He that first made Banquets, and gave Money to the common People, was the first that tooke away Authority, and destroyed Common-wealths. But this Pestilence crept in by little and little, and did secretly winne ground still, continuing a long time in ROME, before it was openly knowne and discovered. For no man can tell who was the first man that bought the Peoples voyces for Money, nor that corrupted the sentence of the Judges. Howbeit at ATHENS some hold opinion, that Antisthenes, the Sonne of Anthemion, was the first that fed the Judges with Money, about the end of the Warres of PELOPONNESUS, being accused of Treason for yielding up the Fort of PYLE at that time, when the golden and unfoiled age remained yet whole in judgement at ROME. Now Martius following this custome, shewed many wounds and cuts upon his body, which he had received in seventene yeares service at the Warres, and in many sundry Battels, being ever the foremost man that did set out feete to fight. So that there was not a man among the People, but was ashamed of himselfe, to refuse so valiant a man : and one of them said to another, we must needs chooſe him Consull, there is no remedy. But when the day of election was come, and that Martius came to the Market-place with great pompe, accompanied with all the Senate and the whole Nobility of the City about him, who fought to make him Consull, with the greatest instance and intreaty they could, or ever attempted for any man or matter : then the love and good will of the common People turned straight to an hate and envie toward him, fearing to put this Office of Sovereigne Authority into his hands, being a man somewhat partiall towards the Nobility, and of great credit and Authority amongst the Patricians, and as one they might doubt would take away altogether the liberty from the People. Whereupon for these considerations, they refused Martius in the end, and made two other that were Suters, Consuls. The Senate being marvellously offended with the People, did account the shame of this refusal, rather to redound to themselves then to Martius : but Martius tooke it in far worse part then the Senate, and was out of all patience. For he was a man too full of passion and choler, and too much given over to selfe-will and opinion, as one of a high minde and great courage, that lacked the gravity and affability that is gotten with judgement of Learning and reason, which onely is to be looked for in a Governour of State : and that remembered not how wilfulnesse is the thing of the World, which a Governour of a Common-wealth for pleasing should shunne, being that which Plato called Solitarinesse. As in the end, all men that are wilfully given to a selfe-opinion and obstinate minde, and who will never yeeld to others reason, but to their owne, neede have patience, which luffy blouds make but a mocke at. So Martius being a stout man of nature, that never yeelded in any respect, as one thinking that to overcome alwaies, and to have the upper hand in all matters, was a token of magnanimity, and of no base and faint courage, which spitteth out anger from the most weake and passioned part of the heart, much like the matter of an imposthume : went home to his house, full fraught with spite and malice against the People, being accompanied with all the lustiest young Gentlemen, whose mindes were nobly bent, as those that came of noble race, and commonly used for to follow and honor him. But then specially they flockt about him, and kept him company to his much harme, for they did but kindle and inflame his choler more and more, being sorry with him for the injury the People offered him, because he was their Capitaine and Leader to the Warres, that taught them all Martiall Discipline, and stirred up in them a noble emulation of honor and valiantnesse, and yet without envie, praising them that deserved best. In the meane season, there came great plenty of Corne to ROME, that had beene bought, part in ITALY, and part was sent out of SICILE, as given by Gelon the Tyrant of SYRACUSA : so that many stode in great hope, that the dearth of Victuals being holpen, the civill diffention would also cease. The Senate fate in Councell upon it immediately, the common People stode also about the Palace where the Councell was kept, gazing what resolution would fall out : perswading themselves that the Corne they had bought should be sold good cheape, and that which was given should be divided by the poll, without paying any penny, and the rather, because certaine of the Senators amongst them did so wish and perswade the same. But Martius standing upon his feete, did somewhat sharply take up those who went about to gratifie the People therein : and called them People-pleasers, and Traytors to the Nobility. Moreover he said, they nourished against themselves, the naughty seede and cockle of "infoleny and sedition, which had beene sowed and scattered abroad amongst the People, which they "should have cut off, if they had beene wise, in their growth : and not (to their owne destruction) "have suffered the People, to establish a Magistrate for themselves, of so great Power and Authority, as that man had, to whom they had granted it. Who was also to be feared, because he obtained what he would, and did nothing but what he listed, neither passed for any obedience to the Consuls, but lived in all liberty, acknowledging no superiour to command him, saving the onely heads and authors of their faction, whom he called his Magistrates. Therefore said he, they that gave counsell, and perswaded that the Corne should be given out to the common People gratis, as they used to do in the Cities of GRECE, where the People had more absolute Power, did but only "nourish their disobedience, which would breake out in the end, to the utter ruine and overthrow of the whole State. For they will not think it is done in recompence of their service past, sithence they know well enough they have so oft refused to go to the Warres, when they were commanded : neither for their mutinies when they went with us, whereby they have rebelled and forsaken their Country : neither for their accusations which their flatterers have preferred unto them, and they have received, and made good against the Senate : but they will rather judge, we give and grant them this, as abasing our selves, and standing in feare of them, and glad to flatter them every way. By this meane their disobedience will still grow worse and worse : and they will never leave to practise new sedition and uprores. Therefore it were a great folly for us, methinks, to do it : yea, shall I say more ? we should if we were wise, take from them their Tribuneship, which most manifestly is the embasing of the Consulship, and the cause of the division of the City. The state whereof as it standeth, is not now as it was wont to be, but cometh difmembred in two factions, "which maintaines alwaies civill diffention and discord betweene us, and will never suffer us againe to be united into one body. Martius dilating the matter with many such like reasons, wonne all the young men, and almost all the rich men to his opinion : infomuch as they rang it out, that he was the onely man, and alone in the City, who stood out against the People, and never flattered them. There were onely a few old men that spake against him, fearing lest some mischief might fall out upon it, as indeed there followed no great good afterward. For the Tribunes of the People being present at this consultation of the Senate, when they saw that the opinion of Martius was confirmed with the more voyces, they left the Senate, and went downe to the People, crying out for helpe, and that they would assemble to save their Tribunes. Hereupon the People ranne on head in tumult together, before whom the words that Martius spake in the Senate were openly reported : which the People so stomacked, that even in that fury they were ready to flie upon the whole Senate.

But

But the Tribunes laid all the fault and burthen wholly upon Martius, and sent their Serjeants forthwith to arrest him, presently to appeare in person before the People, to answer the words he had spoken in the Senate. Martius stoutly withstood these Officers that came to arrest him. Then the Tribunes in their owne persons, accompanied with the Ædiles, went to fetch him by force, and so laid violent hands upon him. Howbeit the noble Patricians gathering together about him, made the Tribunes give back, and laid fore upon the Ædiles: so for that time, the night parted them, and the tumult appeased. The next morning betimes, the Consuls seeing the People in an uprore, running to the Market-place out of all parts of the City, they were afraid lest all the City would together by the eares: wherefore assembling the Senate in all haste, they declared how it stood thereupon, to appease the fury of the People, with some gentle words, or gratefull Decrees in their favour: and moreover, like wise men they should consider, it was now no time to stand at defence and in contention, nor yet to fight for honour against the Commonalty, they being fallen to so great an extremity, and offering such imminent danger. Wherefore they were to consider temperately of things, and to deliver some present and gentle pacification. The most part of the Senators that were present at this Councell, thought this opinion best, and gave their contents unto it. Whereupon the Consuls rising out of Councell, went to speake unto the People as gently as they could, and they did pacifie their fury and anger, purging the Senate of all the unjust accusations laid upon them, and used great modesty in periwading them, and also in reproving the faults they had committed. And as for the rest, that touched the sale of Corne, they promised there should be no disliking offered them in the price. So the most part of the People being pacified, and appearing so plainly by the great silence that was among them, as yeelding to the Consuls, and liking well of their words: the Tribunes then of the People rose out of their leates, and said: Forasmuch as the Senate yeelded unto reason, the People also for their part, as became them, did likewise give place unto them: but notwithstanding, they would that Martius should come in person to answer to the Articles they had devised. First, whether he had not solicited and procured the Senate to change the present state of the Common-weale, and to take the Sovereigne Authority out of the Peoples hands. Next, when he was sent for by Authority of their Officers, why he did contemptuously resist and disobey. Lastly, seeing he had driven and beaten the Ædiles into the Market-place before all the World: if in doing this, he had not done as much as in him lay, to raise Civill Warres, and to set one Citizen against another. All this was spoken to one of these two ends, either that Martius against his nature should be constrained to humble himselfe, and to abase his haughty and fierce minde: or else if he continued still in his stoutnesse, he should incur the Peoples displeasure and ill will so farre, that he should never possibly winne them againe. Which they hoped would rather fall out so, then otherwise: as indeed they guessed unhappily, considering Martius nature and disposition. So Martius came and presented himselfe to answer their Accusations against him, and the People held their peace, and gave attentive eare, to heare what he would say. But where they thought to have heard very humble and lowly words come from him, he began not onely to use his wonted boldnesse of speaking (which of it selfe was very rough and unpleasant, and did more aggravate his accusation, then purge his innocency) but also gave himselfe in his words to thunder, and looke therewithall so grimly, as though he made no reckoning of the matter. This stirred coales among the People, who were in wonderfull fury at it, and their hate and malice grew so toward him, that they could hold no longer, beare, nor indure his bravery and carelesse boldnesse. Whereupon Sicinius, the cruellest and stoutest of the Tribunes, after he had whispered a little with his companions, did openly pronounce in the face of all the People, Martius as condemned by the Tribunes to die. Then presently he commanded the Ædiles to apprehend him, and carry him straight to the Rock Tarpeian, and to cast him headlong downe the same. When the Ædiles came to lay hands upon Martius to do that they were commanded, divers of the People themselves thought it too cruell and violent a deede. The Noblemen being much troubled to see so much force and rigour used, began to crie aloud; Helpe Martius: so those that laid hands on him being rapulsed, they compassed him in round among themselves, and some of them holding up their hands to the People, besought them not to handle him thus cruelly. But neither their words nor crying out could ought prevaile, the tumult and hurly burly was so great, untill such time as the Tribunes owne friends and kinsmen weighing with themselves the impossibility to convey Martius to execution, without great slaughter and murder of the Nobility: did perswade and advise not to proceede in so violent and extraordinary a sort, as to put such a man to death, without lawfull processe in Law, but that they should referre the sentence of his death, to the free voyce of the People. Then Sicinius bethinking himselfe a little, did aske the Patricians for what cause they tooke Martius out of the Officers hands that went to do execution? The Patricians answered him againe, why they would of themselves so cruelly and wickedly put to death, so noble and valiant a Roman as Martius was, and that without Law and Justice? Well then, said Sicinius, if that be the matter, let there be no quarrell or dissention against the People: for they do grant to your demand, that his Cause should be heard according to the Law. Therefore, said he to Martius, we do will and charge you to appeare before the People, the third day of our next sitting and assembly here, to make your purgation for such Articles as shall be objected against you, that by free voyce the People may give sentence upon you as shall please them. The Noblemen were glad then of the adjournment, and were much pleased they had gotten Martius out of their danger. In the meane space, before the third day of their next Session came about, the same being kept every ninth day continually at Rome, whereupon they call it now in Latine, Nundina: here

there fell out Warre against the ANTIATES, which gave some hope to the Nobility, that this adjournment would come to little effect, thinking that this Warre would hold them so long, as that the fury of the People against him would be well swaged, or utterly forgotten, by reason of the trouble of the Warres. But contrary to expectation, the peace was concluded presently with the ANTIATES, and the People returned againe to Rome. Then the Patricians assembled oftentimes together, to consult how they might stand to Martius, and keepe the Tribunes from occasion to cause the People to mutiny againe, and rise against the Nobility. And there Appius Claudius (one that was taken ever as an heave enemy to the People) did avow and protest, that they would utterly abase the Authority of the Senate, and destroy the Common-weale, if they would suffer the common People to have Authority by voyces to give judgement against the Nobility. On the other side againe, the most ancient Senators, and such as were given to favour the common People, said: That when the People should see they had Authority of life and death in their hands, they would not be so cruell and fierce, but gentle and civil. More also, that it was not for contempt of Nobility or the Senate, that they sought to have the Authority of Justice in their hands, as a preeminence and prerogative of honour: but because they feared, that themselves should be contemned and hated of the Nobility: So as they were perswaded, that so soone as they gave them Authority to judge by voyces, they would leave all envie and malice to condemne any. Martius seeing the Senate in great doubt how to resolve, partly for the love and good will the Nobility did beare him, and partly for the feare they stood in of the People: asked aloud of the Tribunes, what matter they would burden them with? The Tribunes answered him, that they would shew how he did aspire to be King, and would prove that all his actions tended to usurpe tyrannicall power over Rome. Martius with that, rising up on his feete, said: That thereupon he did willingly offer himselfe to the People, to be tried upon that Accusation: and that if it were proved by him, he had so much as once thought of any such matter, that he would then refuse no kinde of punishment they would offer him: Conditionally (quoth he) that you charge me with nothing else beside, and that ye do not also abuse the Senate. They promised they would not. Under these Conditions the Judgement was agreed upon, and the People assembled. And first of all the Tribunes would in any case (whatsoever became of it) that the People should proceede to give their voyces by Tribes, and not by hundreds: for by this meanes the multitude of the poore needy People (and all such rabble as had nothing to lose, and had lesse regard of honesty before their eyes) came to be of greater force (because their voyces were numbered by the polle) then the noble honest Citizens, whose Persons and Purse did dutifully serve the Common-weale in their Warres. And then when the Tribunes saw they could not prove he went about to make himselfe King, they began to broach afresh the former words that Martius had spoken in the Senate, in hindering the distribution of the Corne at meane price unto the common People, and perswading also to take the Office of Tribuneship from them. And for the third, they charged him anew, that he had not made the common distribution of the Spoile he had gotten in the invading the Territories of the ANTIATES: but had of his owne Authority divided it among them, who were with him in that journey. But this matter was most strange of all to Martius, looking least to have bene burdened with that, as with any matter of offence. Whereupon being burdened on the sudden, and having no ready excuse to make even at that instant: he began to fall a praising of the Souldiers that had served with him in that journey. But those that were not with him, being the greater number, cried out so loud, and made such a noise that he could not be heard. To conclude, when they came to tell the voyces of the Tribes, there were three voyces odde, which condemned him to be banished for ever. After declaration of the Sentence, the People made such joy, as they never rejoyced more for any Battell they had wonne upon their Enemies, they were so brave and lively, and went home so joyously from the Assembly, for triumph of this sentence. The Senate againe in contrary manner were as sadde and heave, repenting themselves beyond measure, that they had not rather determined to have done and suffered any thing whatsoever, before the common People should so arrogantly and outrageously have abused their Authority. There needed no difference of Garments I warrant you, nor outward shewes to know a Plebeian from a Patrician, for they were easily discerned by their looks. For he that was on the Peoples side, looked cheerfully on the matter: but he that was sadde, and hung downe his head, he was sure of the Noblemens side. Saving Martius alone, who neither in his countenance nor in his gate, did ever shew himselfe abashed, or once let fall his great courage: but he onely of all other Gentlemen that were angry at his fortune, did outwardly shew no manner of passion, nor care at all of himselfe. Not that he did patiently beare and temper his evil hap, in respect of any reason he had, or by his quiet condition: but because he was so carried away with the vehemency of anger, and desire of revenge, that he had no sense nor feeling of the hard state he was in, which the common People judge not to be sorrow, although indeede it be the very same. For when sorrow (as you would say) is set on fire, then it is converted into spite and malice, and driveth away for that time all faintnesse of heart and naturall feare. And this is the cause why the cholerick man is so altered and mad in his actions, as a man set on fire with a burning ague: for when a mans heart is troubled within, his pulse will beate marvellously strongly. Now that Martius was even in that taking, it appeared true soone after by his doings. For when he was come home to his house againe, and had taken his leave of his Mother and Wife, finding them weeping and shrieking out for sorrow, and had also comforted and perswaded them to be content with his chance: he went immediately to the Gate of the City, accom-

the ROMANES will be the last that will end it. Incontinently upon the returne of the VOLSCES Ambassadors, and delivery of the ROMANES answer, Tullus caused an Assembly generall to be made of the VOLSCES, and concluded to make Warre upon the ROMANES. This done, Tullus did counsell them to take Martius into their service, and not to mistrust him for the remembrance of any thing past, but boldly to trust him in any matter to come: for he would do them more service in fighting for them, then ever he did them displeasure in fighting against them. So Martius was called forth, who spake so excellently in the presence of them all, that he was thought no lesse eloquent in tongue, then warlike in shew: and declared himselfe both expert in Warres, and wise with valiantnelte. Thus he was joyned in Commiſſion with Tullus as General of the VOLSCES, having absolute Authority betwene them to follow and pursue the Warres. But Martius tearing left tract of time to bring this Army together with all the Munition and Furniture of the VOLSCES, would robbe him of the meane he had to execute his purpose and intent, lett order with the Rulers and chiefe of the City, to assemble the rest of their power, and to prepare all necessary provision for the Campe. Then he with the lightest Souldiers he had, and that were willing to follow him, stole away upon the sudden, and marched with all speed, and entered the Territories of ROME, before the ROMANES heard any newes of his coming. Inſomuch as the VOLSCES found such spoile in the fields, as they had more then they could spend in their Campe, and were weary to drive and carry away that they had. Howbeit the game of the spoile, and the hurt they did to the ROMANES in this invasion, was the least part of his intent: for his chieftest purpose was, to increase the malice and diffention betwene the Nobility and the Commonalty: and to draw that on, he was very carefull to keepe the Nobles Lands and Goods safe from harme and burning, but spoiled all the whole Countrey besides, and would suffer no man to take or hurt any thing of the Noblemens. This made greater furre and broyle betwene the Nobility and the People, then was herore. For the Noblemen fell out with the People, because they had so unjustly punished a man of so great valour and power. The People on the other side, accused the Nobility, how they had procured Martius to make these Warres to be revenged of them: because it pleased them to see their Goods burnt and spoiled before their eyes, whilst themselves were well at ease, and did behold the Peoples losses and misfortunes, knowing their owne Goods safe and out of danger: and how the Warre was not made against the Noblemen, that had the Enemy abroad, to keepe that they had in safety. Now Martius having done his first exploit, (which made the VOLSCES bolder, and lesse fearfull of the ROMANES) brought home all the Army againe, without losse of any man. After their whole Army (which was marvellous great, and very forward to service) was assembled in one Campe, they agreed to leave part of it for Garrison in the Countrey about, and the other part should go on, and make the Warre upon the ROMANES. So Martius bade Tullus chiole, and take which of the two charges he liked best. Tullus made him answer, he knew by experience that Martius was no lesse valiant then himselfe, and how he ever had better fortune and good hap in all Battels, then himselfe had. Therefore he thought it best for him to have the leading of those that would make the Warres abroad, and himselfe would keepe home, to provide for the safety of the Cities of his Countrey, and to furnish the Campe also of all necessary Provision abroad. So Martius being stronger then before, went first of all unto the City of CERCEES, inhabited by the ROMANES, who willingly yielded themselves, and therefore had no hurt. From thence he entered the Countrey of the LATINES, imagining the ROMANES would fight with him there to defend the LATINES, who were their confederates, and had many times sent unto the ROMANES for their aide. But on the one side, the People of ROME were very ill willing to go: and on the other side, the Consuls being upon going out of their Office, would not hazard themselves for so small a time: so that the Ambassadors of the LATINES returned home againe, and did no good. Then Martius did besiege their Cities, and having taken by force the Towne of the TOLERINIANS, VICANIANS, PEDANIANS, and the BOLANIANS, who made resistance, he lacked all their Goods, and tooke them prisoners. Such as did yield themselves willingly unto him, he was as carefull as possible might be, to defend them from hurt: and because they should receive no damage by his will, he removed his Campe as far from their Confines as he could. Afterwards, he tooke the City of BOLES by assault, being about an hundred furlong from ROME, where he had a marvellous great spoile, and put every man to the sword that was able to carry Weapon. The other VOLSCES that were appointed to remaine in Garrison for defence of their Countrey, hearing this good newes, would tarry no longer at home, but armed themselves, and ranne to Martius Campe, saying they did acknowledge no other Capitaine but him. Hereupon his fame ranne through all ITALY, and every one praised him for a valiant Capitaine, for that by change of one man for another, such and so strange events fell out in the State. In this while, all went still to wracke at ROME. For to come into the field to fight with the Enemy, they could not abide to heare of it, they were one so much against another, and full of sedition words, the Nobility against the People, and the People against the Nobility. Untill they had intelligence at the length, that the Enemies had laid siege to the City of LAVINIUM, in the which were all the Temples and Images of their gods their Protectors, and from whence came first their ancient Originall, for that Æneas at his first arrivall into ITALY did build that City. Then fell there out a marvellous sudden change of minde among the People, and farre more strange and contrary in the Nobility. For the People thought it good to repeale the condemnation and exile of Martius. The Senate assembled upon it, would in no case yeeld to that: who either did it of a felie-will to be contrary to the Peoples desire: or because Martius should not returne

thorow the grace and favour of the People. Or else, because they were thoroughly angry and offended with him, that he would set upon the whole, being offended but by a few, and in his doings would shew himselfe an open Enemy besides unto his Countrey: notwithstanding the most part of them tooke the wrong they had done him, in marvellous ill part, and as if the injury had beene done unto themselves. Report being made of the Senates resolution, the People found themselves in a straight: for they could authorize and confirme nothing by their voyces, unlesse it had beene first propounded and ordained by the Senate. But Martius hearing this stirre about him, was in a greater rage with them then before: inſomuch as he raised his Siege incontinently before the City of LAVINIUM, and going towards ROME, lodged his Campe within forty furlong of the City, at the Ditches called Cluſilia. His incamping so neere ROME, did put all the whole City in a wonderful feare: howbeit for the present time it appeared the fedition and diffention betwixt the Nobility and the People. For there was no Conſull, Senator, nor Magistrate, that durst once contrary the opinion of the People, for the calling home againe of Martius. When they saw the Women in a marvellous feare, running up and downe the City: the Temples of the gods full of old People, weeping bitterly in their Prayers to the gods: and finally, not a man either wife or hardy to provide for their safety: then they were all of opinion, that the People had reason to call home Martius againe, to reconcile themselves to him, and that the Senate on the contrary part, were in marvellous great fault, to be angry and in choler with him, when it stoodd them upon, rather to have gone out and intreated him. So they all agreed together to send Ambassadors unto him, to let him understand how his Countrymen did call him home againe, and restored him to all his Goods, and besought him to deliver them from this Warre. The Ambassadors that were sent, were Martius familiar friends and acquaintance, who looked at the least for a courteous welcome of him, as of their familiar friend and Kinsman. Howbeit they found nothing lesse: for at their coming they were brought through the Campe, to the place where he was set in his Chaire of State, with a marvellous and unſpeakable Majesty, having the chieftest men of the VOLSCES about him: so he commanded them to declare openly the cause of their coming. Which they delivered in the most humble and lowly words they possibly could devise, and with all modest countenance and behaviour agreeable to the same. When they had done their Message: for the injury they had done him, he answered them very hotly, and in great choler: but as General of the VOLSCES, he willed them to restore unto the VOLSCES, all their Lands and Cities they had taken from them in former Warres: and moreover, that they should give them the like honour and freedome of ROME, as they had before given to the LATINES. For otherwise they had no other meane to end this Warre, if they did not grant these honest and just Conditions of Peace. Thereupon he gave them thirty dayes respite to make him answer. So the Ambassadors returned straight to ROME, and Martius forthwith departed with his Army out of the Territories of the ROMANES. This was the first matter wherewith the VOLSCES (that most envied Martius Glory and Authority) did charge Martius with. Among those, Tullus was chiefe: who though he had received no private injury or displeasure of Martius, yet the common fault and imperfection of mans Nature wrought in him, and it grieved him to see his owne Reputation blemished through Martius great Fame and Honour, and so himselfe to be lesse esteemed of the VOLSCES then he was before. This fell out the more, because every man honoured Martius, and thought he onely could do all, and that all other Governours and Captaines must be content with such Credit and Authority as he would please to countenance them with. From hence they derived all their first Accusations and secret murmurings against Martius. For private Captaines conspiring against him, were very angry with him: and gave it out, that the removing of the Campe was a manifest Treason, not of the Towns, nor Forts, nor of Armes, but of Time and Occasion, which was a losse of great importance, because it was that which in reason might both loose and binde all; and preserve the whole. Now Martius having given the ROMANES thirty dayes respite for their Answer, and specially because the Warres have not accustomed to make any great changes in lesse space of time then that, he thought it good yet, not to lye alleepe and idle all the while, but went and destroyed the Lands of the Enemies Allies, and tooke seven great Cities of theirs well inhabited, and the ROMANES durst not once put themselves into the field, to come to their aide and helpe, they were so faint-hearted, so mistrustfull, and loth besides to make Warres. Inſomuch as they properly resembled the bodies paralytick and loosed of their limbes and members, as those which through the Palsey have lost all their sense and feeling. Wherefore, the time of Peace expired, Martius being returned into the Dominions of the ROMANES againe with all his Army, they sent another Ambassade unto him, to pray Peace, and the remove of the VOLSCES out of their Countrey: that afterwards they might with better leisure fall to such Agreements together, as should be thought most meete and necessary. For the ROMANES were no men that would ever yeelde for feare. But if he thought the VOLSCES had any ground to demand reasonable Articles and Conditions, all that they would reasonably aske should be granted unto by the ROMANES, who of themselves would willingly yeeld to reason, conditionally, that they did lay downe Armes. Martius to that answered: that as General of the VOLSCES he would reply nothing unto it: but yet as a ROMAN Citizen, he would counsell them to let fall their pride, and to be conformable to reason, if they were wise: and that they should returne againe within three dayes, delivering up the Articles agreed upon, which he had first delivered them. Otherwise, that he would no more give them assurance or safe conduct to returne againe into his Campe, with such vaine and frivolous Messages.

The first occasion of the Volces envie to Coriolanus.

and Soothsay-ers sent to Coriolanus.

When the Ambassadors were returned to Rome, and had reported Martius Answer to the Senate: their City being in extreme danger, and as it were in a terrible storme or tempest, they threw out (as the common Proverbe saith) their holy Anker. For then they appointed all the Bishops, Priests, Ministers of the gods, and keepers of holy things, and all the Augures or Sooth-sayers, which foretold things to come by observation of the flying of Birds (which is an old ancient kinde of prophesying and divination amongst the ROMANES) to go to Martius appaelled, as when they do their Sacrifices: and first to intreat him to leave off Warre, and then that he would speake to his Countrey-men, and conclude Peace with the VOLSCES. Martius suffered them to come into his Campe, but yet he granted them nothing the more, neither did he entertaine them or speake more courteously to them, then he did the first time that they came unto him, saying onely that he willed them to take the one of the two: either to accept Peace under the first Conditions offered, or else to receive Warre. When all this goodly rabble of superstitious Priests were returned, it was determined in Councell, that none should go out of the Gates of the City, and that they should watch and warde upon the Walls to repulse their Enemies: if they came to assault them: referring themselves and all their hope, to time and Fortunes uncertaine favour, not knowing otherwise how to remedy the danger. Now all the City was full of tumult, feare, and marvellous doubt what would happen, untill at the length there fell out such a like matter, as Homer oft times said they would least have thought of. For in great matters, that happen feldome, Homer saith, and crieth out in this sort:

The goddesse Pallas she, With her faire glistering eyes, Did put into his minde such thoughts, and made him so devise.

And in another place:

*But sure some god hath tane out of the Peoples minde, Both Wit and understanding eke, and have therewith assign'd.
Some other simple spirit, instead thereof to vide,
That so they might their doings all, for lacke of wit misguide.*

And in another place:

*The People of themselves did either it consider,
Or else some god instructed them, and so they joynd together.*

Many reckon not of Homer, as referring matters unpossible, and fables of no likelihood or truth, unto mans Reason, Free-will, or Judgement, which indeed is not his meaning. But things true and likely, he maketh to depend of our owne Free-will and Reason. For he oft speaketh these words:

I have thought it in my noble heart.

And in another place:

Achilles angry was, and sorry for to heare Him so to say, his heavie breast was fraught With pensive feare.

And in another place:

Bellerophon (she) could not move With her faire tongue, So honest and so vertuous, he was the rest among.

But in wondrous and extraordinary things, which are done by secret inspirations and motions, he doth not say that God taketh away from man his choice and freedome of will, but that he doth move it: neither that he doth worke desire in us, but objecteth to our mindes certaine imaginations whereby we are led to desire, and thereby doth not make this our action forced, but openeth the way to our Will, and addeth thereto courage, and hope of successe. For either we must say, that the gods meddle not with the Causes and beginnings of our actions: or else what other meanes have they to helpe and further men? It is apparent that they handle not our bodies, nor move not our feete and hands, when there is occasion to use them: but that part of our minde from which these motions proceed, is induced thereto, or carried away by such Objects and Reasons, as God offereth unto it. Now the ROMANE Ladies and Gentlewomen did visit all the Temples and gods of the fame, to make their Prayers unto them: but the greatest Ladies (and more part of them) were continually about the Altar of Jupiter Capitolin, among which Troupe by name, was Valeria, Publicolaes owne Sister. The selfe-same Publicola, who did such notable service to the ROMANES, both in Peace and Warres, and was dead also certaine yeares before, as we have declared in his Life. His Sister Valeria was greatly honoured and revered among all the ROMANES: and did so modestly and wisely behave her selfe, that she did not shame nor dishonour the House she came of. So she suddenly fell into such a fancy, as we have rehearsed before, and had (by some god as I thinke) taken hold of a noble device. Whereupon the rose, and the other Ladies with her, and they all together went straight to the House of Volumentia, Martius Mother: and coming in to her, found her, and Martius Wife her Daughter in Law, set together, and having her Husband Martius young Children in her lappe. Now all the Traine of these Ladies, sitting in a ring round about her, Valeria first began to speake in this sort unto her: "We Ladies, are come to visit you Ladies (my Lady Volumentia and Virgilia) by no direction from the Senate, nor commandement of other Magistrate, but through the inspiration (as I take it) of some god above: who having taken compassion and pity of our Prayers, hath moved us to come unto you, to intreat you in a matter, as well beneficiall for us, as also for the whole Citizens in general, but to your selves in speciall (if it please you to credit me) and shall redound to your more fame and glory, then the Daughters of the SABYNS obtained in former age, when they procured loving Peace, instead of hatefull Warre, betweene their Fathers and their Husbands. Come

Valeria unto Volumentia and

"Come on good Ladies, and let us go all together unto Martius, to intreat him to take pity upon us, and also to report the truth unto him, how much you are bound unto the Citizens: who notwithstanding they have sustained great hurt and losses by him, yet they have not hitherto sought revenge upon your persons by any discourteous usage, neither ever conceived any such thought or intent against you, but to deliver you safe into his hands, though thereby they look for no better grace or clemency from him. When Valeria had spoken this unto them, all the other Ladies, together with one voice confirmed that she had said. Then Volumentia in this sort did answer her: "My good Ladies, we are partakers with you of the common misery and calamity of our Countrey, and yet our griefe exceedeth yours the more, by reason of our particular misfortune, to feele the losse of my Sonne Martius former valiancy and glory, and to see his person environed now with our Enemies in Armes, rather to see him forth-coming and safe kept, then of any love to defend his person. But yet the greatest griefe of our heaped mishaps is, to see our poore Countrey brought to such extremity, that all the hope of the safety and preservation thereof, is now unfortunately cast upon us simple Women: because we know not what account he will make of us, since he hath cast from him all care of his naturall Countrey and Common-weale, which heretofore he hath holden more deare and precious, then either his Mother, Wife or Children. Notwithstanding, if ye thinke we can do good, we will willingly do what you will have us; bring us to him we pray you. For if we cannot prevaille, we may yet die at his feete, as humble Suters for the safety of our Countrey. Her Answer ended, she tooke her Daughter in Law, and Martius Children with her, and being accompanied with all the other ROMANE Ladies, they went in troope together unto the VOLSCES Campe: whom when they saw, they of themselves did both pity and reverence her, and there was not a man among them that once durst say a word unto her. Now was Martius set then in his Chaire of State, with all the Honours of a Generall, and when he had spied the Women coming afar off, he marvelled what the matter meant: but afterwards knowing his Wife which came foremost, he determined at the first to persist in his obdurate and inflexible rankor. But overcome in the end with naturall affection, and being altogether altered to see them, his heart would not serve him to tarry their coming to his Chaire, but coming downe in haste, he went to meete them, and first he kissed his Mother, and imbraced her a pretty while, then his Wife and little Children. And Nature so wrought with him, that the teares fell from his eyes, and he could not keepe himselfe from making much of them, but yielded to the affection of his blood, as if he had bene violently carried with the fury of a most swift running streame. After he had thus lovingly received them, and perceiving that his Mother Volumentia would begin to speake to him, he called the chiefe of the Councell of the VOLSCES to heare what she would say. Then she spake in this sort: "If we held our peace (my Son) and determined not to speake, the state of our poore Bodies, and present sight of our Rayment, would easily bewray to thee what life we have led at home, since thy exile and abode abroad, but thinke now with thy selfe, how much more unfortunate then all the Women living, we are come hither, considering that the sight which should be most pleasant to all other to behold, spightfull Fortune had made most fearful to us: making my selfe to see my Sonne, and my Daughter here her Husband, besieging the Walls of his native Countrey: so as that which is the onely comfort to all other in their adversity and misery, to pray unto the gods, and to call to them for aide, is the onely thing which plungeth us into most deepe perplexity. For we cannot (alas) together pray, both for victory to our Countrey, and for safety of thy life also: but a world of grievous curses, yea more then any mortall Enemy can heape upon us, are forcibly wrapt up in our Prayers. For the bitter sop of most hard choice is offered thy Wife and Children, to forgo one of the two: either to lose the Person of thy selfe, or the Nurse of their native Countrey. For my selfe (my Sonne) I am determined not to tarry till Fortune in my life time do make an end of this Warre. For if I cannot perswade thee, rather to do good unto both Parties, then to overthrow and destroy the one, preferring Love and Nature before the Malice and Calamity of Warres, thou shalt see, my Sonne, and trust unto it, thou shalt no sooner march forward to assault thy Countrey, but thy foote shall treade upon thy Mothers Wombe, that brought thee first into this World. And I may not defer to see the day, either that my Sonne be led Prisoner in triumph by his naturall Countrey-men, or that he himselfe do triumph of them, and of his naturall Countrey. For if it were so, that my request tended to save thy Countrey, in destroying the VOLSCES, I must confesse, thou wouldest hardly and doubtfully resolve on that. For as to destroy thy naturall Countrey, it is altogether unmeet and unlawfull, so were it not just, and lesse honourable, to betray those that put their trust in thee. But my onely demand consisteth, to make a Goale-delivery of all evils, which delivereth equal benefit and safety, both to the one and the other, but most honourable for the VOLSCES. For it shall appeare, that having victory in their hands, they have of speciall favour granted us singular graces, Peace and Amity, albeit themselves have no lesse part of both then we. Of which good, if so it came to passe, thy selfe is the onely Author, and so hast thou the onely honour. But if it faile, and fall out contrary, thy selfe alone deservedly shalt carry the shamefull reproach and burthen of either party. So, though the end of Warre be uncertaine, yet this notwithstanding is most certaine, that if it be thy chance to conquer, this benefit shalt thou reape of thy goodly Conquest, to be chronicled the plague and destroyer of thy Countrey. And if Fortune overthrow thee, then the World will say, that through desire to revenge thy private injuries, thou hast for ever undone thy good friends, who did most lovingly and courteously receive thee. Martius gave good care unto his Mothers words, without interrupting her Speech at all, and after she had said what she would, he held his peace a pretty while, and answered answered not a word. Hereupon she began againe to speake unto him, and said: "My Sonne, why doest thou not answer me? doest thou thinke it good altogether to give place unto thy choler and desire of revenge, and thinkest thou it not honesty for thee to grant thy Mothers request, in so weighty a cause? doest thou take it honourable for a Nobleman, to remember the wrongs and injuries done him, and doest not in like case thinke it an honest Nobleman's part, to be thankfull for the goodnesse that Parents do shew to their Children, acknowledging the duty and reverence they ought to beare unto them? No man living is more bound to shew himselfe thankfull in all parts and respects then thy selfe: who so univerally shewest all ingratitude. Moreover (my Sonne) thou hast sorely taken of thy Countrey, exacting grievous payments upon them, in revenge of the injuries offered thee; besides, thou hast not hitherto shewed thy poore Mother any courtelie. And therefore it is not onely honest, but due unto me, that without compulsion I should obtaine my fo just and reasonable request of thee. But since by reason I cannot perswade thee to it, to what purpose do I defer my last hope? And with these words, her selfe, his Wife and Children, fell downe upon their knees before him: Martius seeing that, could refraine no longer, but went straight and lit her up, crying out, Oh Mother, what have you done to me? And holding her hard by the right hand, Oh Mother, said he, you have wonne a happy victory for your Countrey, but mortall and unhappy for your Sonne: for I see my selfe vanquished by you alone. These words being spoken openly, he spake a little apart with his Mother and Wife, and then let them returne againe to Rome, for so they did request him; and so remaining in Campe that night, the next morning he dislodged, and marched homeward into the Volscs Countrey againe, who were not all of one minde, nor all alike contented. For some misliked him and that he had done: other being well pleased that Peace should be made, said: that neither the one nor the other, deserved blame nor reproach. Other though they misliked that was done, did not thinke him an ill man for that he did, but said, he was not to be blamed, though he yielded to such a forcible extremity. Howbeit no man contraried his departure, but all obeyed his commandment, more for respect of his worthinesse and valiancy then for feare of his Authority. Now the Citizens of Rome plainly shewed, in what feare and danger their City stood of this Warre, when they were delivered. For so soone as the Watch upon the Walls of the City perceived the Volscs Campe to remove, there was not a Temple in the City but was presently set open, and full of men wearing Garlands of Flowers upon their heads, sacrificing to the gods, as they were wont to do upon the news of some great obtained victory. And this common joy was yet more manifestly shewed, by the honourable courtiesies the whole Senate and People did bestow on their Ladies. For they were all thoroughly perswaded, and did certainly believe, that the Ladies onely were cause of the saving of the City, and delivering themselves from the instant danger of the Warre. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that the Magistrates to gratifie and honour these Ladies, should grant them all that they would require. And they onely requested that they would build a Temple of Fortune for the Women, unto the building whereof they offered themselves to defray the whole charge of the Sacrifices, and other Ceremonies belonging to the service of the gods. Nevertheless, the Senate commending their good will and forwardnesse, ordained that the Temple and Image should be made at the common charge of the City. Nowwithstanding that, the Ladies gathered Money among them, and made with the same a second Image of Fortune, which the Romans say did speake as they offered her up in the Temple, and did set her in her place: and they affirme, that she spake these words: Ladies, ye have devoutly offered me up. Moreover, that she spake that twice together, making us to believe things that never were, and are not to be credited: For to see Images that seeme to sweate or weepe, or to put forth any humour red or bloudy, it is not a thing impossible. For Woode and Stone do commonly receive certaine moysture, whereof are ingendred humours, which do yeeld of themselves, or do take of the aire, many sorts and kinde of spots and colours: by which signes and tokens it is not amisse, methinke, that the gods sometimes do warne men of things to come. And it is possible also, that these Images and Statues do sometimes put forth sounds like unto sighs or mourning, when in the midst or bottome of the same, there is made some violent separation, or breacking asunder of things, blowne or devised therein: but that a body which hath neither life nor soule, should have any direct or exquisite words formed in it by expresse voice, that is altogether impossible: For the soule, nor God himselfe can distinctly speake without a body, having necessary Organs and Instruments meete for the parts of the same, to forme and utter distinct words. But where Stories many times do force us to believe a thing reported to be true, by many grave testimonies: there we must say, that it is some passion contrary to our five naturall senses, which being begotten in the imaginative part or understanding, draweth an opinion unto it selfe, even as we doe in our sleeping. For many times we thinke we heare that we do not heare, and we imagine we see that we see not. Yet notwithstanding, such as are godly bent, and zealously given to thinke on heavenly things, so as they can no way be drawne from believing that which is spoken of them, they have this reason to ground the foundation of their belief upon; that is, the Omnipotency of God, which is wonderfull, and hath no manner of resemblance or likeness of proportion unto ours, but is altogether contrary, as touching our nature, our moving, our art, and our force: and therefore if he do any thing impossible to us, or do bring forth and devise things above mans common reach and understanding, we must not therefore thinke it impossible at all. For if in other things he is far contrary to us, much more in his Workes and secret Operations, he far passeth all the rest: but the most part of Gods doings, as Heraclitus saith, for lacke of faith, are hidden and unknowne unto us. Now when Martius was returned againe into the City of Antium from

from his voyage, Tullus that hated and could no longer abide him for the feare he had of his Authority, sought divers meanes to make him away, thinking if he let slipt that present time, he should never recover the like and fit occasion againe. Wherefore Tullus having procured many other of his confederacy, required Martius might be deposed from his Estate, to render up account to the Volscs of his Charge and Government. Martius fearing to become a private man againe under Tullus being Generall (whose Authority was greater otherwife, then any other among all the Volscs) answered: He was willing to give up his charge, and would resigne it into the hands of the Lords of the Volscs, if they did all command him, as by all their commandement he received it. And moreover, that he would not refuse even at that present to give up an account unto the People, if they would tarry the hearing of it. The People hereupon called a common Councell, in which Assembly there were certaine Orators appointed, that stirred up the common People against him: and when they had told their tales, Martius rose up to make them answer. Now, notwithstanding the mutinous People made a marvellous great noise, yet when they saw him, for the reverence they bare unto his valiantnesse, they quieted themselves, and gave him audience to alledge with leisure what he could for his purgation. Moreover, the honestest men of the Antiates, and who most rejoiced in Peace, shewed by their countenance that they would heare him willingly. And judge also according to their conscience. Whereupon Tullus fearing that if he did let him speake, he would prove his innocency to the People, because amongst other things he had an eloquent tongue; besides that the first good service he had done to the People of the Volscs, did winne him more favour, then these last Accusations could purchase him displeasure: and furthermore, the offence they laid to his charge, was a testimony of the good will they ought him; for they would never have thought he had done them wrong for that they tooke not the City of Rome, if they had not bene very neare taking of it, by means of his approach and conduction. For these causes Tullus thought he might no longer delay his pretence and enterprise, neither to tarry for the mutining and rising of the common People against him: wherefore, those that were of the conspiracy, began to cry out that he was not to be heard, and that they would not suffer a Traytour to usurpe tyrannicall power over the Tribe of the Volscs, who would not yeeld up his State and Authority. And in saying these words, they all fell upon him, and killed him in the Market-place, none of the People once offering to rescue him. Howbeit it is a cleare case, that this murder was not generally consented unto, of the most part of the Volscs: for men came out of all parts to honour his body, and did honourably bury him, setting up his Tombe with great store of Armour and spoiles, as the Tombe of a worthy person and great Captaine. The Romans understanding of his death, shewed no other honour or malice, saving that they granted the Ladies their request they made: that they might mourne tenne Moneths for him, and that was the full time they used to weare blackes for the death of their Fathers, Brethren, or Husbands, according to Numa Pompilius order, who established the same, as we have enlarged more amply in the description of his Life. Now Martius being dead, the whole State of the Volscs heartily wished him alive againe. For, first of all they fell out with the Aequis (who were their friends and Confederates) touching preheminance and place: and this quarrell grew on so farre betweene them, that frays and murders fell out upon it one with another. After that the Romans overcame them in Battell, in which Tullus was slaine in the Field, and the flower of all their force was put to the Sword: so that they were compelled to accept most shamefull Conditions of Peace, in yeelding themselves subject unto the Conquerors, and promising to be obedient at their commandement.

THE COMPARISON OF ALCIBIADES with MARTIUS CORIOLANUS.

The acts done by both.

NOW that we have written all the Deedes of worthy memory, done by either of them both, we may presently discern, that in matters of Warre the one hath not greatly exceeded the other. For both of them in their charge, were alike hardy and valiant for their persons, as also wife and politick in the Warres: unlesse they will say, that Alcibiades was the better Captaine, as he that had foughten more Battels with his Enemies, both by Sea and Land, then ever Coriolanus had done, and had alwaies the Victory of his Enemies. For otherwise, in this they were much alike: that where they were both present and had charge and power to command, all things prospered notably, and with good successe on the part they were of; and also when they tooke the contrary side, they made the first have the worst every way. Now for matters of Government, the Noblemen and honest Citizens did hate Alcibiades manner of rule in the Common-weale, as of a man most dissolute, and given to flattery: because he ever studied by all device he could, to curry favour with the common People. So did the ROMANES malice also Coriolanus Government, for that it was too arrogant, proud, and tyrannicall: whereby neither the one nor the other was to be commended. Notwithstanding he is lesse to be blamed, that seeketh to please and gratifie his common People, then he that despieth and disdaineth them; and therefore offereth them wrong and injury, because he would not seeme to flatter them, to winne the more Authority. For as it is an evil thing to flatter the common People to winne credit: even so is it besides dishonesty, and injustice also, to attaine to credit and authority, for one to make himselfe terrible to the People, by offering them wrong and violence. It is true that Martius was ever counted an honest natured man, plaine, and simple, without art or cunning: but Alcibiades meere contrary; for he was fine, subtil, and deceitfull. And the greatest fault they ever burdened Alcibiades for, was his malice and deceit, wherewith he abused the Ambassadors of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and that he was a lett that Peace was not concluded, as Thucydides reporteth. Now, though by this act he suddenly brought the City of ATHENS into Warres, yet he brought it thereby to be of greater power, and more fearfull to the Enemies, by making alliance with the MANTINIANS and the ARGIVES, who by Alcibiades practise entred into League with the ATHENIANS. And Martius, as Dionysius the Historiographer writeth: did by craft and deceit bring the ROMANES into Warres against the VOLSCES, causing the VOLSCES maliciously and wrongfully to be suspected, that went to Rome to see the Games plaid. But the cause why he did it, made the fact so much more foule and wicked: for it was not done for any civill dissention, nor for any jealousie and contention in matters of Government as Alcibiades did: but onely following his cholerick moode, that would be pleased with nothing, as Dion said, he would needs trouble and turmoyle the most part of ITALY; and so being angry with his Country, he destroyed many other Townes and Cities that could not helpe it, nor do withall. This is true also, that Alcibiades spite and malice did worke great mischief and misery to his Country: but when he saw they repented them of the injury they had done him, he came to himselfe, and did withdraw his Army. Another time also, when they had banished Alcibiades, he would not yet suffer suffer the Captaines of the ATHENIANS to runne into great errors, neither would he see them cast away, by following ill counsell which they tooke, neither would he forsake them in any danger they put themselves into. But he did the very same that Aristides had done in old time unto Themistocles, for which he was then, and is yet so greatly praised. For he went unto the Captaines that had charge then of the Army of the ATHENIANS, although they were not his friends, and told them wherein they did amisse, and what they had further to do. Where Martius to the contrary, did first great hurt unto the whole City of ROME, though all in ROME had not generally offended him: yea, and when the best and chiefeest part of the City were grieved for his sake, and were very fory and angry for the injury done him. Furthermore, the ROMANES fought to appease one onely displeasure and despiht they had done him, by many Ambassadors, Petitions and requests they made; whereunto he never yeelded, untill his Mother, Wife, and Children came, his heart was so hardened. And hereby it appeared he was entred into this cruell Warre (when he would hearken to no peace) of an intent utterly to destroy and spoile his Country, and not as though he meant to recover it, or to returne thither againe. Here was indeed the difference betweene them: that spials being laid by the LACEDÆMONIANS to kill Alcibiades, for the malice they did beare him, as also for that they were afraid of him, he was compelled to returne home againe to ATHENS. Where Martius contrariwise, having bene so honourably received and entertained by the VOLSCES, he could not with honesty forsake them, considering that they had done him that honour, as to chooße him their Generall, and trusted him so farre, as they put all their whole Army and Power into his hands: and not as the other, whom the LACEDÆMONIANS rather abused then used him, suffering him to go up and downe their City (and afterwards in the midst of their Campe) without honour or place at all. So that in the end Alcibiades was compelled to put himselfe into the hands of Tisaphernes: unlesse that they will say that he went thither of purpose to him, with intent to save the City of ATHENS from utter destruction, for the desire he had to returne home againe. Moreover, we reade of Alcibiades, that he was a great taker, and would be corrupted with Money: and when he had it, he would most licentiously and dishonestly spend it. Where Martius in contrary manner would not so much as accept Gifts lawfully offered him by his Captaines, to honour him for his valiantnesse. And the cause why the People did beare him such ill will, for the controvercie they had with the Nobility about clearing of Debts, grew: for that they knew well enough it was not for any gain or benefit he had gotten thereby, so much as it was for spite and displeasure he thought to do them. Anipater in a Letter of his, writing of the death of Aristotle the Philosopher, doth not without cause commend the singular gifts that were in Alcibiades, and this especially, that he passed all other for winning mens good wills. Whereas Martius noble acts and vertues, wanting that affability, became hatefull, even to those that received benefit by them, who could not abide his severity and selfe-will: which causeth desolation (as Plato saith) and men to be ill-followed, or altogether forsaken. Contrariwise, seeing Alcibiades had a trimme entertainment, and a very good grace with him, and could fashion himselfe in all Companies, it was no marvell if his well doing were gloriously commended, and himselfe much honoured and beloved of the People, considering that some faults he did, were oftentimes taken for matters of sport, and toys of pleasure. And this was the cause, that though many times he did great hurt to the Common-wealth, yet they did oft make him their Generall, and trusted him with the charge of the whole City. Where Martius suing for an Office of honour, that was due to him, for the sundry good services he had done to the State, was notwithstanding repulsed, and put by. Thus do we see, that they to whom the one did hurt, had no power to hate him: and the other that honoured his vertue, had no liking to love his person. Martius also did never any great exploit, being Generall of his Countrymen, but when he was Generall of their Enemies against his naturall Country: whereas Alcibiades, being both a private person, and a Generall, did notable service unto the ATHENIANS. By reason whereof, Alcibiades wheresoever he was present, had the upper hand ever of his Accusers, even as he would himselfe, and their Accusations tooke no place against him: unlesse it were in his absence. Where Martius being present, was condemned by the ROMANES: and in his person murdered and slain by the VOLSCES. But here I cannot say they have done well, nor justly, albeit himselfe gave them some colour to do it, when he openly denied the ROMANE Ambassadors Peace, which after he privately granted, at the request of women. So by this deede of his, he tooke not away the enmity that was betweene both People: but leaving Warre still betweene them, he made the VOLSCES (of whom he was Generall) to lose the opportunity of noble victory. Where indeed he should (if he had done as he ought) have withdrawne his Army with their counsell and consent, that had reposed so great affiance in him, in making him their Generall: if he had made that account of them, as their good will towards him did in duty binde him. Or else, if he did not care for the VOLSCES in the enterprise of this Warre, but had onely procured it of intent to be revenged, and afterwards to leave it off when his anger was blowne over: yet he had no reason for the love of his Mother to pardon his Country, but rather he should in pardoning his Country, have spared his Mother, because his Mother and Wife were Members of the Body of his Country and City, which he did besiege. For in that he uncourteously rejected all the publike Petitions, requests of Ambassadors, intreaties of the Bishops and Priests, to gratifie onely the request of his Mother, with his departure: that was no act so much to honour his Mother with, as to dishonour his Country by, the which was preserved for the pity and intercession of a Woman, and not for the love of it selfe, as if it had not bene worthy of it. And so was this departure a grace (to say truly) very odious and cruell, and deserved no thanks of either party, to him that did it. For he withdrew his Army, not at the request of the ROMANS, against whom he made Warre: nor with their consent, at whose charge the Warre was made. And of all his misfortune and ill happe, the austerity of his nature, and his haughty obtinate minde, was the onely cause: the which of it selfe being hatefull to the World, when it is joynd with ambition, it groweth then much more churlish, fierce and intolerable. For men that have that fault in nature, are not affable to the People, seeming thereby as though they made no estimation or regard of the People: and yet on the other side, if the People should not give them honour and reverence, they would straight take it in scorne, and little care for the matter. For so did Metellus, Aristides and Epaminondas, all used this manner: not to seeke the good will of the common People by flattery and dissimulation: which was indeede, because they despised that which the People could give or take away. Yet would they not be offended with their Citizens, when they were amerced, and set at any fines, or that they banished them, or gave them any other repulse: but they loved them as well as they did before, so soone as they knewed any token of repentance, and that they were sory for the wrong they had done them, and were easily made friends againe with them, after they were restored from their banishment. For he that disdaineth to make much of the People, and to have their favour, should much more scorne to seeke to be revenged when he is repulsed. For, to take a repulse and deniall of honour so inwardly to the heart, cometh of no other cause, but that he did too earnestly desire it. Therefore Alcibiades did not dissemble at all, that he was not very glad to see himselfe honoured, and sory to be rejected and denied any honour: but also he sought all the meanes he could to make himselfe beloved of those amongst whom he lived. Whereas Martius stoutnesse and haughty stomacke, did stay him from making much of those that might advance and honour him: and yet this ambition made him gnaw himselfe for spite and anger, when he saw he was despised. And this is all that reasonably may be reproved in him: for otherwise he lacked no good commendable vertues and qualities. For his temperance, and cleane hands from taking of Bribes and Money, he may be compared with the most perfect, vertuous, and honest men of all GREECE: but not with Alcibiades, who was undoubtedly alwaies too licentious and loosely given, and had too small regard of the duty of Honesty.

THE LIFE OF PAULUS ÆMYLIUS.

Ann. Mund.
3760.

WHEN I first began to write these Lives, my intent was to profit other: but since continuing and going on, I have much profited my selfe by looking into these Histories, as if I looked into a glasse, to frame and fashion my life to the mould and patterne of these vertuous Noblemen. For running over their manners in this sort, and seeking also to describe their Lives: methinks I am still conversant and familiar with them, and do as it were lodge them with me, one after another. And when I come to peruse their Histories, and to weigh the vertues and qualities they have had, and what singularity each of them possessed: and to chuse and cull out the chiefe things of note in them, and their best speeches and doings most worthy of memory: then I cry out:

O gods, can there be more passing pleasure in the world?

Or is there any thing of more force, to teach man civill manners, and a ruled life, or to reforme the vice in man? Democritus the Philosopher writeth, that we should pray we might ever see happie Images and Signes in the aire, and that the good which is meete and proper to our nature, may rather come to us, then that is evill and unfortunate: presupposing a false opinion and Doctrine in Philosophy, which allureth men to infinite superstitions: That there are good and badde Images flying in the aire, which give a good or ill impression unto men, and incline men to vice, or to vertue. But as for me, by continuall reading of ancient Histories, and gathering these Lives together which now I leave before you, and by keeping alwaies in minde the acts of the most noble, vertuous, and best given men of former age, and worthy memory: I do teach and prepare my selfe to shake off and banish from me all lewd and dishonest conditions, if by chance the company and conversation of them whose company I keepe, and must of necessity haunt, do acquaint me with some unhappy or ungracious touch. This is easie unto me, that do dispose my minde, being quiet and not troubled with any passion, unto the deepe consideration of so many noble examples. As I do present unto you now in this Volume, the Lives of Timoleon the CORINTHIAN, and of Paulus Æmylius the ROMANE, who had not onely a good and upright minde with them, but were also fortunate and happy, in all the matters they both did take in hand. So as you shall hardly judge, when you have read over their Lives, whether wisdom or good fortune brought them to achieve to such honourable Acts and Exploits as they did. Many (and the most part of Historiographers) do write, that the House and Family of the Æmylians in ROME, was alwaies of the most ancient of the Nobility, which they call Patricians. Some Writers affirme also, that the first of that House that gave Name to all the Posterity after, was Marcus, the Sonne of Pythagoras the wife, whom King Numa for the sweetnesse and pleasant grace of his tongue, furnished Marcus Æmylius: Pythagoras Sonne and

and those specially affirme it, that say King Numa was Pythagoras Scholar. Howsoever it was, the most part of this Family that obtained Honour and Estimation for their Vertue, were ever fortunate also in all their doings, saving onely Lucius Paulus onely, who died in the Battell of CANNES. But his misfortune doth beare manifest testimony of his wisdom and valiancy together. For he was forced to fight against his will, when he saw he could not bridle the rashnesse of his fellow Confull that would needes joyne Battell; and to do as he did, saving that he fled not as the other, who being the first procurer of the Battell, was the first that ranne away: where he to the contrary, to his power did what he could to lett him, and did stick by it, and fought it valiantly to the last gaspe. This Æmylius left a Daughter behinde him called Æmylia, which was married unto Scipio the Great: and a Sonne, Paulus Æmylius, being the same man whose Life we presently treat of. His youth fortunately fell out in a flourishing time of glory and honour, through the sundry Vertues of many great and noble Persons living in those dayes, among whom he made his name famous also: and it was not by that ordinary art and course, which the best esteemed young men of that age did take and follow. For he did not use to plead private mens Causes in Law, neither would creepe into mens favour by fawning upon any of them: though he saw it a common practise, and policy of men, to seeke the Peoples favour and good wills by such meanes. Moreover, he refused not that common course which other tooke, for that it was contrary to his nature, or that he could not frame with either of both, if he had bene so disposed: but he rather sought to winne reputation by his honesty, his valiantnesse, and upright dealing, as chooseth that the better way then either of the other two, inasmuch as in marvellous short time he passed all those that were of his age. The first Office of Honour he sued for, was the Office of Ædylis, in which suite he was preferred before twelve other that sued for the selfe-same Office: who were men of no small quality, for they all came afterwards to be Consuls. After this, he was chosen to be one of the number of the Priests, whom the ROMANES call Augures: who have the charge of all the Divinations and Sooth-sayings, in telling of things to come by flying of Birds, and signes in the aire. He was so carefull, and tooke such paines to understand how the ROMANES did use the same, and with such diligence fought the observation of the ancient Religion of the ROMANES in all holy matters: that where that Priesthood was before esteemed but a Title of Honour, and desired for the name onely, he brought it to passe, that it was the most honourable Science, and best reputed of in ROME: wherein he confirmed the Philosophers opinion, that Religion is the knowledge how to serve God. For when he did any thing belonging to his Office of Priesthood, he did it with great experience, judgement and diligence, leaving all other thoughts, and without omitting any ancient Ceremony, or adding to any new, contending oftentimes with his companions, in things which seemed light, and of small moment: declaring unto them, that though we do presume the gods are easie to be pacified, and that they readily pardon all faults and scapes committed by negligence, yet if it were no more but for respect of Common-wealths sake, they should not slightly nor carelessly disseble or passe over faults committed in those matters: For no man (saith he) at the first that committeth any fault, doth alone trouble the state of the Common-wealth: but withall, we must thinke he leaveth the grounds of Civill Government, that is not as carefull to keepe the Institutions of small matters, as also of the great. So was he also a severe Captaine, and strict observer of all Marriall Discipline, not seeking to winne the Souldiers love by flattery, when he was Generall in the Field, as many did in that time: neither corrupting them for a second charge, by shewing himselfe gentle and courteous in the first, unto those that served under him: but himselfe did orderly shew them the very Rules and Precepts of the Discipline of Warres, even as a Priest that should expresse the names and Ceremonies of some holy Sacrifice, wherein were danger to omit any part or parcell. Howbeit, being terrible to execute the Law of Armes upon rebellious and disobedient Souldiers, he kept up thereby the state of the Common-wealth the better: judging to overcome the Enemy by force, was but an accellary as a man may terme it, in respect of well training and ordering his Citizens by good Discipline. While the ROMANES were in Warres against King Antiochus surnamed the Great, in the South parts, all the chiefest Captaines of ROME being employed that wayes, there fell out another in the necke of that, in the West parts towards SPAIN, where they were up in Armes. Thither they sent Æmylius Prætor, not with five Axes as the other Prætors had borne before them, but with twelve: so that under the name of Prætor, he had the Authority and Dignity of a Confull. He twice overcame the barbarous People in maine Battell, and slew thirty thousand of them, and got this Victory through his great skill and wisdom, in chusing the advantage of place and time, to fight with his Ennemies, even as the passed over a River: which easily gave his Souldiers the Victory. Moreover, he tooke there two hundred and fifty Cities, all which did open, and gladly receive him in. So, leaving all that Country quiet and in good peace, and having received their Fealty by Oath made betwene his hands, he returned againe to ROME, not enriched the value of a Drachma more then before. For then he tooke little regard to his expences, he spent so frankly, neither was his Purse his Master, though his Revenue was not great to beare it out, as it appeared to the World after his death, for all that he had was little enough to satisfy his Wives Joynter. His first Wife was Pappia, the Daughter of a Noble Confull Pappus Maffo, and after they had lived a long time together, he was divorced from her, notwithstanding he had goodly Children by her. For by her he had that famous Scipio the second, and Lucius Æmylius. The just cause of the Divorce betwene them, appeared not to us in writing: but methinks the Tale that is told concerning the separation of a certaine Marriage is true: That a certaine ROMANE having forsaken his Wife, her friends fell out with him, and asked him, What

fault dost thou finde in her? is she not honest of her body? is she not faire? doth she not bring thee goodly Children? But he putting forth his foote, shewed them his Shooe, and answered them: is not this a goodly Shooe? is not it finely made? and is it not new? yet I dare say there is never a one of you can tell where it wringeth me. For to say truly, great and open faults are commonly occasions to make Husbands put away their Wives: but yet oftentimes household words runne so betwene them (proceeding of crooked Conditions, or of diversity of Natures, which strangers are not privie unto) that in proceffe of time they do beget such a strange alteration of love and mindes in them, as one House can no longer hold them. So Æmylius, having put away Pappia his first Wife, he married another that brought him two Sonnes, which he brought up with himselfe in his House, and gave his two first Sonnes (to wit, Scipio the second, and Fabius Maximus) in adoption to two of the Noblest and richest Families of the City of ROME. The elder of the twaine, unto Fabius Maximus, he that was five times Confull, and the younger unto the House of the Cornelijs, whom the Sonne of the great Scipio the AFRICAN did adopt, being his Cousin-germaine, and named him Scipio. Concerning his Daughters, the Sonne of Cato married the one, and Ælius Tubero the other, who was a marvellous honest man, and did more nobly maintaine himselfe in his poverty, then any other ROMANE: for they were sixteen persons all of one name, and of the House of the Ælijs, very neere akinne one to the other, who had all but one little House in the City, and a small Farme in the Country, wherewith they entertained themselves, and lived all together in one House, with their Wives, and many little Children. Amongst their Wives, one of them was the Daughter of Paulus Æmylius, after he had bene twice Confull, and had triumphed twice, not being ashamed of her Husbands poverty, but wondring at his Vertue that made him poore. Whereas Brethren and Kinsmen, as the World goeth now, if they dwell not far asunder, and in other Countries, not one neere another, and that Rivers part them not, or Walls divide their Lands, leaving great waistes betwene them: they are never quiet, but still in quarrell one with another. Goodly examples doth this Story lay before the wife, and well advised Readers, to learne thereby how to frame their life, and wisely to behave themselves. Now Æmylius being chosen Confull, went to make Warre with the LIGURIANS, who dwelled in the ALPES, and which otherwise are called LIGUSTINES. These are very valiant and warlike men, and were very good Souldiers at that time, by reason of their continuall Warres against the ROMANES, whose neere neighbours they were. For they dwelt in the furthest part of ITALY, that bordereth upon the great ALPES, and the row of ALPES, whereof the foote joyneth to the THUSCAN Sea, and pointeth towards AFRICK, and are mingled with the GAULES and SPANIARDS, neighbours unto the Sea Coast: who scouring all the Mediterranean Sea at that time, unto the straight of Hercules pillars, did with their little light Pinnaces of Pirates, lett all the Traffique and entercourse of Merchandize. Æmylius being gone to seeke them in their Countrey, they tarried his coming with an Army of forty thousand men: nevertheless, though he had but eight thousand men in all, and that they were five to one of his, yet he gave the onset upon them, and overthrew them, and drave them into their Cities. Then he sent to offer them peace, for the ROMANES would not altogether destroy the LIGURIANS, because their Countrey was as a Rampier or Bulwarke against the invasion of the GAULES, who lay lurking for opportunity and occasion to invade ITALY: whereupon these LIGURIANS yielded themselves unto him, and put all their Forts and Ships into his hands. Æmylius delivered unto them their Holds againe, without other hurt done unto them, saving that he razed the Walls of their Fortifications; howbeit he tooke all their Ships from them, leaving them little Boats of three Oares onely, and no greater; and set all the Prisoners at liberty they had taken, both by Sea and by Land, as well ROMANES as other, which were a marvellous number. These were all the notable acts he did worthy memory, in the first yeare of his Confullship. Afterwards he oftentimes shewed himselfe very desirous to be Confull againe, and did put forth himselfe to sue for it: but when he was denied it, he never after made sute for it againe, but gave himselfe onely to study Divine things, and to see his Children virtuously brought up, not onely in the ROMANE Tongue which himselfe was taught, but also a little more curiously in the GREEKE Tongue. For he did not onely retaine Gramarians, Rhetoricians, and Logicians, but also Painters, Gravers of Images, Riders of Horses, and Hunts of GREECE about his Children: and he himselfe also (if no matters of Common-wealth troubled him) was ever with them in the Schoole when they were at their Books, and also when they otherwise did exercise themselves. For he loved his Children as much or more then any other ROMANE. Now concerning the state of the Common-wealth, the ROMANES were at Warres with King Perseus, and they much blamed the Captaines they had sent thither before, for that for lacke of skill and courage, they had so cowardly behaved themselves, as their Ennemies laughed them to scorne: and they received more hurt of them, then they did unto the King. For not long before, they had driven King Antiochus beyond Mount Taurus, and made him forsake the rest of ASIA, and had shut him up within the Borders of SYRIA, who was glad that he had bought that Countrey with fifteen thousand Talents, which he paid for a Fine. A little before also, they had overcome Philip King of MACEDON in the THESSALY, and had delivered the GRECIANS from the bondage of the MACEDONIANS. And moreover, having overcome Hannibal (unto whom no Prince nor King that ever was in the World was comparable, either for his power or valiantnesse) they thought this too great a dishonour to them, that this Warre they had against King Perseus, should hold so long of even hand with them, as if he had been an Enemy equall with the People of ROME: considering also that they fought not against them, but with the refuse and scattered People of the overthrowne Army his Father had lost before, and

and knew not that Philip had left his Army stronger, and more expert by reason of his overthrow, then it was before: as I will briefly rehearse the Story from the beginning. Antigonus, who was of the greatest power of all the Captaines and Successors of Alexander the Great, having obtained for himselfe and his Posterity the Title of a King, had a Sonne called Demetrius, of whom came Antigonus the second, that was furnished Gonatos, whose Sonne was also called Demetrius, that reigned no long time, but died, and left a young Sonne called Philip. By reason whereof, the Princes and Nobility of MACEDON, fearing that the Realme should be left without Heire, they preferred one Antigonus, cousin to the last deceased King, and made him marry the Mother of Philip the lesse, giving him the name at the first of the Kings Protector onely, and Lieutenant Generall of his Majesty. But after, when they had found he was a good and wise Prince, and a good Husband for the Realme, they then gave him the absolute name of a King, and furnished him Dofon, to say, the Giver: for he promised much and gave little. After him reigned Philip, who in his greene youth gave more hope of himselfe, then any other of the Kings before: insomuch as they thought that one day he would restore MACEDON her ancient Fame and Glory, and that he alone would plucke downe the pride and power of the ROMANES, who rose against all the World. But after that he had lost a great Battell, and was overthrowne by Titus Quintus Flaminus neare unto the City of SCOTUSA, then he began to quake for feare, and to leave all to the mercy of the ROMANES; thinking he escaped good cheape, for any light Ransome or Tribute the ROMANES should impose upon him. Yet afterwards coming to understand himselfe, he grew to disdain it much, thinking that to raigne through the favour of the ROMANES, was but to make himselfe a Slave, to seeke to live in pleasure at his ease, and not for a valiant and noble Prince borne. Whereupon he set all his minde to study the Discipline of Warres, and made his preparation as wisely and closely as possibly he could. For dy the Discipline of Warres, and standing upon any High-ways, without any fortification at all, and in manner desolate without People, to the end there might appeare no occasion of doubt or mistrust in him: and in the meane time, in the high Countries of his Realme far from great beaten wayes, he levied a great number of men of Warre, and replenished his Townes and strong Holds that lay scattering abroad, with Armour and Weapon, Money and Men, Providing for Warre, which he kept as secretly as he could. For he had Provision of Armour in his Armoury, to arme thirty thousand men, and eight million bushels of Corne safely lockt up in his Forts and stronger places, and ready Money, as much as would serve to entertaine tenne thousand strangers in pay, to defend his Countrey for the space of tenne yeares. But before he could bring that to passe he had purposed, he died for grieve and sorrow, after he knew he had unjustly put Demetrius the best of his Sonnes to death, upon the false accusation of the worst, that was Perseus: who as he did inherit the Kingdome of his Father by succession, so did he also inherit his Fathers malice against the ROMANES. But he had no shoulders to beare so heavey a burden, and especially being as he was, a man of so vile and wicked nature: for among many lewd and naughty conditions he had, he was extreme covetous and miserabell. They say also, that he was not legitimate, because Philip Wife had taken him from Gnathania (a Taylors Wife borne at AGGOS) immediately after he was borne, and did adopt the Child to be hers. And some thinke that this was the chiefeest cause why he practised to put Demetrius to death, fearing lest his lawfull Sonne would seeke occasion to prove him a Bastard. Notwithstanding, simple though he was, and of vile and base nature, he found the strength of his Kingdome so great, that he was contented to take upon him to make Warre against the ROMANES, which he maintained a long time, and fought against their Consuls, that were their Generals, and repulsed great Armies of theirs both by Sea and Land, and overcame some. As Publius Licinius among other, the first that invaded MACEDON, was overthrowne by him in a Battell of Horsemen, where he slew at that one time two thousand five hundred good men of his, and tooke six hundred Prisoners. And their Army by Sea, riding at anker before the City of OREUM, he did suddenly set upon, and tooke twenty great Ships of burden, and all that was in them, and sunke the rest, which were all laden with Corne: and tooke of all sorts besides about 54. Foyts and Gallies of fifty Oares apiece. The second Consull and Generall he fought withall, was Hestilius, whom he repulsed, attempting by force to invade MACEDON by way of the City of ELUMIA. Another time againe, when he entred in by Reach upon the Coast of THESSALY, he offered him Battell, but the other durst not abide it. And as though this War troubled him nothing at all, and that he had cared little for the ROMANES, he went and fought a Battell in the meane time with the DARDANIANS, where he slew ten thousand of those barbarous People, and brought away a marvellous spoile. Moreover he procured the Nation of the GAULES dwelling upon the River of Danubius, which they call Bastarna (men very warlike, and excellent good Horsemen) and did practise with the ILLYRIANS also by means of their King Gentius, to make them joyne with him in this Warre: so that there ran a rumour, that for Money he had gotten those GAULES to come downe into ITALY, from the high Countrey of GAULE all along the Adriack Sea. The ROMANES being advertised of these news, thought the time served not now to dispose their Offices in Warres any more by grace and favour unto those that sued for them: but contrariwise, they should call some Nobleman that were very skilfull and a wise Captaine, and could discreetly governe and performe things of great charge: as Paulus Æmylius, a man well stepped on in yeares, being threecore yeares old, and yet of good power, by reason of the lusty young men his Sons, and Sons in Law, besides a great number of his friends and Kinsfolke. So all that bare great authority, did all together with one consent counsell him to obey the People, which called him to the Consullship. At the beginning indeede he delayed the People much that came to importune him, and utterly denied them: saying:

saying, he was no meete man neither to desire, nor yet to take upon him any charge. Howbeit in the end, seeing the people did urge it upon him, by knocking continually at his gates, and calling him aloud in the streets, willing him to come into the Market-place, and perceiving they were angry with him, because he refused it, he was content to be perswaded. And when he stood among them that sued for the Consullship, the people thought straight that he stood not there so much for desire of the Office, as for that he put them in hope of assured victory, and happy successe of this begun Warre: so great was their love towards him, and the good hope they had of him, that they chose him Consull againe the second time. Wherefore so soone as he was chosen, they would not proceed to drawing of Lots according to their custome, which of the two Consuls should happen to go into MACEDON: but presently with a full and whole consent of them all, they gave him the whole charge of the Warres of MACEDON. So being Consull now, and appointed to make Warre upon King Perseus, all the people did honourably accompany him home unto his house: where a little Girle (a Daughter of his) called Tertia, being yet an infant, came weeping unto her Father. He making much of her, asked her why she wept: The poore Girle answered, colling him about the necke, and kissing him; Alas Father, wote you what? our Perseus is dead. She meant it by a little Whelp so called, which was her play-fellow. In good houre my Girle, said he, I like the signe well. Thus did Cicero the Orator report of it in his booke of Divinations. The ROMANES, had a custome at that time, that such as were elected Consuls (after that they were openly proclaimed) should make an Oration of thanks unto the people, for the honour and favour they had shewed him. The people then (according to the custome) being gathered together to heare Æmylius speake, he made this Oration unto them: "That the first time he sued to be Consull, was in respect of himselfe, standing at that time in need of such honour: now he offered himselfe the second time unto it, for the good love he bare unto them, who stood in need of a Generall; wherefore he thought himselfe nothing bound nor beholding unto them now. And if they did thinke also this Warre might be better followed by any other then by himselfe, he would presently with all his heart resigne the place. Furthermore, if they had any trust or confidence in him, that they thought him a man sufficient to discharge it: then that they would not speake nor meddle in any matter that concerned his duty, and the Office of a Generall, saving onely, that they would be diligent (without any words) to doe whatsoever he commanded, and should be necessary for the Warre and service they tooke in hand. For if every man would be a Commander, as they had bene heretofore, of those by whom they should be commanded; then the world would more laugh them to scorne in this service, then ever before had bene accustomed. These words made the ROMANES very obedient to him, and perceiving good hope to come, being all of them very glad that they had refused those ambitious flatterers that sued for the charge, and had given it unto a man, that durst boldly and frankly tell them the troth. Marke how the ROMANES by yeelding unto reason and vertue, came to command all other, and to make themselves the mightiest people of the world. Now that Paulus Æmylius setting forward to this Warre, had wind at will, and faire passage to bring him to his journeyes end, I impute it to good fortune, that so quickly and safely conveyed him to his Campe. But for the rest of his exploits he did in all his Warre, part of them being performed by his owne hardinesse, other by his wisedome and good counsell, other by the diligence of his friends in serving him with good will, other by his owne resolute constancy and courage in extremest danger, and last, by his marvellous skill in determining at an instant what was to be done, I cannot attribute any notable act or worthy service unto this his good fortune they talke of so much, as they may doe in other Captaines doings: unlesse they will say peradventure, that Perseus covetousnesse and misery was Æmylius good fortune: for his miserable feare of spending Money, was the onely cause and destruction of the whole Realme of MACEDON, which was in good state and hope of continuing in prosperity. For there came down into the Countrey of MACEDON at King Perseus request, ten thousand Bastarnæ a Horse-backe, and as many Footmen to them, who alwayes joyned with them in battell, all mercenary Souldiers, depending upon pay and entertainment of Warres, as men that could not plow, nor sow, nor trafficke merchandizes by sea, nor skill of grazing to gain their living with: and to be short, that had no other occupation or merchandize, but to serve in the Warres, and to overcome those with whom they fought. Furthermore, when they came to incamp and lodge in the MEDICA, neare to the MACEDONIANS, who saw them so goodly great men, and so well trained and exercised in handling all kinde of Weapons, so brave and lusty in words and threats against their Enemies: they began to pluck up their hearts, and to looke bigge, imagining that the ROMANES would never abide them, but would be afraid to looke them in the face, and onely to see their march, it was so terrible and fearefull. But Perseus after he had encouraged his men in this sort, and had put them in such a hope and jollity, when this barbarous supply came to aske him a thousand Crownes in hand for every Captaine, he was so damped and troubled withall in his minde, calling up the summe it came to, that his only covetousnesse and misery made him returne them backe, and refuse their service: not as one that meant to fight with the ROMANES, but rather to spare his Treasure, and to be a husband for them, as if he should have given up a straight account unto them of his charges in this Warre, against whom he made it. And notwithstanding also his Enemies did teach him what he had to doe, considering that besides all other their warlike furniture and munition, they had no lesse then a hundred thousand fighting men lying in Campe together, ready to execute the Consuls commandment: yet he taking upon him to resist so puissant an Army, and to maintaine the Warres, which forced his Enemies to be at extreme charge in entertaining such multitudes of men, more then needed: hardly would depart with his Gold and Silver, but kept it safe locked up in his Treasury, as if he had been afraid to touch it, and had been none of his. And he did not shew that he came of the noble race of the Kings of LYDIA and PHOENICIA, who gloried to be rich: but shewed how by inheritance of bloud he challenged some part of the vertue of Philip, and of Alexander, who both because they esteemed to buy Victory with Money, not Money with Victory, did many notable things, and thereby conquered the world. Hereof came the common saying in old time, that it was not Philip, but his Gold and Silver that won the Cities of GREECE. And Alexander when he went to conquer the INDIES, seeing the MACEDONIANS carry with them all the wealth of PERSIA, which made his Campe very heavy, and slow to march: he himselfe first of all set fire on his owne Carriage that conveyed all his necessities, and perswaded other to doe the like, that they might march more lightly and easily on the journey. But Perseus contrarily would not spend any part of his Goods to save himselfe, his Children and Realme, but rather yielded to be led Prisoner in Triumph with a great Ranfome, to shew the ROMANES how good a husband he had beene for them. For he did not onely send away the GAULES without giving them pay as he had promised, but moreover having perswaded Gentius King of ILLYRIA to take his part in these Warres, for the summe of three hundred Talents which he had promised to furnish him with: he caused the Money to be told, and put up in bags by those whom Gentius sent to receive it. Whereupon Gentius thinking himselfe sure of the Money promised, committed a fond and foule part: for he stayed the Ambassadors the ROMANES sent unto him, and committed them to prison. This part being come to Perseus eares, he thought now he needed not hire him with Money to be an Enemy to the ROMANES, considering he had waded so farre, as that he had already done, was as a manifest signe of his ill will towards them; and that it was too late to looke backe and repent him, now that his foule part had plunged him into certaine Warres, for an uncertaine hope. So did he abuse the unfortunate King, and defrauded him of the three hundred Talents he had promised him. And worse then this, shortly after he suffered Lucius Ancius the ROMANE Prætor, whom they sent against him with an Army, to plucke King Gentius, his Wife and Children out of his Kingdome, and to carry them Prisoners with him. Now when Æmylius was arrived in MACEDON, to make Warre against such an Enemy, he made no manner of reckoning of his person, but of the great preparation and power he had. For in one Campe he had foure thousand Horsemen, and no lesse then forty thousand Footmen, with the which Army he had planted himselfe along the sea side, by the foot of the Mount Olympus, in a place impossible to be approached: and there he had so well fortified all the straights and passages unto him with fortifications of wood, that he thought himselfe to lie safe out of all danger, and imagined to dally with Æmylius, and by tract of time to eat him out with charge. Æmylius in the meane season lay not idle, but occupied his wits thoroughly, and left no meanes unattempted, to put something in prooffe. And perceiving that his Souldiers by overmuch licentious liberty (wherein by sufferance they lived before) were angry with delaying and lying still, and that they did busily occupy themselves in the Generals office, saying this, and such a thing would be done that is not done: he tooke them up roundly, and commanded them they should meddle no more too curiously in matters that pertained not to them, and that they should take care for nothing else, but to see their Armour and Weapon ready to serve valiantly, and to use their Swords after the ROMANE fashion, when their Generall should appoint and command them. Wherefore, to make them more carefull to looke to themselves, he commanded those that watched, should have no Spears nor Pikes, because they should be more wakefull, having no long Weapon to resist the Enemy, if they were assaulted. The greatest trouble his Army had, was lacke of fresh Water, because the Water that ran to the Sea, was very little, and marvellous foule by the Sea side. But Æmylius considering they were at the foot of the Mount Olympus (which is of a marvellous height, and full of Wood withall) conjectured, seeing the Trees so fresh and green, that there should be some little pretty Springs among them, which ran under the ground. So he made them dig many holes and Wells along the Mountaine, which were straight filled with faire Water, being pent within ground before for lacke of breaking open the heads, which then ran downe in streames, and met together in sundry places. And yet some doe deny, that there is any meeting of Waters within the ground, from whence the Springs doe come: and they say, that running out of the earth as they doe, it is not for that the Water breaketh out by any violence, or openeth in any place, as meeting together in one place of long time: but that it ingendred and riseth at the same time and place where it runneth not, turning the substance into Water, which is a moist vapour, thickened and made cold by the coldnesse of the earth, and so becometh a streame and runneth downe. For (say they) as Womens breasts are not alwayes full of Milk (as Milk-pans are, that continually keep Milk) but doe of themselves convert the nutriment Women take into Milke, and after cometh forth at their nipples, even so the Springs and watery places of the earth, from whence the Fountaines come, have no meetings of hidden Waters, nor hollow places so capable readily to deliver Water from them, as one would draw it out of a Pumpe or Cisterne, from so many Brooks, and deep Rivers: but by their naturall coldnesse and moisture, they wax thicke, and put forth the vapour and aire so strong, that they turne it into Water. And this is the reason why the places where they dig and open the earth, doe put forth more abundance of Water by opening the ground: like as Womens breasts doe give more Milke when they are most drawn and sucked, because in a sort they doe better feed the vapour within them, and convert it thereby into a running humour. Where to the contrary, those parts of the earth that are not digged, nor have no vent outward, are the more unable, and lesse meete to ingender Water having having not that provocation and course to runne, that causeth the bringing forth of moisture. Yet such as maintaine this opinion, doe give them occasion that love argument, to contrary them thus: Then we may say by like reason also, that in the bodies of beasts there is no bloud long before, and that it ingendred upon a fodaine, when they are hurt, by transferring of some spirit or flesh that readily changeth into some running liquor. And moreover, they are confuted by the common experience of those mine-men, that dig in the mines for mettall, or that undermine Castles to win them: who when they dig any great depth, doe many times meete in the bowels of the earth with running Rivers, the water whereof is not ingendred by little and little, as of necessity it should be, if it were true, that upon the present opening of the ground, the humour should immediately be created, but it falleth vehemently all at one time. And we see oftentimes, that in cutting thorow a Mountaine or Rocks, sodainely there runneth out a great quantity of water. And thus much for this matter. Now to returne to our History againe. Æmylius lay there a convenient time, and stirred not: and it is said there were never seen two so great Armies one so neare to the other, and to be so quiet. In the end, casting many things with himselfe, and devising sundry practises, he was informed of another way to enter into MACEDON, through the Countrey of PERRÆBIA, over against the Temple called Pythion, and the Rocks upon which it is built, where there lay no Garrison: which gave him better hope to passe that way, for that it was not kept, then that he feared the narrowesse and hardnesse of the way unto it. So he brake the matter of his counsel. Thereupon Scipio called Nasica (the Son adopted of that great Scipio the AFRICAN, who became afterwards a great man, and was President of the Senate or Coucell) was the first man that offered himselfe to lead them, whom it would please him to send to take that passage, and to assault their Enemies behinde. The second was Fabius Maximus, the eldest Son of Æmylius, who being but a very young man, rose notwithstanding, and offered himselfe very willingly. Æmylius was very glad of their offers, and gave them not so many men as Polybius writeth, but so many as Nasica himselfe declareth in a Letter of his he wrote to a King, where he reporteth all the story of this journey. There were Three thousand ITALIANS, leaved in ITALY, by the confederates of the ROMANES, who were not of the ROMANE Legions, and in the left wing about Five thousand. Besides those, Nasica took also One hundred and twenty men at Armes, and about Two hundred CRETANS and THRACIANS mingled together, of those Harpalus had sent thither. With this number Nasica departed from the Campe, and tooke his way toward the sea side, and lodged by the Temple of Hercules, as if he determined to doe this feate by sea, to environ the Campe of the Enemies behinde. But when the Souldiers had supped, and that it was darke night, he made the Captaines of every Band privy to his enterprize, and so marched all night a contrary way from the sea, untill at length they came under the Temple of Pythion, where he lodged to rest the Souldiers that were fore travelled all night. In this place, the mount Olympus is above ten furlongs high, as appeared in a place ingraven by him that measured it.

*Olympus mount is just, by measure made with line, Twelve hundred seventy paces trod, as measure can assigne.
The measure being made, right o're against the place, Whereas Apollos Temple stands, ybuilt with stately grace.
Even from the levell plot, of that same Countreys plaine, Unto the top which all on high, doth on the hill remaine.
And so Xenagoras the Sonne of Eumelus,
In olden dayes by measure made, the same did finde for us:
And did engrave it here in Writing for to see,
Whenas he tooke his latest leave (Apollo god) of thee.*

Yet the Geomitricians say that there is no Mountaine higher, nor Sea deeper, then the length of ten furlongs: so that I thinke this Xenagoras (in my opinion) did not take his measure at adventure, and by guesse, but by true rules of the Art and instruments Geometrical. There Nasica rested all night. King Perseus perceiving in the meane time that Æmylius stirred not from the place where he lay, mistrusting nothing his practise, and the coming of Nasica, who was at hand: untill such time as a Traytor of CRETE (Healing from Nasica) did reveale unto him the pretended practise, as also the ROMANES compassing of him about: he wondred much at these newes, howbeit he removed not his Campe from the place he lay in, but dispatched one of his Captaines called Milon, with Ten thousand Strangers, and Two thousand MACEDONIANS: and straightly commanded him with all the possible speed he could, to get the top of the hill before them. Polybius saith, that the ROMANES came and gave them an alarm, when they were sleeping: But Nasica writeth, that there was a marvellous sharpe and terrible Battell on the top of the Mountaine: and said plainly, that a THRACIAN Souldier coming towards him, he threw his Dart at him, and hitting him right in the brest, slew him stark dead: and having repulsed their Enemies, Milon their Captaine shamefully running away in his Coat without Armour or Weapon, he followed him without any danger, and so went downe to the valley, with the safety of all his Company. This conflict fortuning thus, Perseus raised his Campe in great haste from the place where he was, and being disappointed of his hope, he retired in great feare, as one at his wits end, and not knowing how to determine. Yet was he constrained either to stay, and incampe before the City of PYDNE, there to take the hazard of Battell, or else to divide his Army into his Cities and strong holds, and to receive the Warres within his own Countrey, the which being once crept in, could never be driven out againe, without great murder and bloudshed. Hereupon his friends did counsell him, to chuse rather the fortune of battell: alledging unto him, that he was the stronger in men a great way, and that the MACEDONIANS would fight lustily with all the courage they could, considering that they fought for the safety of their Wives and Children, and also in the presence of their King, who should both see every mans doing, and fight himselfe in person also for them. The King moved by these persuasions, determined to venture the chance of battell. So he pitched his Campe and viewed the situation of the places all about, and devided the Companies amongst his Captaines, purposing to give a hot charge upon the Enemies when they should draw neare. The place and Countrey was such, as being all champion, there was a goodly valley to range a battell of Footmen in, and little pretty hills also one depending upon another, which were very commodious for Archers, naked men, and such as were lightly armed, to retire themselves being distressed, and also to environ their enemies behinde. There were two small Rivers also, Æson and Lencus that ran through the same, the which though they were not very deepe, being about the latter end of Summer, yet they would annoy the ROMANES notwithstanding. Now when Æmylius was joyned with Nasica, he marched on straight in battell ray towards his enemies. But perceiving alarre off their battell marched in very good order, and the great multitude of men placed in the same: he wondred to behold it, and suddenly stayed his Army, considering with himselfe what he had to doe. Then the young Captaines having charge under him, desirous to fight it out presently, went unto him to pray him to give the onset, but Nasica specially above the rest, having good hope in the former good lucke he had at his first encounter. Æmylius smiling, answered him: So would I doe if I were as young as thou; But the sundry Victories I have wonne heretofore, having taught me by experience the faults the vanquished doe commit, doe forbid me to goe so hotly to worke (before my Souldiers have rested, which did returne but now) to assault an Army set in such order of battell. When he had answered him thus, he commanded the first Bands that were now in view of the Enemies, should embattle themselves, shewing a countenance to the Enemy as though they would fight; and that those in the reuerd should lodge in the meane time, and fortifie the Campe: So, bringing the foremost men to be hindmost, by changing from man to man, before the Enemies were aware of it; he had broken his battell by little and little, and lodged his men, fortified within the Campe without any tumult or noyse, and the enemies never perceiving it. But when night came, and every man had supped, as they were going to sleepe and take their rest; the Moone which was at the full, and of a great height, began to darken and to change into many sorts of colours, losing her light, untill such time as she vanished away, and was eclipsed altogether. Then the ROMANES began to make a noyse with Bassons and Pans, as their fashion is to doe in such a chance, thinking by this sound to call her againe, and to make her come to her light, lifting up many Torchcs lighted and firebrands into the aire. The MACEDONIANS on the other side did no such matter within the Campe, but were altogether stricken with an horrible feare: and there ranne a whispering rumour through the people, that this signe in the element signified the eclipse of the King. For Æmylius was not ignorant of the diversities of the eclipses, and he had heard say the cause is, by reason that the Moone making her ordinary course about the world (after certaine revolutions of time) doth come to enter into the round shadow of the earth, within the which she remaineth hidden, untill such time as having past the darke region of the shadow, she cometh afterwards to recover her light which she taketh of the Sunne. Nevertheless, he being a godly devout man, so soone as he perceived the Moone had recovered her former brightnesse againe, he sacrificed eleven Calves. And the next morning also by the breake of day, making sacrifice to Hercules, he could never have any signes or tokens that promised him good luck, in sacrificing twenty Oxen one after another: but at the one and twentieth he had signes that promised him victory, so he defended himselfe. Wherefore, after he had vowed a solemne sacrifice of an hundred Oxen to Hercules, and also Games of prizes at the Weapons, he commanded his Captaines to put their men in readinesse to fight: and so fought to win time, tarrying till the Sunne came about in the afternoone towards the West, to the end that the ROMANES which were turned towards the East, should not have it in their faces when they were fighting. In the meane time, he reposed himselfe in his Tent, which was all open behind towards the side that looked into the valley, where the Campe of his Enemies lay. When it grew towards night, to make the Enemies set upon his men, some say he used this policy. He made a Horse be driven towards them without a bridle, and certaine ROMANES followed him, as they would have taken him againe: and this was the cause of procuring the skirmish. Other say, that the THRACIANS serving under the charge of Captaine Alexander, did set upon certaine forragers of the ROMANES, that brought forrage into the Campe: out of the which, seven hundred of the LIGURIANS ranne suddenly to the rescue, and reliefe coming still from both Armies, at the last the maine battell followed after. Wherefore Æmylius like a wife Generall foreseeing by the danger of this skirmish, and the stirring of both Campes, what the fury of the battell would come to: came out of his Tent, and passing by the Bands did encourage them, and prayed them to sticke to it like men. In the meane time, Nasica thrusting himselfe into the place where the skirmish was hottest, perceived the Army of the Enemies marching in battell ready to joyn. The first that marched in the vaward were the THRACIANS, who seemed terrible to looke upon, as he writeth himselfe: for they were mighty made men, and carried marvellous bright Targets of Steele before them, their legges were armed with Greaves, and their thighs with Tases, their Coates were blacke, and marched shaking heavy Halberds upon their shoulders. Next unto these THRACIANS, there followed them all the other strangers and Souldiers whom the King had had hired, diversly armed and set forth: for they were people of sundry Nations gathered together; among whom the PAONIANS were mingled. The third Squadron was of MACEDONIANS, and all of them chosen men, as well for the flower of their youth, as for the valliantnesse of their persons: and they were all in goodly gilt armours, and brave purple cassocks upon them, spicke and span new. And at their backs came after them, the old bands to shew themselves out of the Campe with Targets of Copper, that made all the Plaine to shine with the brightnesse of their Steele and Copper. And all the Hills and Mountaines thereabouts did ring againe like an Echo, with the cry and noyse of so many fighting men, one encouraging another. In this order they marched so fiercely with so great heart-burning, and such swiftnesse; that the first which were slaine at the encounter, fell dead two furlongs from the Campe of the ROMANES. The charge being given and the battell begonne, Æmylius galloping to the vaward of the Battell, perceived that the Captains of the MACEDONIANS which were in the first rankes, had already thrust their Pikes into the ROMANES Targets, so as they could not come neare them with their Swords: and that the other MACEDONIANS carrying their Targets behinde them, had now plucked them before them, and did bafe their Pikes all at one time, and made a violent thrust into the Targets of the ROMANES. Which when he had considered, and of what strength and force his wall and ranke of Targets was, one joyning so neere another, and what a terrour it was to see a front of a battell with so many armed Pikes and Steele heads: he was more afraid and amazed withall, then with any fight he ever saw before, nevertheless he could wisely dissemble it at that time. And so passing by the companies of his Horsemen, without either Caraces or Helmet upon his head, he shewed a noble cheerefull countenance unto them that fought. But on the contrary side, Perseus the King of MACEDON, as Polybius writeth, so soone as the battell was begun, withdrew himselfe, and got into the City of PYDNE, under pretence to goe to doe sacrifice unto Hercules: who doth not accept the faint sacrifice of Cowards, neither doth receive their Prayers, because they be unreasonable. For it is no reason, that he that shooteth not should hit the white: nor that he should win the victory, that bideth not the battell; neither that he should have any good, that doth nothing towards it: nor that a naughty man should be fortunate and prosper. The gods did favour Æmylius prayers, because he prayed for victory with his Sword in his hand, and fighting did call to them for aide. Howbeit there is one Pofidonius a Writer, who saith he was in that time, and moreover that he was at the Battell: and he hath written an History containing many Books of the Acts of King Perseus; where he saith, That it was not for faint heart, nor under colour to sacrifice unto Hercules, that Perseus went from the Battell, but because he had a stripe of an Horse on the thigh the day before: who though he could not very well helpe himselfe, and that all his friends sought to perswade him not to go to the Battell, yet he caused one of his Horses to be brought to him notwithstanding (which he commonly used to ride up and downe on) and taking his backe, rode into the Battell unarmed, where an infinite number of Darts were throwne at him from both sides. And among those, he had a blow with a Dart that hurt him somewhat, but it was overthwart, and not with the point, and did hit him on the left side glancing wife, with such a force, that it rent his coat, and rased his skin underneath, so as it left a marke behind a long time after: And this is all that Pofidonius writeth to defend and excuse Perseus. The ROMANES having their hands full, and being stayed by the battell of the MACEDONIANS that they could make no breach into them; there was a Captaine of the PELIGNIANS called Salus, who took the Ensigne of his Band, and cast it among the prease of his enemies. Then all the PELIGNIANS set upon them, with a marvellous force and fury in that place: for all ITALIANS thinke it too greete a shame and dishonour for Souldiers to lose or forsake their Ensigne. Thus was there marvellous force of both sides used in that place: for the PELIGNIANS proved to cut the MACEDONIANS Pikes with their Swords, or else to make them give backe with their great Targets, or to make a breach into them, and to take their Pikes with their hands. But the MACEDONIANS to the contrary holding their Pikes fast with both hands, ran them through that came neere unto them, so that neither Target nor Corset could hold out the force and violence of the push of their Pikes, inso much as they turned up the heeles of the PELIGNIANS and THRACIANS, who like desperate beafts without reason, thrusting in themselves among their enemies, ran wilfully upon their owne deaths, and their first ranke were slaine every man of them. Thereupon those that were behinde, gave backe a little, but fled not turning their backs, and only retired giving backe towards the Mountaine Olocrus. Æmylius seeing that (as Pofidonius writeth) rent his arming coate from his backe for anger, because that some of his men gave backe: other durst not front the battell of the MACEDONIANS, which was so strongly imbattelled on every side and so mured in with a wall of Pikes, presenting their armed heads on every side a man could come, that it was impossible to breake into them, no not so much as come neere them only. Yet notwithstanding, because the field was not altogether plaine and even, the battell that was large in the front, could not always keepe that wall, continuing their Targets close one to another, but they were driven of necessity to breake and open in many places, as it happeneth oft in great battells, according to the great force of the Souldiers: that in one place they thrust forward, and in another they give backe, and leave a hole. Wherefore Æmylius suddenly taking the vantage of this occasion, devided his men into small companies, and commanded them they should quickly thrust in between their enemies, and occupy the places they saw void in the front of their enemies, and that they should set on them in that sort, and not with one whole continual charge, but occupying them here and there with divers companies in sundry places. Æmylius gave this charge unto the private Captaines of every Band and their

Lieutenants, and the Captaines also gave the like charge unto their Souldiers that could skilfully execute their commandement. For they went presently into those parts where they saw the places open, and being once entred in among them, some gave charge upon the flankes of the MACEDONIANS, where they were all naked and unarmed: other set upon them behind, so that the strength of all the corpses of the battell (which consisteth in keeping close together) being opened in this sort, was straight overthrowne. Furthermore, when they came to fight man for man, or a few against a few, the MACEDONIANS with their little short Swords, came to strike upon the great Shields of the ROMANES, which were very strong, and covered all their bodies downe to the foote. And they to the contrary, were driven of necessity to receive the blowes of the strong heavy swords of the ROMANES, upon their light weake Targets, so that what with their heavinesse, and vehement force wherewith the blowes lighted upon them, there was no Target nor Corset, but they passed it through, and ran them in: by reason whereof they could make no long resistance, whereupon they turned their backs and ran away. But when they came to the Squadron of the old beaten Souldiers of the MACEDONIANS, there was the cruellest fight and most desperate service, where they say that Marcus Cato (Sonne of great Cato, and Sonne in law of Æmylius) shewing all the valiantnesse in his person that a noble minde could possibly performe, lost his Sword which fell out of his hand. But he like a young man of noble courage, that had been valiantly brought up in all discipline, and knew how to follow the steps of his Father (the noblest person that ever man saw) was to shew then his valour and worthinesse, and thought it more honour for him there to die, then living to suffer his enemies to enjoy any spoile of his. So, by and by he ran into the ROMANE Army, to finde out some of his friends, whom he told what had befallen him, and prayed them to helpe him to recover his Sword; whereto they agreed. And being a good company of lusty valiant Souldiers together, they rushed straight among their enemies, at the place where he brought them, and so did set upon them with such force and fury, that they made a lane through the middelt of them, and with great slaughter and spilling of blood, even by plaine force, they cleared the way still before them. Now when the place was voided, they fought for the Sword, and in the end found it with great ado, amongst a heape of other Swords and dead bodies; whereto they joyced marvellously. Then singeing a long of victory, they went againe more fiercely then before to give a charge upon their enemies, who were not yet broken asunder: untill such time as at the length, the three thousand chosen MACEDONIANS fighting valiantly even to the last man, and never forsaking their ranks, were all slaine in the place. After whose overthrow, there was a great slaughter of other also that fled, so that all the valley and foote of the mountains thereabouts was covered with dead bodies. The next day after the battell, when the ROMANES did passe over the River Leucus, they found it running all bloody. For it is said there were slaine at this field of Perseus men above five and twenty thousand: and of the ROMANES side, as Pofidonius saith, not above sixscore; or as Nasica writeth, but fourscore onely. And for so great an overthrow, it is reported it was wonderfull quickly done and executed: for they began to fight about three of the clocke in the afternoone, and had wonne the victory before foure, and all the rest of the day they followed their enemies in chase, an hundred and twenty furlongs from the place where the battell was fought, so that it was very late, and farre forth night, before they returned againe into the Campe. So such as returned, were received with marvellous great joy of their Pages, that went out with Linkes and Torches lighted, to bring their Masters into their Tents, where their men had made great bonfires, and decked them up with Crownes and Garlands of Laurel, saving the Generals Tent onely; who was very heavy, for that of his two Sonnes he brought with him to the warres, the younger could not be found, which he loved best of the twaine, because he saw he was of a better nature then the rest of his brethren. For even then, being new crept out of the shell as it were, he was marvellous valiant and hardy, and desired honour wonderfully. Now Æmylius thought he had been cast away, fearing lest for lacke of experience in the warres, and through the rashnesse of his youth, he had put himselfe too farre in fight amongst the prease of the enemies. Hereupon the Campe heard straight what sorrow Æmylius was in, and how grievously he tooke it. The ROMANES being set at supper, rose from their meate, and with Torch-light some ran to Æmylius Tent, other went out of the Campe to seeke him among the dead bodies, if they might know him: so all the Campe was full of sorrow and mourning, the valleys and hills all about did ring againe with the cries of those that called Scipio aloud. For even from his childhood he had a naturall gift in him, of all the rare and singular parts required in a Captaine and wife Governour of the Common-weale, above all the young men of his time. At the last, when they were out of all hope of his coming againe, he happily returned from the chase of the enemies, with two or three of his familiars onely, all bloudied with new blood (like a swift running Greyhound fleshed with the blood of the Hare) having pursued very farre for joy of the victory. It is that Scipio which afterwards destroyed both the Cities of CARTHAGE and NUMANTIUM, who was the greatest man of war and valiantest Captain of the ROMANES in his time, and of the greatest authority and reputation among them. Thus fortune deferring till another time the execution of her spite, which she did bear to so noble an exploit, suffered Æmylius for that time, to take his full pleasure of that noble victory. And as for Perseus, he fled first from the City of Pydna, unto the City of PELLA, with his horsemen, which were in manner all saved. Whereupon the footmen that saved themselves by flying, meeting them by the way, called them Traitors, Cowards, and Villains, and worse then that, they turned them off their Horsebacks, and fought it out lustily with them. Perseus seeing that, and fearing lest this mutiny might turn to light light on his neck, he turned his horse out of the High-way, and pulled off his Purple coat, and carried it before him, and took his Diadem in his hand, fearing to be known thereby, and that he might the more easily speak with his friends by the way, he lighted on foot, and led his Horse in his hand. But such as were about him, one made as though he would mend the latchet of his shoos, another seemed to water his Horse, another as though he would drink; so that one dragging after another in this sort, they all left him at the last, and ran their way, not fearing the enemies fury so much as their Kings cruelty: who being grieved with his misfortune, fought to lay the fault of the overthrow upon all other but himself. Now he being come into the City of PELLA by night, Enllus and Endeus, two of his Treasurers came unto him, and speaking boldly (but out of time) presumed to tell him the great fault he had committed, and to counsell him what he should doe. The King was so moved with their presumption, that with his owne hands he stabbed his Dagger in them both, and slew them outright. But after this fact, all his servants and friends refused him, and there only tarried with him but Evander CRETAN, Archedamus ETOLIAN, and Nes BOEOTIAN. And as for the meane Souldiers, there were none that followed him but the CRETANS, and yet it was not for the good will they did beare him, but for the love of his gold and silver; as Bees that keepe their hives for love of the Honey: for he carried with him a great Treasure, and gave them leave to spoile certaine Plate and vessels of gold and silver, to the value of fifty Talents. But first of all when he was come into the City of AMPHIPOLIS, and afterwards into the City of ALEPSE, and that the feare was well blowne over, he returned againe to his old humour which was borne and bred with him, and that was avarice and misery: for he complained unto those that were about him, that he had unwares given to the Souldiers of CRETA, his Plate and vessel of gold to be spoiled, being those which in old time belonged unto Alexander the Great: and prayed them with teares in his eyes that had the Plate, they would be contented to change it for ready Money. Now such as knew his nature, found straight this was but a fraud and a CRETAN lye, to deceive the CRETANS with: but those that trusted him, and did restore againe the Plate they had, did lose it every jot, for he never payed them penny for it. So he got of his friends the value of thirty Talents, which his enemies soon after did take from him. And with that summe he went into the Isle of SAMOTHRACIA, where he tooke the sanctuary and priviledge of the Temple of Castor and Pollux. They say, that the MACEDONIANS of long continuance did naturally love their Kings: but then seeing all their hope and expectation broken, their hearts failed them, and broke withall. For they all came and submitted themselves to Æmylius, and made him Lord of the whole Realme of MACEDON, in two dayes: and this doth seem to confirm their words, who impute all Æmylius doings unto his good fortune. And surely, the marvellous fortune he happened on in the City AMPHIPOLIS, doth confirme it much, which a man cannot ascribe otherwise, but to the speciall grace of the gods. For one day beginning to doe sacrifice, lightning fell from Heaven, and set all the wood on fire upon the Altar, and sanctified the sacrifice. But yet the miracle of his fanie is more to be wondred at. For four daies after Perseus had lost the battell, and that the City of PELLA was taken, as the people of ROME were at the Lifts or shew-place, seeing Horses run for Games: suddenly there arose a rumour at the entering into the Lifts where the Games were, that Æmylius had wonne a great battell of King Perseus, and had conquered all MACEDON. This newes was rife straight in every mans mouth, and there followed upon it a marvellous joy and great cheere in every corner, with shouts and clapping of hands, that continued all the day through the City of ROME. Afterwards they made diligent enquiry, how this rumour first came up, but no certaine authour could be knowne, and every man said they heard it spoken: so as in the end it came to nothing, and passed away in that sort for a time. But shortly after, there came Letters, and certaine newes, that made them wonder more then before, from whence the messenger came that reported the first newes of it, which could be deviled by no naturall meanes, and yet proved true afterwards. We doe reade also of a battell that was fought in ITALY, neare unto the River of SAGRA, whereof newes was brought the very same day unto PAULOPONNESUS. And of another also in like manner that was fought in ASIA against the MEDES, before the City of MYCALA: the newes whereof came the same day unto the Campe of the GRECIANS, lying before the City of PLATOES. And in that great journey where the ROMANES overthrow the Tarquins, and the Army of the LATINES: immediately after the battell was wonne, they saw two goodly young men come newly from the Campe, who brought newes of the victory to ROME, and they judged they were Castor and Pollux. The first man that spake to them in the market-place before the Fountaine, where they watered their Horses being all of a white foame, told them, that he wondered how they could so quickly bring these newes. And they laughing came to him, and tooke him softly by the beard with both their hands, and even in the market-place his haire being black before, was presently turned yellow. This miracle made them beleeve the report the man made, who ever after was called Enobarbus, as you would say, bearded as yellow as gold. Another like matter that happened in our time maketh all such newes credible: For when Antonius rebelled against the Emperour Domitian, the City of ROME was in a marvellous perplexity, because they looked for great warres towards GERMANIE. But in this feare there grew a sudden rumour of victory, and it went currantly through ROME, that Antonius himselfe was slaine, and all his Army overthrowne, and not a man left alive. This rumour was so rife, that many of the chieft men of ROME beleeved it, and did sacrifice thereupon unto their gods, giving them thanks for the victory. But when the matter came to sitting, who was the first authour of the rumour, no man could tell: for one put it over still to another, and it died so in the end amongst the people, as in a bottomlesse matter, for they they could never bould out any certaine ground of it: but even as it came flying into ROME, so went it flying away againe, no man could tell how. Notwithstanding Domitian holding on his journey to make this Warre, met with Poets that brought him Letters of the certaine victory: and remembering the rumour of the victory that ran before in ROME, he found it true, that it was on the very same day the victory was gotten; and the distance between ROME and the place where the field was wonne, was above twenty thousand furlongs off. Every man in our time knoweth this to be true. But againe he was, for the reverence he did beare unto the gods Cæsar and Pollux: but he did besiege him in such fort, as he could not scape him, nor flie by sea out of the Island. Yet he had secretly practised with one Oroandes a CRETAN, that had a Brigantine, and was at a price with him for a sum of Mo-ney to convey him away by night: But the CRETAN served him a right CRETAN trick: For when he had taken aboard by night into his vessell, all the Kings treasure of gold and silver, he sent him word, that he should not faile the next night following, to come into the Peere by the Temple of Ceres, with his Wife, his Children and Servants, where indeed was no possibility to take shipping; but the next night following he hoisted saile, and got him away. It was a pittifull thing that Perseus was driven to doe and suffer at that time. For he came downe in the night by ropes, out of a little straight window upon the wals, and not only himself, but his Wife and little babes, who never knew before what flying and hardnesse meant. And yet he fetched a more grievous bitter sigh, when one told him on the Peere, that he saw Oroandes the CRETAN under saile in the maine seas. Then day beginning to breake, and seeing himselfe void of all hope, he ran with his Wife for life to the wall, to recover the sanctuary againe, before the ROMANES that saw him could overtake him. And as for his Children, he had given them himselfe into the hands of one Ion, whom before he had mar- vellously loved, and who did then traiterously betray him: for he delivered his Children unto the ROMANES. Which part was one of the chiefest causes that drave him (as a beast that will follow her little ones being taken from her) to yeeld himselfe into their hands that had his Children. Now he had a speciall confidence in Scipio Nasica, and therefore he asked for him when he came to yeeld himselfe: but it was answered him, that he was not there. Then he began to lament his hard and miserable fortune every way. And in the end, considering how necessity enforced him, he yeelded himselfe into the hands of Cnens Octavius; wherein he shewed plainly, that he had another vice in him more unmanly and vile, then avarice; that was, a faint heart, and feare to die. But hereby he deprived himselfe of others pity and compassion towards him, being that only thing which fortune cannot deny and take from the afflicted, and specially from them that have a noble heart. For he made request they would bring him unto the Generall Æmylius, who rose from his chaire when he saw him come, and went to meete him with his friends, the water standing in his eyes, to meete a great King, by fortune of warre and by the will of the gods, fallen into that most lamentable state. But he to the contrary, unmanly, and shamefully behaved himselfe. For he fell downe at his feete, and embraced his knees, and uttered such uncomely speech and vile requests, as Æmylius selfe could not abide to heare them: but knitting his browes against him, being heartily offended, he spake thus unto him: "Alas poore man, Why dost thou discharge fortune of this fault, where thou mightest justly charge and accuse her of thy discharge, doing things, for the which every one judgeth thou hast deserved thy present misery, and art unworthy also of thy former honour? Why dost thou "defame my victory, and blemish the glory of my doings, shewing thy selfe so base a man, as my "honour is not great to overcome so unworthy an enemy? The ROMANES have ever esteemed "magnanimity, even in their greatest enemies: but dastardlinesse, though it be fortunate, yet it is "hated of every body. Notwithstanding, he tooke him up; and taking him by the hand, gave him into the custody of Ælius Tubero. Then Æmylius went into his Tent; and carried his Sonnes and Sonnes in law with him, and other men of quality, and specially the younger fort. And being set downe, he continued a great space very pensive with himselfe, not speaking a word; infomuch that all the standers by wondered much at the matter. In the end he began to enter into discourse and talke of fortune, and the unconstancy of these worldly things, and said unto them: "Is there any man "living, my friends, who having fortune at will, should therefore boast and glory in the prosperity "of his doings, for that he had conquered a Country, City or Realme: and not rather to feare the "unconstancy of fortune? who laying before our eyes, and all those that professe armes at this pre- "sent, so notable an example of the common frailty of men, doth plainly teach us to thinke, that "there is nothing constant or perdurable in this world. For when is it that men may think them- "selves assured, considering that when they have overcome others, then are they driven to mistrust "fortune most, and to mingle feare and mistrust with joy of victory: if they will wisely consider the "common course of fatal destiny that altereth daily, sometime favouring one, otherwhile throwing "downe another? You see, that in an hours space we have trodden under our feete the house of "Alexander the Great: who hath been the mightiest and most redoubted Prince of the world. You "see a King that not long since was followed and accompanied, with many thousand Souldiers of "Horsemen and Footemen, brought at this present into such miserable extremity, that he is enforced "to receive his meate and drinke daily at the hands of his enemies. Should we have any better hope "then, that fortune will alwayes favour our doings, more then she doth now his at this present? "no out of doubt. Therefore digesting this matter well, you young men I say, be not too brag nor "foolish proud of this conquest and noble victory; but thinke what may happen hereafter, marking

"to what end fortune will turne the envy of this our present prosperity. Such were Æmylius words to these young men as it is reported, bridling by these and such like perfwasions, the lusty garrisons to refresh them; and went himselfe in person in the meane time to visit GRECE, making it an honourable progresse, and also a commendable. For as he passed through the Cities, he relieved the people, reformed the government of their State, and ever gave them some gift or present. Unto some he gave Corne, which King Perseus had gathered for the Warres: and unto other he gave Oyles, meeting with so great store of provision, that he rather lacked people to give it unto, to receive it at his hands, then wanting to give, there was so much. As he passed by the City of DEIPHES, he saw there a great Pillar, foure square, of white stone, which they had set up, to put King Perseus image of gold upon it. Whereupon he commanded them to set up his in that place, saying: It was reason the conquered should give place unto the Conquerours. And being in the City of OLYMPIA, visiting the Temple of Jupiter Olympia, he spake thus openly, which ever since hath been remembered: that Phidias had rightly made Jupiter, as Homer had described him. Afterwards when the ten Ambassadors were arrived that were sent from ROME to establish with him the Realm of MACEDON, he redelivered the MACEDONIANS their Country and Townes againe, to live at liberty, according to their Lawes, paying yearly to the ROMANES for Tribute, a hundred Talents: where before they were wont to pay unto their Kings ten times as much. And he made Playes and Games of all sorts, and did celebrate sumptuous Sacrifices unto the gods. He kept open Court to all comers, and made noble Feasts, and defrayed the whole charge thereof, with the Treasure King Perseus had gathered together, sparing for no cost. But through his care and foresight, there was a speciall good order taken, every man so courteously received and welcomed, and so orderly marshalled at the Table according to their estate and calling, that the GRECIANS wondred to see him so careful in matters of sport and pleasure: and that he tooke as great paines in his owne person, to see that small matters should be ordered as they ought, as he tooke regard for discharge of more weighty causes. But this was a marvellous pleasure to him, to see that among such sumptuous sights prepared to shew pleasure to the persons invited, no fight nor stately shew did so delight them, as to enjoy the sight and company of his person. So he told them, that seemed to wonder at his diligence and care in these matters: that to order a feast well, required as great judgment and discretion, as to set a battell: to make the one fearefull to the enemies, and the other acceptable to his friends. But men esteemed his bounty and magnanimity for his best vertue and quality. For he did not only refuse to see the Kings wonderfull treasure of Gold and Silver, but caused it to be told and delivered to the custody of the Treasurers, to carry to the coffers of store in ROME: and only suffered his Sonnes that were learned, to take the Bookes of the Kings Library. When he did reward the Souldiers for their valiant service in this Battell, he gave his Sonne in law Ælius Tubero a Cup, weighing five Talents. It is the same Tubero who told you of before, who lived with sixteen other of his Kin all in one house, and of the only revenue they had of a little Farme in the Country. Some say, that that Cup was the first piece of Plate that ever came into the house of the Ælyans; and yet it came for honour and reward of vertue: but before that time, neither themselves, nor their Wives, would ever have, or wear any Gold or Silver. After he had very well ordered and disposed all things, at the last he tooke leave of the GRECIANS, and counseled the MACEDONIANS to remember the liberty the ROMANES had given them, and that they should be careful to keepe it, by their good government and concord together. Then he departed from them, and tooke his journey towards the Countrey of EBYRUS, having received Commission from the Senate of ROME, to suffer his Souldiers who had done service in the Battell, and overthrow of King Perseus, to spoile all the Cities of that Countrey. Wherefore that he might surprisethem on a sudden, and that they should mistrust nothing, he sent to all the Cities that they should send him by a certaine day, ten of the chiefest men of every City. Who when they were come, he commanded them to goe and bring him by such a day, all the Gold and Silver they had within their Cities, as well in their private houses, as in their Temples and Churches, and gave unto every one of them a Capitaine and Garrison with them, as if it had beene only to have received and searched for the Gold and Silver he demanded. But when the day appointed was come, the Souldiers in divers places (and all at one time) set upon their enemies, and did rife and spoile them of that they had, and made them also pay ran- some every man: so as by this policie, they were taken and made slaves in one day, a hundred and fifty thousand persons, and threescore and ten Cities spoiled and sacked every one; and yet when they came to divide the spoile of this generall destruction of a whole Realme by the poll, it came not to every Souldiers part, above eleven silver Drachmes apiece: Which made every one to wonder greatly, and to feare also the terror of the Warres, to see the wealth and riches of so great a Realme, to mount to so little for every mans share. When Æmylius had done this fact against his owne nature, which was very gentle and courteous, he went unto the sea side to the City of ORICA, and there embarked with his Army bound for ITALY. Where when he was arrived, he went up the River of Tyber against the streame, in King Perseus chiefe Galley, which had sixteen oares on a side, richly set out with the Armour of the Prisoners, rich clothes of purple colour, and other such spoiles of the Enemies: so that the ROMANES running out of ROME in multitudes of people to see his Galley, and going side by side by her as they rowed softly, Æmylius tooke as great pleasure in it, as in any open Games or Feasts, or Triumph that had been shewed indeed. But when the Souldiers saw, that the Gold and Silver of King Perseus Treasure was not divided amongst them according unto promise, and they had a great deale lesse then they looked for, they were marvellously offend-ded, and inwardly grudged Æmylius in their hearts. Neverthelesse they durst not speake it openly, but did accuse him, that he had bene too straight unto them in this warre: and therefore they did shew no great desire nor forwardnesse, to procure him the honour of Triumph. Which Servius Galba understanding, that had bene an old enemy of his, notwithstanding he had the charge of a thousand men under him in this Warre: he like an envious viper told the people, that Æmylius had not deserved the honour of Triumph, and sowed seditious words against him among the Souldiers, to aggravate their ill will the more against him. Moreover he craved a day of the Tribunes of the people, to have respite to bring forth such matter as they determined to object against him: saying, the time then was farre spent, the Sunne being but foure houres high, and that it would require longer time and leisure. The Tribunes made him answer, that he should speake then what he had to say against him, or otherwise they would not grant him audience. Hereupon he began to make a long Oration in the mount of the Capitoll, full of railing words, and spent all the rest of the day in that railing Oration. Afterwards when night came on, the Tribunes brake up the Assembly, and the next morning the Souldiers being encouraged by Galbaes Oration, and having confedered together, did flock about Galba in the mount of the Capitoll, where the Tribunes had given warning they would keepe their assembly. Now being broad day, Æmylius Triumph was referred to the most number of voices of the people, and the first Tribe flatly did deny his Triumph. The Senate, and the residue of the people hearing that, were very sorry to see they did Æmylius so open wrong and injury.

The common people said nothing to it, but seemed to be very sorry, howbeit they sought no redresse.
The Lords of the Senate cried out upon them, and said, it was too much shame; and exhorted one another to bridle the insolency and boldnesse of those Souldiers, who would grow in the end to such tumult and disorder, that they would commit all mischief and wickednesse, if betimes they were not looked to and prevented, seeing they did so openly stand against their Generall, seeking to deprive him of the honour of his Triumph and victory. So they assembled a good company of them together, and went up to the Capitoll, and prayed the Tribunes they would stay to take the voices of the peoples, untill they had acquainted them with such needfull matter as they had to open unto them.
The Tribunes granted to it, and silence was made. Then Marcus Servilius, who had bene Consul, and had fought three and twenty combats of life and death in his owne person, and had alwayes slaine as many of his enemies as challenged him man for man; rose up, and spake in favour of Æmylius in this matter: "I know now (said he) better then before, how noble and worthy a Captaine
" Paulus Æmylius is, who hath atchieved such glory and honourable victory, with so dishonour" rable and disobedient Souldiers. And I can but wonder that the people not long since rejoiced and " made great account of the Victories and Triumphs won upon the ILLYRIANS and other Nations
" of AFRICK: and that now they should for spite envy his glory (doing what lyeth in them to hin" der) to bring a MACE DONIAN King alive in a Triumph, and to shew the glory and greatnesse of " King Philip and Alexander the Great, subdued by the ROMANES force and power. What reason
" have ye, that not long since, upon a flying rumour that Æmylius had won the battell against Per-
" seus, you straight made sacrifice to the gods with great joy, praying them that you might be witnes" ses of the truth thereof: and now that the person himselfe whom ye made Generall is returned " home, and doth deliver you most assured victory, you do frustrate the Gods most solemne thanks
" and honour due to them, and do deprive your selves also of your wonted glory in such a case: as if " you were afraid to see the greatnesse of your prosperity, or that you meant to pardon a King, your " slave and prisoner. And yet of the two, you have more reason to hinder the Triumph, as pitying the " King, then envying your Captaine. But the malice of the wicked, through your patience is grown " to such an insolent audacity and boldnesse, that we see men present here before us, which never went " from the smoke of the chimney, nor carried away any blowes in the field, being crammed at
" home like Women and house-Doves; and yet they are so impudent and shamelesse, as they dare
" presume unreverently to your faces, to prate of the office and duty of a Generall of an Army, and " of the desert of Triumph, before you I say, who by experience of many a fore cut and wound upon " your bodies in the Warres, have learned to know a good and valiant Captaine, from a vile and " cowardly person. And speaking these words, he cast open his Gowne, and shewed before them " all the infinite scarres and cuts he had received upon his breast: and then turning him behind, shew-
" ed all such places as were not fit to be seene openly, and so turned himselfe againe to Galba, and
" said unto him: "Thou mockest me for that I shew thee: but I rejoyce before my Countrymen and " Citizens, that for serving my Country night and day on horse-backe, I have these wounds upon " me which thou seest. Now get thee about thy businesse and receive their voices; and I will come " after, noting them that are naughty and unthankfull Citizens, who like to be soothed with flattery,
" and not stoutly commanded, as behoved a Generall in the Warre. These words so reined the hard-
" headed Souldiers with the curbe of reason, that all the other Tribes agreed in one, and granted
" Æmylius Triumph: the order and solemnity whereof was performed in this sort. First, the people " having set up sundry scaffolds, as well in the Lifts and field called Circos by the LATINES, where
" the Games and common running of Horses and Chariots are made, as also about the market-place,
" and in other streets of the City, in the which the shew of the Triumph should passe: they all pre" sented themselves in their best Gownes to see the magnificence and state thereof. All the Temples
" of the gods also were set wide open, hanged full of Garlands of Flowers, and all perfumed within:
" and there were set through all the quarters of the City, numbers of Sergeants and other Officers " holding holding Tipstaves in their hands to order the stragling people, and to keepe them up in corners and Lanes ends, that they should not pester the Streets, and hinder the Triumph. Furthermore the sight of this Triumph was to continue three dayes, whereof the first was scant sufficient to see the passing by of the Images, Tables, Pictures, and Statues of wonderfull bignesse, all won and gotten of their Enemies, and drawn in the shew upon two hundred and fifty Chariots. The second day, there was carried upon a number of Carts, all the fairest and richest Armour of the MACE DONIANS, as well of Copper, as also of Iron and Steele, all glittering bright, being newly furbished, and artificially laid in order (and yet in such sort, as if they had been cast in heapes one upon another, without taking any care otherwise for the ordering and laying of them) faire Burganets upon Targets: Habergions, or Brigantines and Corlets, upon Graves: round Targets of the CRETANS, and Javelins of the THRACIANS, and Arrows amongst the armed Pikes: all this Armour and carriage, being bound one to another so trimly (neither being too loose, nor too straight) that one hitting against another, as they drew them upon the Carts through the City, they made such a sound and noise, as it was fearful to heare it: so that the only sight of these spoiles of the captives being overcome, made the sight so much more terrible to behold: after these Carts laden with Armour, there followed three thousand Men, which carried the ready Money in seven hundred and fifty Vessels, which weighed about three Talents apeece, and every one of them were carried by foure men: and there were other that carried great Bolles of Silver, Cups and Goblets fashioned like pitchers, and other Pots to drinke in, goodly to behold, as well for their bignesse, as for their great and singular imbofled workes about them. The third day early in the morning the Trumpets began to sound and set forwards, sounding no march nor sweet note, to beautifie the Triumph withall: but they blew out the brave alarum, the sound at an assault, to give the Souldiers courage for to fight. After them followed sixscore goodly fat Oxen, having all their hornes gult, and Garlands of Flowers and Nofegais about their heads, and there went by them certaine young men, with aprons of needle-worke, girt about their middle, who led them to the Sacrifice, and young boyes with them also, that carried goodly Basons of Gold and Silver, to cast and sprinkle the blood of the Sacrifice about. And after these, followed those that carried all Coynes of Gold devided by Basons and Vessels, and every one of them weighing three Talents as they did before, that carried the great holy Cup, which Æmylius had caused to be made of massie Gold, set full of precious Stones, weighing the weight of ten Talents, to make an Offering unto the gods. And next unto them went other that carried Plate, made and wrought after antick fashion, and notable Cups of the ancient Kings of MACE DON: as the Cup called Antigonus, and another Selenus: and to be short, all the whole cubbord of Plate of Gold and Silver of King Perseus. And next them came the Chariot of his Armour, in the which was all King Perseus harnesse, and his royall Band (they call a Diademe) upon his Armour. And a little space between them, followed next the Kings Children, whom they led Prisoners, with the traine of their School-masters and other Officers, and their servants, weeping and lamenting: who held up their hands to the people that looked upon them, and taught the Kings young Children to doe the like, to aske mercy and grace at the peoples hands. There were three pretty little Children, two Sonnes and a Daughter amongst them, whose tender yeares and lacke of understanding, made them (poore soules) they could not feelee their present misery; which made the people so much the more to pity them, when they saw the poore little infants, that knew not the change of their fortune: so that for the compassion they had of them, they almost let the Father passe without looking upon him. Many peoples hearts did melt for very pity, that the teares ran downe their cheekes, so as this sight brought both pleasure and sorrow together to the lookers on, untill they were past and gone a good way out of sight. King Perseus the Father, followed after his Children and their traine, and he was clothed in a blacke Gowne, wearing a pair of Slippers on his feete after his country manner. He shewed by his countenance his troubled minde, oppress with sorrow of his most miserable state and fortune. He was followed with his Kinsfolks, his familiar friends, his Officers and household servants, their faces disfigured by blubbering, shewing to the world by their lamenting teares, and sorrowfull eyes cast upon their unfortunate Master, how much they sorrowed and bewailed his most hard and cruell fortune, little accounting of their owne misery.

The voice goeth, that Perseus sent unto Æmylius to intreat him, that he should not be led through the City in the shew and sight of the Triumph. But Æmylius mocking (as he deserved) his cowardly faint heart, answered: As for that, it was before, and is now in him, to doe if he will. Meaning to let him understand thereby, that he might rather chuse to die, then living to receive such open shame.
Howbeit his heart would not serve him, he was so cowardly, and made so effeminate, by a certaine vaine hope he knew not what, that he was contented to make one among his owne spoiles. After all this, there followed four hundred princely Crownes of Gold, which the Cities and Townes of GREECE had purposely sent by their Ambassadors unto Æmylius, to honour his Victory: and next unto them, he came himselfe in his Chariot triumphing, which was passing sumptuously set forth and adorned. It was a noble sight to behold: and yet the person of himselfe only was worth the looking on, without all that great pomp and magnificence. For he was apparelled in a purple Gowne branded with gold, and carried in his right hand a Laurell bough, as all his Army did besides: the which being devided by Bands and Companies, followed the triumphing Chariot of their Captaine, some of the Souldiers singing Songs of Victory, which the ROMANES use to sing in like Triumphs, mingling them with merry pleasant toys, rejoycing at their Captaine. Other of them also did sing Songs of Triumph, in the honour and praise of Æmylius noble Conquest and Victory. He was openly praised, blessed and honoured of every body, and neither hated nor envied of honest men:

saving the ordinary use of some god, whose prosperity is always to lessen or cut off some part of mans exceeding prosperity and felicity, mingling with mans life the sense and feeling of good and evil together: because that no living person should passe all his time of life, without some adversity or misfortune, but that such (as Homer saith) should only think themselves happy, to whom fortune hath equally forted the good with the evill. And this I speak, because Æmylius had foure Sonnes, two of the which he gave in adoption unto the families of Scipio and of Fabius, as we have said before: and two other which he had by his second Wife, he brought up with him in his owne house, and were both yet very young: of the which the one died, being fourteen years of age five dayes before his Fathers Triumph: and the other died also three dayes after the pompe of Triumph at twelve years of age. When this sorrowfull chance had befallen him, every one in Rome did pity him in their hearts: but fortunes spite and cruelty did more grieve and feare them, to see her little regard towards him, to put into a house of Triumph (full of honour and glory, and of sacrifices and joy) such a pittifull mourning, and mingling of sorrowes and lamentations of death, amongst such Songs of Triumph and victory. Notwithstanding this, Æmylius taking things like a wise man, thought that he was not only to use constancy and magnanimity, against the Sword and Pike of the enemy: but alike also against all adversity and enmity of spitefull fortune. So he wisely weighed and considered his present misfortune, with his former prosperity: and finding his misfortune counterpoised with felicity, and his private griefes cut off with common joy, he gave no place to his sorrowes and mischances, neither blemished any way the dignity of his Triumph and victory. For when he had buried the eldest of his two last Sonnes, he left not to make his triumphant entry, as you have heard before. And his second Sonne also being deceased after his Triumph, he caused the people to assemble, and in face of the whole City he made an Oration, not like a discomfited man, but like one rather that did comfort his sorrowfull Countrymen for his mischance. He told them, "That concerning mens matters, never any thing did feare him: but for things above, he ever feared Fortune, mistrusting her change and inconstancy, and specially in the last Warre, doubting for so great prosperity as could be wished, to be payed home with an after intollerable adversity and sinister chance. For as I went (said he) I passed over the gulfe of the Adriaticke Sea, from BRINDES unto CORFU in one day: and from thence in five dayes after, I arrived in the City of DELPHES, where I did sacrifice unto Apollo. And within five other dayes, I arrived in my Campe, where I found mine Army in MACEDON. And after I had done the Sacrifice, and due Ceremonies for purifying of the same, I presently began to follow the purpose and cause of my coming: so as in fifteen dayes after I made an honourable end of all those Warres. But yet, mistrusting Fortune alwayes, seeing the prosperous course of my affaires, and considering that there were no other enemies, nor dangers I needed to feare: I feared sorely she would change at my returne, when I should be upon the Sea, bringing home so goodly and victorious an Army, with so many spoiles, and so many Princes and Kings taken prisoners. And yet when I was safely arrived in the Haven, and seeing all the City at my returne full of joy, and of feasts and Sacrifices, I still suspected Fortune, knowing her manner well enough, that the usefult not to gratifie men so frankly, nor to grant them so great things clearly, without some certaine sparke of envy waiting on them. Neither did my minde being still occupied in feare of some thing to happen to the Common-wealth, shake off this feare behind me: but that I saw this home-mishap and misery lighted upon me, enforcing me with mine owne hands in these holy dayes of my Triumph, to bury my two young Sonnes one after another, which I only brought up with me, for the succession of my Name and House. Wherefore me thinks now I may say, I am out of all danger, at the least touching my chiefest and greatest misfortune: and doe begin to stablish my selfe with this assured hope, that this good fortune henceforth shall remaine with us evermore, without feare of other unlucky or sinister chance. For she hath sufficiently countervailed the favourable Victory she gave you, with the envious mishap wherewith she hath plagued both me and mine: shewing the Conquerer and Triumpher, as noble an example of mans misery and weakness, as the party conquered, that had been led in Triumph: saving that Perseus yet conquered as he is, hath this comfort left him, to see his Children living; and that the Conquerour Æmylius hath lost his. And this was the summe of Æmylius notable Oration he made unto the people of Rome, proceeding of a noble and honourable disposed minde. And though it pitied him in his heart to see the strange chance of King Perseus fortune, and that he heartily desired to helpe him, and to doe him good: yet he could never obtaine other grace for him, but onely to remove him from the common prison (which the ROMANES call Carcer) into a more cleanly and sweeter house: where being straightly guarded and looked unto, he killed himselfe by abstinence from meate, as the most part of Historiographers doe write. Yet some Writers tell a marvellous strange tale, and manner of his death. For they say the Souldiers that guarded him, kept him from sleepe, watching him straightly when sleepe tooke him, and would not suffer him to shut his eye-lids (onely upon a malice they did beare him, because they could not otherwise hurt him) keeping him awake by force, not suffering him to take rest: untill such time as nature being forced to give over, he gave up the ghost. Two of his Sonnes died also: but the third called Alexander, became an excellent Turner and Joyner, and was learned, and could speake the ROMANES tongue very well, and did write it so trimly, that afterwards he was Chancellour to the Magistrates of Rome, and did wisely and discreetly behave himselfe in his Office. Furthermore they doe adde to this goodly conquest of the Realme of MACEDON, that Æmylius conquered another speciall good thing, that made him marvellously well liked of the common people: that is, that he brought so much Gold and Silver unto the Treasury store of Rome, as the common People needed never after to make contribution for any thing, untill the very time and yeare that Hircius and Pansa were Consuls, which was about the beginning of the first Warres of Augustus and Antonius. And yet Æmylius had one singular good gift in him: that though the People did greatly love and honour him, yet he ever tooke part with the Senate and Nobility, and did never by word or deed any thing in favour of the People, to flatter or please them, but in matters concerning Government, he did ever leane to the Nobility and good men. And this did Appius afterwards cast in his Sonnes teeth, Scipio Africanus. For both of them being two of the chiefest men of their time, and contending together for the Office of Censor: Appius had about him to favour his sute, all the Senate and Nobility, as of ancient time the Family of the Appians had ever held on their part. And Scipio Africanus, though he was a great man of himselfe, yet he was at all times favoured and beloved of the common People. Whereupon when Appius saw him come into the Market-place, followed with men of small quality and base condition, that had been Slaves before, but otherwise could skilfully handle such practises, bring the People together, and by opportunity of cries and loud voyces (if need were) obtaine what they would in the Assemblies of the City: he spake out aloud, and said: O Paulus Æmylius, now hast thou good cause to sigh and mourne in thy grave where thou liest (if the dead do know what we do here on Earth) to see Æmylius a common Serjeant, and Licinius a prating Fellow, how they bring thy Sonne unto the Dignity of a Censor. And as for Scipio, he was alwayes beloved of the common People, because he did favour them in all things. But Æmylius also, although he tooke ever the Noblemens part, he was not therefore the lesse beloved of the common People then those that alwayes flattered them, doing all things as the People would, to please them: which the common People did witnesse, as well by other Honours and Offices they offered him, as in the Dignity of the Censor which they gave him. For it was the holiest Office of all other at that time, and of greatest Power and Authority, specially for inquiry and reformation of every mans life and manners. For he that was Censor, had Authority to put any Senator off the Councell, and so degrade him, if he did not worthily behave himselfe according to his Place and Calling: and might name and declare any one of the Senate, whom he thought to be most honest, and fittest for the place againe. Moreover, they might by their Authority, take from licentious young men, their Horse which was kept at the charge of the Common-wealth. Furthermore, they be the Sessors of the People, and the Muster-masters, keeping Bookes of the number of persons at every mustering. So there appeared numbered in the Register-booke Æmylius made then of them, three hundred seven and thirty thousand, foure hundred and two and fifty men, and Marcus Æmylius Lepidus named President of the Senate, who had that honour foure times before, and did put off the Councell three Senators, that were but meane men. And the like meane and moderation he and his companion Martius Philippus kept; upon view and Muster taken of the ROMANES Horsemen. And after he had ordered and disposed the greatest matters of his Charge and Office, he fell sicke of a Disease that at the beginning seemed very dangerous, but in the end there was no other danger, saving that it was a lingering Disease, and hard to cure. So, following the counsell of Physicians, who willed him to go to a City in ITALY called VELIA, he tooke Sea and went thither, and continued there a long time, dwelling in pleasant houses upon the Sea side, quietly and out of all noise. But during this time of his absence, the ROMANES wished for him many a time and often. And when they were gathered together in the Theaters, to see the Playes and Sports, they cried out divers times for him: whereby they shewed that they had a great desire to see him againe. Time being come about, when they used to make a solemne yearly Sacrifice, and Æmylius finding himselfe also in very good perfect health; he returned againe to Rome, where he made Sacrifice with the other Priests, all the People of Rome gathered about him, rejoycing much to see him. The next day after, he made another particular Sacrifice, to give thanks unto the gods for recovery of his health. After the Sacrifice was ended, he went home to his house, and fate him downe to dinner: he suddenly fell into a raving (without any perleverance of sickness spied in him before, or any change or alteration in him) and his wits went from him, in such sort, that he died within three daies after, lacking no necessary thing that an earthly man could have, to make him happy in this World. For he was even honoured at his Funerals, and his vertue was adorned with many goodly glorious Ornaments, neither of Gold, Silver, nor Ivory, nor with other such sumptuousnesse or magnificence of Apparell, but with the love and good will of the People, all of them confessing his vertue and well-doing: and this did not onely his naturall Countrymen performe in memory of him, but his very Enemies also. For all those that met in Rome by chance at that time, that were either come out of SPAIN, from GENOA, or out of MACEDON, all those that were young and strong, did willingly put themselves under the Coffin where his Body lay, to helpe to carry him: and the old men followed his Body to accompany the same, calling Æmylius the Benefactor, Saviour, and Father of their Country. For he did not onely treat them gently, and graciously, whom he had subdued: but all his life time he was ever ready to pleasure them: and to set forwards their Causes, even as they had bene his Confederates, very Friends, and neare Kinsmen. The Inventory of all his Goods after his death, did scant amount unto the summe of three hundred threescore and tenne thousand Silver Drachmas, which his two Sonnes did inherit. But Scipio being the younger, left all his right unto his elder Brother Fabius, because he was adopted into a very rich House, which was the House of the great Scipio Africanus. Such they say was Paulus Æmylius Conditions and Life.

THE LIFE OF TIMOLEON.

The state of the Syracusans before Timoleon comes.

Before Timoleon was sent into SICILE, thus stood the state of the SYRACUSANS. After that Dion had driven out the Tyrant Dionysius, he himselfe after was slaine immediately by Treason; and those that aided him to restore the SYRACUSANS to their liberty, fell out, and were at dissention among themselves. By reason whereof, the City of SYRACUSA changing continually new Tyrants, was so troubled and turmoyled with all sorts of evils, that it was left in manner desolate, and without Inhabitants. The rest of SICILE in like case was utterly destroyed, and no Cities in manner left standing, by reason of the long Warres: and those few that remained, were most inhabited of foraigne Souldiers and strangers (a company of loose men gathered together that tooke pay of no Prince nor City) all the Dominions of the same being easily usurped, and as easie to change their Lord. Infomuch, Dionysius the Tyrant, ten years after Dion had driven him out of SICILE, having gathered a certaine number of Souldiers together againe, and through their helpe driven out Nisem, that reigned at that time in SYRACUSA: he recovered the Realme againe, and made himselfe King. So, if he was strangely expelled by a small power out of the greatest Kingdome that ever was in the World: likewise he more strangely recovered it againe, being banished and very poore, making himselfe King over them, who before had driven him out. Thus were the Inhabitants of the City compelled to serve this Tyrant: who besides that of his owne nature was neither courteous nor civill, he was now growne to be far more dogged and cruell, by reason of the extreme misery and misfortune he had endured. But the noblest Citizens repaired unto Ictes, who at that time as Lord ruled the City of the LEONTINES, and they chose him for their Generall in these Warres: not for that he was any thing better then the open Tyrants, but because they had no other to repaire unto at that time: and they trusted him best; for that he was borne (as themselves) within the City of SYRACUSA, and because also he had men of Warre about him, to make head against the Tyrant. But in the meane time, the CARTHAGINIANS came downe into SICILE with a great Army, and invaded the Countrey. The SYRACUSANS being afraid of them, determined to send Ambassadors into GREECE to pray aide of them against the barbarous People; having better hope unto the CORINTHIANS, to pray aide of them against the barbarous People; having better hope of them, then of any other of the GRECIANS. And that not altogether because they were lineally descended from them, and that they had received in times past many pleasures at their hands: but also for that they knew that CORINTH was a City, that in all ages and times did ever love Liberty and hate Tyrants, and that had alwaies made their greatest Warres, not for ambition of Kingdomes, nor of covetous desires to conquer and rule, but only to defend and maintaine the Liberty of the GRECIANS. But Ictes in another contrary sort, tooke upon him to be Generall, with

Ictes, Tyrant
of the Leontines

with a minde to make himselfe King of SYRACUSA. For he had secretly practised with the CARTHAGINIANS, and openly notwithstanding, in words he commended the counsell and determination of the SYRACUSANS, and sent Ambassadors from himselfe also with theirs, unto PELOPONNESUS: not that he was desirous any aide should come from them to SYRACUSA, but because he hoped if the CORINTHIANS refused to send them aide (as it was very likely they would, for the Warres and troubles that were in GREECE) that he might more easily turne all over to the CARTHAGINIANS, and use them as his friends, to aide him against the SYRACUSANS, or the Tyrant Dionysius. And that this was his full purpose and intent, it appeared plainly foone after. Now when their Ambassadors arrived at CORINTH, and had delivered their Message, the CORINTHIANS, who had ever bene carefull to defend such Cities as had fought unto them; and specially SYRACUSA: very willingly determined in Councell to send them aide, and the rather for that they were in good peace at that time, having Wars with none of the GRECIANS. So their only stay rested upon choosing of a Generall to leade their Army. Now as the Magistrates and Governours of the City were naming such Citizens, as willingly offered their service, desirous to advance themselves, there stept up a meane Commoner who named Timoleon, Timodemus Sonne, a man that until that time was never called on for service, neither looked for any such preferment. And truly it is to be thought it was the secret working of the gods, that directed the thought of this meane Commoner to name Timoleon: whose election Fortune favoured very much, and ioyned to his valiantnesse and vertues marvellous good successe in all his doings afterwards. This Timoleon was borne of Noble Parents both by Father and Mother: his Father was called Timodemus, and his Mother Demareta. He was naturally inclined to love his Countrey and Common-weale: and was alwaies gentle and courteous to all men, faving that he mortally hated Tyrants and wicked men: Furthermore Nature had framed his body apt for Warres and for paines: he was wise in his greenest youth, in all things he tooke in hand, and in his age he shewed himselfe very valiant. He had an elder Brother called Timophanes, who was nothing like to him in condition: for he was a rash haire-brained man, and had a greedy desire to raigne, being put into his head by a company of meane men, that bare him in hand they were his friends, and by certaine Souldiers gathered together, which he had alwaies about him. And because he was very hot and forward in Warres, his Citizens tooke him for a notable Captaine, and a man of good service, and therefore oftentimes they gave him charge of men. And therein Timoleon did helpe him much to hide the faults he committed, or at the least made them seeme lesse, and lighter then they were, still increasing that small good gift that Nature brought forth in him. As in a Battell the CORINTHIANS had against the ARGIVES and the CLEONIANS, Timoleon served as a private Souldier amongst the Footmen: and Timophanes his Brother, having charge of the Horsemen, was in great danger to be cast away, if present helpe had not bene. For his Horse being hurt, threw him on the ground in the midst of his Enemies: whereupon part of those that were about him, were afraid and disperised themselves here and there; and those that remained with him, being few in number, and having many Enemies to fight withall, did hardly withstand their force and charge. But his Brother Timoleon seeing him in such instant danger as far off, ran with all speed possible to helpe him, and clapping his Target before his Brother Timophanes, that lay on the ground, receiving many wounds on his body with Sword and Arrows, with great difficulty he repulsed the Enemies, and saved his owne and his Brothers life. Now the CORINTHIANS fearing the like matter to come that before had happened unto them, which was, to lose their City through default of their friends helpe, they resolved in Councell, to entertaine in pay continually foure hundred Souldiers that were strangers, whom they assigned over to Timophanes charge: who, abandoning all honesty and regard of the trust reposed in him, did presently practise all the waies he could to make himselfe Lord of the City: and having put divers of the chiefe Citizens to death without order of Law, in the end he openly proclaimed himself King Timoleon being very sorry for this, and thinking his Brothers wickednesse would be the very highway to his fall and destruction, sought first to winne him with all the good words and perswasions he could, to leave his ambitious desire to reigne, and to seeke to save (as neare as might be) his hard dealing with the Citizens. Timophanes set light by his Brothers perswasions, and would give no care unto them. Thereupon Timoleon then went to one Eschilus his friend, and Brother unto Timophanes Wife, and to one Satyrus a Soothsayer (as Theopompus the Historiographer calleth him, and Ephorus calleth him Orthagoras) with whom he came againe another time unto his Brother; and they three coming to him, instantly befought him to believe good counsell, and to leave the Kingdome. Timophanes at the first did but laugh them to scorne, and sported at their perswasions: but afterwards he waxed hot, and grew into great choler with them. Timoleon seeing that, went a little aside, and covering his face fell a weeping: and in the meane season, the other two drawing out their Swords, slew Timophanes in the place. This murder was straight blowne abroad through the City; and the better sort did greatly commend the noble minde and hate Timoleon bare against the Tyrant: considering that he being of a gentle nature, and loving to his Kinne, did notwithstanding regard the benefit of his Countrey, before the naturall affection of his Brother, and preferred Duty and Justice, before Nature and Kinred. For, before he had saved his Brothers life, fighting for the defence of his Countrey: and now in seeking to make himselfe King and to rule the same, he made him to be slaine. Such then as disliked popular Government and liberty, and alwaies followed the Nobility, they set a good face on the matter, as though they had bene glad of the Tyrants death: yet still reproving Timoleon for the horrible murder he had committed against his Brother, declaring how detestable it was both to the gods and men; they so handled him, that it grieved him to the heart he had done it.

But when it was told him that his Mother tooke it marvellous ill, and that she pronounced horrible Curfes against him, and gave out terrible words of him; he went unto her in hope to comfort her: howbeit he could never abide to see him, but alwaies shut her doore against him. Then he being wounded to the heart with sorrow, tooke a conceit suddenly, to kill himselfe by abstaining from meate: but his friends would never forsake him in this despaire, and urged him so far by intreaty and perswasion, that they compelled him to eate. Thereupon he resolved thenceforth to give himselfe over to a solitary life in the Countrey, secluding himselfe from all company and dealings: so as at the beginning, he did not onely refuse to repaire unto the City, and all accesse of company, but wandering up and downe in most solitary places, consumed himselfe and his time with melancholy. And thus we see, that counsels and judgements are lightly carried away (by praise or dispraise) if they be not shored up with rule of Reason and Philosophy, and rest confounded in themselves. And therefore it is very requisite and necessary, that not onely the act be good and honest of it selfe, but that the resolution thereof be also constant, and not subject unto change: to the end we may do all things conside- rately; lest we be like unto hickorous mouthed men, who as they desire meanes with a greedy appe- tite, and after are soone weary, disliking the same: even so do we suddenly repent our actions ground- ed upon a weakie imagination, of the honesty that moved us thereunto. For repentance maketh the act naught which before was good. But determination, grounded upon certaine knowledge and truth of reason, doth never change, although the matter enterprised, have not alwayes happy successe. And therefore Phocias the ATHENIAN having resisted (as much as in him lay) certaine things which the Generall Leosthenes did, and which contrary to his minde tooke good effect: and percei- ving the ATHENIANS did open Sacrifice unto the gods, to give them thanks for the fame, and much rejoyce at the Victory they had obtained: I would have rejoyced too (said he) if I had done this: but so would I not for any thing, but I had given the counsell. And after that sort, but more sharply, did Aristides LOCRIAN (a very friend and companion of Platoes) answer Dionysius the elder, Tyrant of SYRACUSA: who asked his good will to marry one of his Daughters. I had ra- ther see my Daughter dead (said he) then married unto a Tyrant. And within a certaine time after, the Tyrant put all his Sonnes to death: and then he asked him in derision to grieve him the more, if he were still of his former opinion, for the marrying of his Daughter. I am very fory (said he) with all my heart for that which thou hast done: but yet I do not repent me of that I have said. That peradventure proceeded of a more perfect verue. But to returne againe unto Timoleon: Whether that inward sorrow stricke him to the heart for the death of his Brother Timophanes, or that shame did so abash him, as he durst not abide his Mother, twenty yeares after he did never any notable or famous act. And therefore, when he was named to be Generall of the aide that should be sent into SICILE, the People having willingly chosen and accepted of him: Teleclides, who was chiefe Go- vernour at that time in the City of CORINTH, standing upon his feete before the People, spake unto Timoleon, and did exhort him to behave himselfe like an honest man, and valiant Captaine in this charge. For, said he, if that you handle your selfe well, we will thinke you have killed a Ty- rant: but if you order your selfe otherwise then well, we will judge you have killed your Brother. Now Timoleon being busie in leavying of men, and preparing himselfe, Letters came to the CO- RINTHIANS from Isetes, whereby plainly appeared, that Isetes had carried two faces in one hoodie, and that he was become a Traytor. For he had no sooner dispatched his Ambassadors unto them, but he straight tooke the CARTHAGINIANS part, and dealt openly for them, intending to drive out Dionysius, and to make himselfe King of SYRACUSA. But fearing lest the CO- RINTHIANS would send aide before he had wrought his feate, he wrote againe unto the CO- RINTHIANS, sending them word; that they should not neede now to put themselves to any charge or dan- ger for coming into SICILE, and specially, because the CARTHAGINIANS were very angry, and did also lye in waite in the way as they should come, with a great Fleete of Shippes to meete with their Army: and that for himselfe, because he saw they tarried long, he had made league and amity with them, against the Tyrant Dionysius. When they had read his Letters, if any of the CO- RINTHIANS were before but coldly affected to this journey, choler did then so warm them against Isetes, that they frankly granted Timoleon what he would aske, and did helpe to furnish him to set him out. When the Shippes were ready rigged, and that the Souldiers were furnished of all things necessary for their departure, the Nunnes of the goddesse Proserpina, said they saw a Vision in their Dreame, and that the goddesse Ceres and Proserpina did appeare unto them, apparelled like Travellers to take a journey: and told them, that they would go with Timoleon into SICILE. Upon this Speech onely, the CORINTHIANS rigged a Galley, they called, the Galley of Ceres and Proserpina: and Ti- moleon himselfe before he would take the Seas, went into the City of DELFIS, where he made Sa- crifice unto Apollo. And as he entred into the Sanctuary where the Answers of the Oracle were made, there happened a wonderfull signe unto him. For amongst the Vowes and Offerings that are hang- ed up upon the Walls of the Sanctuary, there fell a Band directly upon Timoleons head, imbrodered all about with Crownes of Victory: so that it seemed Apollo sent him already crowned, before he had set out one foote towards the journey. He tooke Ship, and sailed with seven Gallies of CORINTH, two of CORPHUE, and ten the LEUCADIANS did set out. When he was launched out into the maine Sea, having a franke gale of winde and large, he thought in the night that the Element did open, and that out of the same there came a marvellous great bright light over his Ship; and it was much like to a Torch burning, when they shew the Ceremonies of the holy Mysteries. This Torch did ac- company and guide them all their Voyage, and in the end it vanished away, and seemed to fall downe upon upon the Coast of ITALY, where the Ship-masters had determined to arrive. The wise mens opi- nions being asked what this might signifie, they answered: That this wonderfull sight did betoken the Dreame the Nunnes of the goddesse Ceres dreamed, and that the goddesse favouring his Jour- ney, had shewed them the way, by sending of this Light from Heaven: because that the Isle of SI- CILE is consecrated unto the goddesse Proserpina; and specially for that they report her ravishment was in that Isle, and that the whole Realme was assigned unto her for her Joynter, at the day of her Marriage. Thus did this Celestiall Signe of the gods both encourage those that went this Journey, and deliver them also assured hope, who sailed with all speede possible they could, untill such time as having crossed the Seas, they arrived upon the Coast of ITALY. But when they came thither, the newes they understood from SICILE, put Timoleon in great perplexity, and did marvellously dis- courage the Souldiers he brought with him: for Isetes having overthrowne the Battell of the Tyrant Dionysius, and possessed the greatest part of the City of SYRACUSA, he did besiege him within the Castle, and within that part of the City which is called the Isle, where he had pent him up, and in- closed him in with Walls round about. And in the meane time he had prayed the CARTHAGI- NIANS, that they would be careful to keepe Timoleon from landing in SICILE, to the end that by preventing that aide, they might easily divide SICILE betweene them, and no man to lett them. The CARTHAGINIANS following his request, sent twenty of their Gallies unto RHEGIO, amongst which Isetes Ambassadors were sent unto Timoleon, with testimony of his doings: for they were faire flattering words to cloake his wicked intent he purposed. For they willed Timoleon that he should go himselfe alone (if he thought good) unto Isetes, to counsell him, and to accom- pany him in all his doings, which were now so far on wards in good towardnesse, as he had almost ended them all. Furthermore, they did also perswade him, that he should fend backe his Shippes and Souldiers to CORINTH againe, considering that the Warre was now brought to good passe, and that the CARTHAGINIANS would in no case that his men should passe into SICILE, and that they were determined to fight with them, if they made any force to enter. So the CO- RINTHIANS at their arrivall into the City of RHEGIO, finding there these Ambassadors, and see- ing the Fleete of the CARTHAGINIANS Shippes, which did ride at Anker not farre off from them: it spited them on the one side, to see they were thus mocked and abused by Isetes. For every one of them were marvellous angry with him, and were greatly afeard also for the poore SICILI- ANS, whom too plainly they saw left a prey unto Isetes for reward of his Treason, and to the CARTHAGINIANS for recompence of the tyranny which they suffered him to establish. So, on the other side, they thought it impossible to conquer the Shippes of the CARTHAGINIANS, which did lye in waite for them, and so neare unto them, considering they were twice as many in number as they: and as hard for them to subdue the Army also that was in the hands of Isetes in SICILE, considering that they were not come to him, but onely for the maintenance of the Warres. Notwithstanding Timoleon spake very courteously unto those Ambassadors, and Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS Shippes, letting them understand that he would do as much as they would have him: and to say truly, if he would have done otherwise, he could have wonne nothing by it. Nevertheless he desired for his discharge, they would say that openly, in the presence of the People of RHEGIO (being a City of GREECE, friend and common to both parties) which they had spoken to him in secret: and that done, he would depart incontinently, alleging that it floodie him very much upon for the safety of his discharge, and that they themselves also should more faith- fully keepe that they had promised unto him touching the SYRACUSANS, when they had agreed upon it, and promised it beforeall the People of RHEGIO, who should be witnesse of it. Now all this was but a fetch and policy delivered by him, to shadow his departure, which the Captaines and Governours of RHEGIO did favour, and seemed to helpe him in: because they wished SI- CILE should fall into the hands of the CORINTHIANS, and feared much to have the barbarous People for their Neighbours. For this cause they commanded a generall Assembly of all the People, during which time, they caused the Gates of the City to be shut: giving it out, that it was because the Citizens should not go about any other matters in the meane time. Then when all the People were assembled, they began to make long Orations without concluding any matter: the one lea- ving alwayes to the other a like matter to talke of, to the end they might winnetime, untill the Gallies of the CORINTHIANS were departed. And staying the CARTHAGINIANS also in this Assembly, they mistrusted nothing, because they saw Timoleon present: who made a coun- tenance, as though he would rise to say something. But in the meane time, some one did secretly advertise Timoleon, that the other Gallies were under Sayle and gone away, and that there was but one Galley left, which tarried for him in the Haven. Thereupon he suddenly stole away through the preafe, with the helpe of the RHEGIANS, being about the Chaire where the Ora- tions were made: and trudging quickly to the Haven, he embarked incontinently, and hoised Saile also. And when he had overtaken his Fleete, they went all safe together to land at the City of TAUROMENION, which is in SICILE: there they were very well received by Andromachus, who long time before had sent for them, for he governed this City as if he had beene Lord thereof. He was the Father of Timaeus the Historiographer, and honestest man of all those that did beare rule at that time in SICILE. For he did rule his Citizens in all Justice and Equity, and did alwayes shew himselfe an open Enemy to Tyrants. And following his affection therein, he lent his City at that time unto Timoleon, to gather People together, and perswaded his Citizens to enter into league with the CORINTHIANS, and to aide them, to deliver SICILE from bondage, and to restore

Diogenes saying to Dionysius the Tyrant. againe: Dost thou thinke I pity thee? nay it spitteth me rather, to see such a Slave as thou (worthy to die in the wicked state of a Tyrant like thy Father) to live in such security and idle life, as thou leadeft amongst us. When I came to compare these words of Diogenes, with Philistus words the Historiographer, bewailing the hard fortune of the Daughters of the LEPTINES, saying that they were brought from the top of all worldly felicity, honour and goods (whereof tyrannicall state aboundeth) unto a base, private and humble life: methinks they are the proper lamentations of a woman, that sorroweth for the losse of her Boxes of painting Colours, or for her Purple Gownes, or for other such pretty fine trims of Gold, as women use to weare. So, methinks these things I have intermingled concerning Dionysius, are not impertinent to the description of our Lives, neither are they troublesome or unprofitable to the hearers, unlesse they have other hasty businesse to lett or trouble them. But now if the Tyrant Dionysius wretched state seeme strange, Timoleons prosperity then was no lesse wonderfull. For within fifty dayes after he had set foote in SICILE, he had the Castle of SYRACUSA in his possession, and sent Dionysius as an exile to CORINTH. This did set the CORINTHIANS in such a jollity, that they sent him a supply of two thousand Footmen, and two hundred Horsemen, which were appointed to land in ITALY, in the Countrey of the THURIANS. And perceiving that they could not possibly go from thence into SICILE, because the CARTHAGINIANS kept the Seas with a great many of Ships, and that thereby they were compelled to stay for better opportunity: in the meane time they bestowed their leisure in doing a notable good act. For the THURIANS being in Wars at that time with the BRUTIANS, they did put their City into their hands, which they kept very faithfully and friendly, as it had been their owne native Countrey. Ictes all this while did besiege the Castle of SYRACUSA, preventing all he could possible, that there should come no Corne by Sea unto the CORINTHIANS that kept within the Castle: and he had hired two strange Souldiers, which he sent unto the City of ADRANUS, to kill Timoleon by Treason, who kept no guard about his person, and continued amongst the ADRANITANS, mistrusting nothing in the World, for the trust and confidence he had in the safeguard of the god of the ADRANITANS. These Souldiers being sent to do this murder, were by chance informed that Timoleon should one day do Sacrifice unto this god. So upon this, they came into the Temple, having Daggers under their Gownes, and by little and little thrust in through the prease, that they got at the length hard to the Altar. But at the present time as one encouraged another to dispatch the matter, a third person they thought not of, gave one of the two a great cut in the head with his Sword, that he fell to the ground. The man that had hurt him thus, fled straight upon it, with his Sword drawne in his hand, and recovered the top of a high Rocke. The other Souldier that came with him, and that was not hurt, got hold of a corner of the Altar, and besought pardon of Timoleon, and told him he would discover the Treason practised against him. Timoleon thereupon pardoned him. Then he told him how his Companion that was slaine, and himselfe, were both hired, and sent to kill him. In the meane time, they brought him also that had taken the Rocke, who cried out aloud, He had done no more then he should do: for he had killed him that had slaine his owne Father before, in the City of LEONTINES. And to iustifie this to be true, certaine that stood by did affirme it was so indeed. Whereat they wondered greatly to consider the marvellous working of Fortune, how the doct bring one thing to passe by meanes of another, and gathereth all things together, how far asunder forever they be, and linketh them together, though they seeme to be cleane contrary one to another, with no manner of likeness or conjunction betwene them, making the end of the one, to be the beginning of another. The CORINTHIANS examining this matter thoroughly, gave him that slew the Souldier with his Sword, a Crowne of the value of tenne Minas, because that by meanes of his just anger, he had done good service to the god that had preserved Timoleon. And furthermore, this good happe did not onely serve the present turne, but was to good purpose ever after. For those that saw it, were put in better hope, and had thenceforth more care and regard unto Timoleons person, because he was a holy man, one that loved the gods, and that was purposely sent to deliver SICILE from captivity. But Ictes having missed his first purpose, and seeing numbers daily drawne to Timoleons devotion, he was made with himselfe, that having so great an Army of the CARTHAGINIANS at hand at his commandment, he tooke but a few of them to serve his turne, as if he had beene ashamed of his fact, and had used their friendship by stealth. So he sent thereupon for Mago their Generall, with all his Fleete. Mago at his request brought an huge Army to see to, of a hundred and fifty Saile, which occupied and covered all the Haven: and afterwards landed three-score thousand men, whom he lodged every man within the City of SYRACUSA. Then every man imagined the time was now come, which old men had threatned SICILE with many yeares before, and that continually: that one day it should be conquered, and inhabited by the barbarous People. For in all the Wars the CARTHAGINIANS ever had before in the Countrey of SICILE, they could never come to take the City of SYRACUSA: and then through Ictes Treason, who had received them, they were scene encamped there. On the other side, the CORINTHIANS that were within the Castle, found themselves in great distresse, because their Victuals waxed scant, and the Haven was so straightly kept. Moreover, they were driven to be armed continually to defend the Walls, which the Enemies battered, and assaulted in sundry places, with all kinds of Engines of battery, and sundry sorts of devised Instruments and inventions to take Cities: by reason whereof, they were compelled also to divide themselves into many Companies. Nevertheless, Timoleon without, gave them all he aide he could possible: sending them Corne from CATANA, in little Fisher-boates and small Crayers, which got into the Castle many times, but specially in stormy and fowle weather, passing passing by the Gallies of the barbarous People, that lay flattering one from another, dispersed abroad by tempest, and great billows of the Sea. But Mago and Ictes finding this, determined to go take the City of CATANA, from whence those of the Castle of SYRACUSA were called, and taking with them the best Souldiers of all their Army, they departed from SYRACUSA, and sailed towards CATANA. Now in the meane space, Leon CORINTHIAN, Captain of all those that were within the Castle, perceiving the Enemies within the City, kept but slender Warde, made a sudden Salley out upon them, and taking them unawares, slew a great number at the first Charge, and drave away the other. So by this occasion he wanne a quarter of the City, which they call ACRADINA, and was the best part of the City, that had received least hurt. For the City of SYRACUSA seemeth to be built of many Townes joyned together. So having found there great plenty of Corne, Gold and Sillyer, he would not forsake that Quarter no more, nor returne againe into the Castle: but fortifying with all diligence the compass and precinct of the same, and joyning it unto the Castle with certaine Fortifications he built up in haste, he determined to keepe both the one and the other. Now were Mago and Ictes very neare unto CATANA, when a Post overtook them, purposely sent from SYRACUSA unto them, who brought them newes, that the ACRADINA was taken. Whereat they both wondered, and returned backe againe with all speede possible (having failed of their purpose they pretended) to keepe that they had yet left in their hands. Now for that matter, it is yet a question, whether we should impute it unto wisdom and valiancy, or unto good fortune: but the thing I will tell you now, in my opinion, is altogether to be ascribed unto Fortune. And this it is: The two thousand Footmen and two hundred Horsemen of the CORINTHIANS, that remained in the City of the THURIANS, partly for feare of the Gallies of the CARTHAGINIANS, that lay in waite for them as they should passe, Hanno being their Admirall: and partly also for that the Sea was very rough and high many dayes together, and was alwayes in storme and tempest: in the end, they ventured to go through the Countrey of the BRUTIANS, and partly with their good will (but rather by force) they got through, and recovered the City of RHEGIO, the Sea being marvellous high and rough. Hanno the Admirall of the CARTHAGINIANS, looking no more then for their passage, thought with himselfe that he had devised a marvellous fine policy, to deceive the Enemies. Thereupon he willed all his men to put Garlands of Flowers of Triumph upon their heads, and therewithall also made them dress up, and set forth his Gallies, with Targets, Corslets, and Brigantines, after the GREEKES fashion. So in this bravery he returned backe againe, saying towards SYRACUSA, and came in with force of Oares, rowing under the Castles side of SYRACUSA, with great laughing and chapping of hands, crying out aloud to them that were in the Castle, that he had overthrowne their aide which came from CORINTH, as they thought to passe by the Coast of ITALY into SICILE, flattering himselfe, that this did much discourage those that were besieged. But whilst he sported thus with this fond device, the two thousand CORINTHIANS being arrived through the Countrey of the CRUTIANS in the City of RHEGIO, perceiving the Coast cleare, and that the passage by Sea was not kept, and that the raging Seas were by miracle (as it were) made of purpose calme for them: they tooke Sea forthwith in their Fisher-boats and Passengers as they found ready, in the which they went into SICILE, in such good safety, as they drew their Horse (holding them by the raines) alongst their Boats with them. When they were all passed over, Timoleon having received them, went immediately to take MESSINA, and marching thence in Battell ray, rooke his way towards SYRACUSA, trusting better to his good Fortune, then to his force he had: for his whole number in all were not above foure thousand fighting men. Notwithstanding, Mago hearing of his coming, quaked for feare, and doubted the more upon this occasion. About SYRACUSA are certaine Marshes, that receive great quantity of sweet fresh Water, as well of Fountaines and Springs, as also of little runnings, Brookes, Lakes and Rivers, which runne that wayes toward the Sea: and therefore there are great store of Eeles in that place, and the fishing is great there at all times, but specially for such as delight to take Eeles. Whereupon the GREEKES that tooke pay on both sides, when they had leisure, and that all was quiet betwene them, they intended fishing. Now, they being all Countrey men, and of one Language, had no private quarrell one with another: but when time was to fight, they did their duties, and in time of peace also frequented familiarly together, and one spake with another, and specially when they were buse fishing for Eeles: saying, that they marvelled at the situation of the goodly places thereabouts, and that they stood so pleasantly and commodious upon the Sea side. So one of the Souldiers that served under the CORINTHIANS chanced to say unto them: Is it possible that you that be GREEKES by borne, and have so goodly a City of your owne, and full of so many goodly Commodities: that ye will give it up unto these barbarous People, the CARTHAGINIANS, and most cruell murderers of the World? where you should rather wish that there were many SICILES betwixt them and GREECE. Have ye so little consideration or judgement to thinke, that they have assembled an Army out of all AFRIQUE, unto Hercules Pillars, and to the Sea ATLANTIQUE, to come hither to fight to stablsh Ictes tyranny? who, if he had beene a wise and skilfull Captaine, would not have cast out his Ancestors and Founders, to bring into his Countrey the ancient Enemies of the same: but might have received such Honour and Authority of the CORINTHIANS and Timoleon, as he could reasonably have desired, and that with all their favour and good will. The Souldiers that heard this Tale, reported it againe in their Campe: insomuch they made Mago suspect there was Treason in hand, and so sought some colour to be gone. But hereupon, notwithstanding that Ictes prayed him all he could to tarry, declaring unto him how much they Timoleons marvellous bigge voyce.

Timoleons order and fight.

A marvellous tempest of thunder, lightning, raime, winde and haile, fell in the Carthaginians faces as they fought.

And it is but lately taken up, that they have used branches of Pine Apple-trees in the ISTMIAN Games. When Timoleon had thus encouraged his men, as you have heard before: he first of all tooke of this Smalage, and made himselfe a Garland, and put it on his head: and after him the Captaine of this Smalage, and made himselfe the like, and made themselves the like. The Souldiers in like manner at the very same time, perceived two Eagles flying towards them: the one of them holding a Snake in her talens, which she pierced through and through, and the other as she flew, gave a terrible cry. So they shewed them both unto the Souldiers, who did then all together with one voyce call upon the gods for helpe. Now this fortun'd about the beginning of Sommer, and towards the latter end of May, the Sunne drawing towards the solstice of Sommer: when there arose a great mist out of the River, that covered all the Fields over, so as they could not see the Enemies Campe, but onely heard a marvellous confused noise of mens voyces, as it had come from a great Army: and rising up to the top of the hill, they laid their Targets downe on the ground to take a little breath: and the Sunne having drawne and sucked up all the moist vapours of the mist unto the top of the hills, the aire began to be so thicke, that the tops of the mountaines were all covered over with clouds: and contrarily, the Valley underneath was all cleare and faire, that they might easily see the River of CRIMÆUS, and the Enemies also, how they passed it over in this fort. First, they had put their Carts of Warre foremost, which were very hotly armed and well appointed. Next unto them there followed ten thousand Footmen, armed with white Targets upon their armes: whom they seeing afar off so well appointed, they conjectured by their stately march and goodly order, that they were the CARTHAGINIANS themselves. After them, divers other Nations followed confusedly one with another, and so they thronged over with great disorder. There Timoleon considering the River gave him opportunity to take them before they were halfe past over, and to set upon what number he would: after he had shewed his men with his finger, how the Battell of their Enemies was divided in two parts by meanes of the River, some of them being already passed over, and the other to passe: he commanded Demaratus with his Horsemen to give a Charge on the Voward, to keepe them from putting themselves in order of Battell. And himselfe coming downe the hill also with all his Footmen into the Valley, he gave to the SICILIANS the two Wings of his Battell, mingling with them some strangers that served under him: and placed with himselfe in the midst, the SYRACUSANS with all the choice and best liked strangers. So he tarried not long to joyne, when he saw the small good his Horsemen did. For he perceived they could not come to give a lusty Charge upon the Battell of the CARTHAGINIANS, because they were paled in with these armed Carts, that ran here and there before them: whereupon they were compelled to wheele about continually (unless they would have put themselves in danger to have beene utterly overthrowne) and in their returns to give vent of charge, by turnes on their Enemies. Wherefore Timoleon taking his Target on his arme, cried out aloud to his Footmen, to follow him courageously, and to feare nothing. Those that heard his voyce, thought it more then the voyce of a man, whether the fury of his desire to fight did so fraine it beyond ordinary course, or that some god (as many thought it then) did stretch his voyce to cry out so loud and sensibly. His Souldiers answered him with the like voyce: and prayed him to lead them without longer delay. Then he made his Horsemen understand, that they should draw on the one side from the Carts, and that they should charge the CARTHAGINIANS on the Flankes: and after he did set the foremost ranke of his Battell, Target to Target against the Enemies, commanding the Trumpets withall to sound. Thus with great fury he went to give a Charge upon them, who valiantly received the first Charge, their bodies being armed with good iron Corselets, and their heads with faire Murrions of Copper, besides the great Targets they had also, which did easily receive the force of their Darts, and the thrust of the Pike. But when they came to handle their Swords, where agility was more requisite then force: a fearfull tempest of thunder, and flashing lightning withall, came from the Mountaines. After that came darke thicke clouds also (gathered together from the top of the Hills) and fell upon the Valley where the Battell was fought, with a marvellous extreme shower of raime, fierce violent windes, and haile withall. All this Tempest was upon the GÆCIANS backs, and full before the barbarous People, beating on their faces, and did blindfold their eyes, and continually tormented them with the raime that came full upon them with the winde, and the lightnings so oft flashing amongst them, that one understood not another of them. Which did marvellously trouble them, and specially those that were but fresh-water Souldiers, by reason of the terrible thunder-claps, and the noise the boisterous winde and haile made upon their Harnesse: for that made them they could not heare the order of their Captaines. Moreover, the dirt did as much annoy the CARTHAGINIANS, because they were not nimble in their Armour, but heavily armed, as we have told you: and besides that also, when the plaies of their Coates were through wet with water, they did loade and hinder them so much the more, that they could not fight with any ease. This stode the GÆCIANS to great purpose, to throw them downe the easier. Thus when they were tumbling in the dirt with their heave Armour, up they could rise no more. Furthermore, the River of CRIMÆUS being risen high through the great rage of waters, and also for the multitude of People that passed over it, did overflow the Valley all about: which being full of Ditches, many Caves, and hollow places, it was straight all drowned over, and filled with many running streams, that ranne overthwart the Field, without any certaine channell. The CARTHAGINIANS being compassed all about with these waters, they could hardly get the way out of it. So as in the end they being overcome with the storme that still did beate upon them, and the GÆCIANS having slaine of their men at the first onset, to the number of foure hundred of their choicest men, who who made the first front of their battell: all the rest of their Army turned their backs immediately and fled for life. Inasmuch as some of them being followed very neere, were put to the sword in the midst of the Valley: other, holding one another hard by the armes together, in the midst of the River as they passed over, were carried downe the streame and drowned with the swiftnesse and violence of the River. But the greatest number thinking by footmanhip to recover the hills thereabouts, were overtaken by them that were light armed, and put to the sword every man. They say, that of ten thousand which were slaine in this Battell, three thousand of them were naturall Citizens of CARTHAGE, which was a very sorrowfull and grievous losse to the City: for they were of the noblest, the richest, the lustiest and valiantest men of all CARTHAGE. For there is no Chronicle that mentioneth any former Warres at any time before, where there died so many of CARTHAGE at one Field and Battell, as were slaine at that present time. For before that time, they did alwayes entertaine the FYBIANS, the SPANIARDS, and the NOMADES in all their Warres: so as when they lost any Battell, the losse lighted not on them, but the strangers paid for it. The men of account also that were slaine, were easily knowne by their spoiles. For they that spoiled them, stood not trifling about getting of Copper and Iron together, because they found Gold and Silver enough. For the Battell being won, the GÆCIANS passed over the River, and tooke the Campe of the barbarous people, with all their carriages and baggage. And as for the Prisoners, the Souldiers stole many of them away, and sent them going: but of them that came to light in the common divison of the spoile, they were about five thousand men, and two hundred Carts of Warre that were taken besides. Oh, it was a noble sight to behold the Tent of Timoleon the Generall, how they environed it all about with heapes of spoiles of every sort: among which there were a thousand brave Corselets guilt and graven with marvellous curious workes, and they brought thither with them also ten thousand Targets. So the Conquerours being but a small number, to take the spoile of a multitude that were slaine, they filled their Purfes even to the top. Yet were they three dayes about it, and in the end, the third day after the Battell, they set up a marke or token of their Victory. Then Timoleon sent unto CORINTH, with the newes of this overthrow, the fairest Armour that were gotten in the spoile: because he would make his Countrey and native City spoken of and commended through the world, above all the other Cities of GRECE. For that at CORINTH onely, their chiefe Temples were set forth and adorned, not with spoiles of the GÆCIANS, nor Offerings gotten by spilling the blood of their owne Nation and Countrey (which to say truly, are unpleasant memories,) but with the spoiles taken from the barbarous people their Enemies, with inscriptions witnessing the valencie and justice of those also, who by Victory had obtained them. That is to wit, that the CORINTHIANS and their Captaine Timoleon (having delivered the GÆCIANS dwelling in SICILE, from the bondage of the CARTHAGINIANS) had given those Offerings unto the gods, to give thanks for their Victory. That done, Timoleon leaving the strangers he had in pay, in their Countrey subject to the CARTHAGINIANS, to spoile and destroy it, he returned with the rest of his Army unto SYRACUSA: where at his first coming home, he banished the thousand Souldiers that had forsaken him in his journey, with expresse charge that they should depart the City before Sun set. So these thousand cowardly and mutinous Souldiers passed over into ITALY, where, under promise of the contrary, they were all unfortunately slaine by the BRUTIANS: such was the justice of the gods to pay the iust reward of their Treason. Afterwards, Mamercus the Tyrant of CATANA, and Ictes (whether it was for the envy they did beare to Timoleons famous deedes, or for that they were afraid of him) perceiving Tyrants could looke for no peace at his hands: they made league with the CARTHAGINIANS, and wrote unto them that they should send another Army and Captaine suddenly, if they would not utterly be driven out of SICILE. The CARTHAGINIANS sent Gisco thither with three score and ten saile, who at his first coming tooke a certaine number of GÆCIAN Souldiers into pay, which were the first the CARTHAGINIANS ever retained in their service, for they never gave them pay until that present time, when they thought them to be men invincible, and the best Souldiers of the world. Moreover the inhabitants of the territory of MESSINA, having made a secret conspiracy among themselves, did slay foure hundred men that Timoleon had sent unto them: and in the territories subject unto the CARTHAGINIANS, neare unto the place they called HERES, there was another ambush laid for Enthimus LEUCADIAN, so as himselfe and all his Souldiers were cut in pieces. Howbeit the losse of them made Timoleons doings notwithstanding more fortunate: for they were even those that had forcibly entred the Temple of Apollo in the City of DELPHES, with Philodemus the PHOCIAN and with Onomarchus, who were partakers of their sacrilege. Moreover, they were loose people and abjects, that were abhorred of every body, who vagabondlike wandred up and downe the Countrey of PELOPONNESUS, when Timoleon for lack of other was glad to take them up. And when they came into SICILE, they alwayes overcame in all Battels they fought, whilst they were in his company. But in the end, when the fury of Warres was pacified, Timoleon sending them about some speciall service to the aide of some of his, they were call away every man of them: and not all together, but at divers times. So as it seemed that Gods justice, in favour of Timoleon, did separate them from the rest, when he was determined to plague them for their wicked deserts, fearing lest good men should suffer hurt by punishing of the evil. And so was the grace and good will of the gods wonderfull towards Timoleon, not onely in matters against him, but in those things that prospered well with him. Notwithstanding, the common people of SYRACUSA tooke the jesting words and writings of the Tyrants against them, in marvellous evil part. For Mamercus amongst other, thinking well of himselfe, because he could make Verses and Tragedies,

Thus we see, that men doe rather suffer hurt, then put up injurious words; and do pardon their Enemies, though they revenge by deedes, becaufe they can doe no lesse. But as for injurious words they seeme to proceede of a deadly hate, and of a cankred malice. Furthermore, when Timoleon was returned againe to SYRACUSA, the SYRACUSANS arraigned the Wives of Iceetes, and his Sonne, and their Daughters: who being arraigned, were also condemned to die by the judgement of the people. Of all the acts Timoleon did, this of all other (in my opinion) was the foulest deede: for if he had lifted, he might have saved the poore Women from death. But he pafsed not for them, and so left them to the wrath of the Citizens, who would be revenged of them, for the injuries that were done to Dion, after he had driven out the Tyrant Dionysius. For it was Iceetes that caused Arate, the Wife of Dion, to be cast into the Sea, his Sister Arifismache, and his Sonne that was yet a sucking childe, as we have written in another place in the Life of Dion. That done, he went to CATANA against Mamercus, who tarried for him by the River ABOLUS, where Mamercus was overthrowne in Battell, and above two thousand men slaine, the greatest part whereof were the CARTHAGINIANS, whom Gisco had sent for his reliefe. Afterwards he granted Peace to the CARTHAGINIANS, upon earnest suite made to him, with condition, that they should keepe on the other side of the River of LYCUS, and that it should be lawfull for any of the inhabitants there that would, to come and dwell in the territory of the SYRACUSANS, and to bring away with them their goods, their Wives and Children: and furthermore, that from thenceforth the CARTHAGINIANS should renounce all League, confederacy and alliance with the Tyrants. Whereupon Mamercus having no hope of good successe in his doings, he would goe into ITALY, to stirre up the LUCANIANS against Timoleon and the SYRACUSANS. But they that were in his company, returned back againe with their Gallies in the mid way: and when they were returned into SICILE, they delivered up the City of CATANA into the hands of Timoleon, so as Mamercus was constrained to save himselfe, and to flee into MESSINA, to Hippion the Tyrant thereof. But Timoleon followed him, and besieged the City both by sea and by land. Whereat Hippion quaked for feare, and thought to flee by taking of ship, but he was taken starting. And the MESSINIANS having him in their hands, made all the Children come from the Schoole to the Theater, to see one of the goodliest fights that they could devise: to wit, to see the Tyrant punished, who was openly whipped, and afterwards put to death. Now for Mamercus, he did yeeld himselfe unto Timoleon, to be judged by the SYRACUSANS, so that Timoleon might not be his accuser. So he was brought unto SYRACUSA, where he attempted to make an Oration to the People, which he had premeditated long before. But seeing that the People cried out and made a great noise, becaufe they would not heare him, and that there was no likelihood they would pardon

famous men in Greece.*

Oh mighty gods of heaven, What Venus stately dame, Or Cupid, (God) have thus yput, their hands unto this same?

And like as Antimachus verses, and Dionysius painting, both COLOPHONIANS, are full of finewes and strength, and yet at this present we see they are things greatly laboured and made with much paine: and that contrariwise in Nichomachus tables, and Homers verses, besides the passing workmanship and singular grace in them, a man findeth at the first sight, that they were easily made, and without great paine. Even so in like manner, whosoever will compare the painful bloudy Warres and Battels of Epinionidas and Ageliasus, with the Warres of Timoleon, in the which besides equity and iustice, there is also great ease and quietnesse: he shall finde, weighing things indifferently, that they have not beene Fortunes doings simply, but that they came of a most noble and fortunate courage. Yet he himselfe doth wisely impute it unto his good hap and favourable fortune. For in his Letters he wrote unto his familiar friends at CORINTH, and in some other Orations he made to the people of SYRACUSA, he spake it many times, that he thanked the almighty gods, that it had pleased them to save and deliver SICILE from bondage by his meanes and service, and to give him the honour and dignity of the name. And having builded a Temple in his house, he dedicated it unto Fortune, and furthermore did consecrate his whole house unto her. For he dwelt in a house the SYRACUSANS kept for him, and gave him in recompence of the good service he had done them in the Warres, with a marvellous faire pleasant house in the Countrey also, where he kept most when he was at leisure. For he never after returned unto CORINTH againe, but sent for his Wife and Children to come thither, and never dealt afterwards with those troubles that fell out amongst the GRECIANS, neither did make himselfe to be envied of the Citizens (a mischief that most Governours and Capitaines doe fall into through their unstable desire of honour and authority) but lived all the rest of his life after in SICILE, rejoicing for the great good he had done, and specially to see so many Cities and thousands of people happy by his meanes. But because it is an ordinary matter, and of necessity (as Simonides saith,) that not onely all Larkes have a tuft upon their heads, but also that in all Cities there are accusers, where the people rule: there were two of those at SYRACUSA, that continually made Orations to the people, who did accuse Timoleon, the one called Laphysius, and the other Demanetus. So this Laphysius appointing Timoleon a certaine day to come and answer to his accusation before the people, thinking to convince him: the Citizens began to mutinie, and would not in any case suffer the day of adjournment to take place. But Timoleon did pacifie them, declaring unto them that he had taken all the extreme paines and labour he had done, and had passed so many dangers, because every Citizen and inhabitant of SYRACUSA, might frankly use the liberty of their Laws. And another time Demanetus, in open assembly of the people, reproving many things Timoleon did when he was Generall: Timoleon answered never a word, but onely said unto the people, that he thanked the gods they had granted him the thing he had so requested of them in his prayers, which was, that he might once see the SYRACUSANS have full power and liberty to say what they would. Now Timoleon in all mens opinion, had done the noblest acts that ever GRECIAN Captain did in his time, and had alone deserved the fame and glory of all the noble exploits, which the Rhetoricians with all their eloquent Orations perwaded the GRECIANS unto, in the open assemblies, and common

W Timolcons great

Feasts and Playes of GREECE, out of the which Fortune delivered him safe and sound before the trouble of the civill Warres, that followed soone after: and moreover he made a great proofe of his valiancy and knowledge in Warres, against the barbarous people and Tyrants, and had shewed himselfe also a just and mercifull man unto all his friends, and generally to all the GRECIANS. And furthermore, seeing he won the most part of all his Victories and Triumphs, without the shedding of any one teare of his men, or that any of them mourned by his meanes, and also rid all SICILE of all the miseries and calamities reigning at that time, in lesse then eight yeares space: he being now grown old, his sight first beginning a little to faile him, shortly after he lost it altogether. This hapned, not through any cause or occasion of sicknesse that came unto him, nor that Fortune had casually done him this injury: but it was in my opinion, a discafe inheritable to him by his Parents, which by time came to lay hold on him also. For the voice went, that many of his kin in like case had also lost their sight, which by little and little with age, was cleane taken from them. Howbeit Athanas the Historiographer writeth, that during the Warres he had against Mamercus and Hippus, as he was in his Campe at MYTILES, there came a white spot in his eyes, that dimmed his sight somewhat: so that every man perceived that he should lose his sight altogether. Notwithstanding that, he did not raise his siege, but continued his enterprife, untill he tooke both the Tyrants at last: and so soone as he returned to SYRACUSA againe, he did put himselfe out of his office of Generall, praying the Citizens to accept that he had already done, the rather because things were brought to so good passe, as they themselves could desire. Now, that he patiently tooke this misfortune to be blinde altogether, peradventure men may somewhat marvel at it: but this much more is to be wondred at, that the SYRACUSANS after he was blinde, did so much honour him, and acknowledge the good he had done them, that they went themselves to visit him oft, and brought strangers (that were travellers) to his house in the City, and also in the Countrey, to make them see their benefactor, rejoicing and thinking themselves happy, that he had chosen to end his life with them, and that for this cause he had despised the glorious returne that was prepared for him in GREECE, for the great and happy victories he had won in SICILE. But amongst many other things the SYRACUSANS did, and ordained to honour him with, this of all other me thinketh was the chiefe: that they made a perpetuall Law, so oft as they should have Warres against forreigne people, and not against their own Countrymen, that they should chuse a CORINTHIAN for their Generall. It was a goodly thing also to see how they did honour him in the assemblies of their Council. For if any trifling matter fell in question among them, they dispatched it of themselves: but if it were a thing that required great counsell and advice, they caused Timoleon to be sent for. So he was brought through the Market-place in his Litter, into the Theater, where all the assembly of the people was, and carried in even so in his Litter as he fate; and then the people did all salute him with one voice, and he them in like case. And after he had paused a while, to heare the praises and blessings the whole assembly gave him; they did propound the matter doubtfull to him, and he delivered his opinion upon the same: which being passed by the voices of the people, his servants carried him backe againe in his Litter through the Theater, and the Citizens did waite on him a little way with cries of joy, and clapping of hands: and that done, they did repaire to dispatch common causes by themselves, as they did before. So his old age being thus entertained with such honour, and with the love and good will of every man, as of a common Father to them all: in the end a sicknesse tooke him by the backe, whereof he died. So the SYRACUSANS had a certaine time appointed them to prepare for his Funerals, and their neighbours also thereabouts to come unto it. By reason whereof his Funerall was so much more honourably performed in all things, and specially for that the people, appointed the noblest young Gentlemen of the City to carry his Coffin upon their shoulders, richly furnished and set forth, whereon his body lay, and so did convey him through the place, where the Palace and Castle of the Tyrant Dionysius had beene, which then was razed to the ground. There accompanied his body also many thousands of people, all crowned with garlands of flowers, and apparelled in their best apparell; so as it seemed it had beene the procession of some solemne Feast, and all their words were praising and blessings of the dead, with teares running downe their cheekes, which was a good testimony of the entire good will and love they did beare him, and that they did not this as men that were glad to be discharged of the honour they did him, neither for that it was so ordained: but for the just sorrow and griefe they tooke for his death, and for very hearty good love they did beare him. And lastly, the Coffin being put upon the stack of wood where it should be burnt, Demetrius one of the Heralds that had the lowdest voice, proclaimed the Decree that was ordained by the people, the effect whereof was this: The people of SYRACUSA hath ordained, that this present body of Timoleon CORINTHIAN, the Sonne of Timodemus, should be buried at the charges of the Common-weale, unto the summe of two hundred Minas, and hath honoured his memory with Playes and games of Musick, with running of Horses, and with other exercises of the body, which shall be celebrated yearly on the day of his death for evermore: and this, because he did drive the Tyrants out of SICILE, for that he overcame the barbarous people, and because he replenished many great Cities with inhabitants againe which the Warres had left desolate and uninhabited; and lastly, for that he had restored the SICILIANS againe to their liberty, and to live after their owne Laws. And afterwards, his Tombe was built in the Market-place, about the which a certaine time after, they builded certaine Cloisters and Galleries to exercise the youth in, with exercise of their bodies; and the place so walled in, was called Timoleonium: and so long as they did observe the Lawes and civill policy he stablished amongst them, they lived long time in great and continuall prosperity.

THE COMPARISON OF PAULUS ÆMYLIUS with TIMOLEON.

With these two men were such as the Historiographers have described them to be: it is certaine, that comparing one with the other, we shall finde no great oddes or difference betweene them. For first of all, the Warres they made, have beene against great and famous Enemies: the one against the MACEDONIANS, and the other against the CARTHAGINIANS, and both their Victories very notable. For the one of them conquered the Realme of MACEDON, which he tooke from the seventh King that reigned by succession from the Father to the Sonne, since the time of the great Antigonus: and the other drove all the Tyrants out of SICILE, and restored the whole Ile and Cities therein, unto their former liberty. Unlesse some will alledge perhaps that there was this difference betweene them, that Æmylius fought against King Persius, when he had all his power whole and entire, and had fought with the ROMANES many times before, and had the better of them in all conflicts: where Timoleon set upon Dionysius, when he was in greatest despaire, and in manner utterly cast away. On the contrary side, it may be objected for Timoleon, that he overcame many Tyrants, and a mighty great Army of the CARTHAGINIANS, with a very small number of men, and yet men of all sorts: not as Æmylius with a great Army of well trained and expert Souldiers in warres, but with men gathered together at adventure of all sorts, being mercenary hirelings, and men fighting for pay, loose people, and unruly in warres, that would doe but what they listed. For where the goodly deeds are like, and the meanes unequal; there we must confesse that the praise is due unto the Generall. Both the one and the other kept their hands cleane from corruption, in the charge which they tooke upon them. But it seemeth that Æmylius came so fashioned and prepared, by the good civil Law, and morall discipline of his Countrey: and that Timoleon came rawly thither, and afterwards fashioned himselfe to be that he was. And this is to be proved: for that all the ROMANES in that time were so civilly brought up, and exceeded all other in straight keeping the Lawes of their Countrey. Where to the contrary, there was not one of the Captaines of the GRECIANS that camethen, or were sent into SICILE, but fell straight to corruption, when he had put his foote into SICILE, Dion onely excepted: and yet they had a certaine suspicion of him, that he aspired to the Kingdome, and imagined in his head to stablish a certaine Empire at SYRACUSA, like unto that of LACEDÆMON. Timoleon the Historiographer writeth, that the SYRACUSANS sent Gilippus with shame backe againe into his Countrey, for his unsatiable greedy covetousnesse, and for his great thefts and bribes taken in his charge. Divers other have also written the great treasons and fallshoods Pharax SPARTAN, and Calippus ATHENIAN did commit, both of them seeking to make themselves Lords of SYRACUSA, and yet what men are they, and what meanes had they to have such a foolish vaine hope and fancie in their heads? considering that the one did follow and serve Dionysius, after he was driven out of SYRACUSA: and the other also, was but a private Captaine of a band of Footmen, of those that came with Dion. Timoleon in contrary manner was sent to be Generall of the SYRACUSANS, upon their great instance and suite. And he having no neede to seeke or hunt after it, but onely to keepe the power and authority they did willingly put into his hands: so soone as he had destroyed and overthrowne all such as would unjustly usurpe the Government, he did immediatly of his owne good will, frankly resigne up his Office and charge. And sure, so is this a notable thing to be commended, and esteemed in Paulus Æmylius: who having conquered so great and rich a Realme, he never increased his goods the value of one farthing, neither did see nor handle any Money at all, although he was very liberal, and gave largely unto others. I meane not in speaking this to appraide or detect Timoleon, for that he accepted a faire House the SYRACUSANS gave him in the City, and a goodly Mannor also in the Countrey: for

The comparison of Timoleon and Paulus Æmylius for the Warres.

The wonderfull continency of Æmylius from bribes.

Not to take Gifts, commended for a singular vertue.

for in such cases there is no dishonesty in receiving, but yet it is greater honesty to refuse then to take. But that vertue is most rare and singular, where we see they will receive nor take nothing, though they have justly deserved it. And if it be so, that the body is stronger and better compounded, which best abideth change of parching heat, and nipping cold: and that the minde is much more stronger and stable, that swelleth not up with pride or prosperity, nor droopeth for sorrow in adversity. Then it appeareth that Emilius vertue was so much more perfect, in that he shewed himselfe of no lesse grave and constant a minde, in the patience he endured for his losse and sorrow hapened unto him, (losing at one time in manner both his children) then he had done before, in all his Brother, could with no reason suppress the griefe and sorrow he felt: but overcome with bitter griefe and repentance, continued the space of twenty yeares together, and never durst once shew his face againe in the Market-place, nor deale any more in matters of the Common-wealth. Truly, for a man to beware to doe evill, and to shun from evill, it is a very good and comely thing: so also to be sorry, and afraid of every reproach, and ill opinion of the world, it sheweth a simplicitie of nature, and a good and well disposed minde, but no manly courage.

To be too bold and venturous is not good.

The answer of a Souldier to King Antigonus. Divers opinions of life and death.

CATO the elder, answered certaine on a time, that marvellously commended a bold, a venturous, and desperate man for the Warres: That there was great oddes, to esteeme manhood so much, and life so little. And surely it was wisely spoken of him. The report goeth, that King Antigonus gave pay to a Souldier among other, that was very hardy and venturous, but he had a naughty sickly body. The King asked him one day, What he ayled to be so pale and evill coloured? The Souldier told him, he had a secret Disease upon him, that he might not tell him with reverence. The King hearing him say so, commanded his Physicians and Surgeons to looke to him, and if he were curable, that they should heale him with all possible speede: and so they did. After the Souldier had his health againe, he would venture no more so desperately in the Warres, as he did before. Insomuch as King Antigonus selfe perceiving his slacknesse in drawing backe, rebuked him, and said unto him: That he wondred to see so great a change and alteration in him. The Souldier never shrinking at the matter, told him the truth plainly: Your selfe, and it please your Majesty, is cause of my cowardinesse now, by healing of my Disease, that made my life loathsome to me. Much like were a SYBARITANS words, touching the life and manner of the LACEDÆMONIANS: That it was no marvell they had such a desire to die in the Warres, seeing they did it to rid themselves of their troubles, and most miserable and straight life. But we must not wonder though the SYBARITANS, being womanish men, altogether given to pleasure, did so thinke: that those men hated their lives, who feared not death, for the desire they had had to doe good, and good will they had to doe their duty. Which was contrary in the LACEDÆMONIANS: for they were of opinion, that to live and die willingly, was a vertue: as these funeral Verbes doe witness:

*The dead which here doe rest, did not in life esteeme, That life or death were (of themselves) or good or bad to deeme,
But even as life did end, or death was brought to passe, So life or death, was good or bad: this their opinion was.*

And indeed to flie death is no shame, so it proceed not of a cowardly heart: neither to desire death is commendable, if it be with hate and contempt of life. This is the reason why Homer saith, the valiantest men are ever best armed, when they come to battell. The Law-makers among the GREECIANS, doe ever punish him that casts away his Target, but never him that casteth away his Sword, or Lance. For every man must first thinke to defend himselfe, before he seeke to hurt his Enemy, and specially such as have the whole state of a Realme in their hands, and be Generals of the field. For if the comparison be true, that Iphicrates the ATHENIAN Captaine made, that in an Army of men, the Light-horsemen resemble the hands, the men of Armes the feete, the battell of footmen the stomach and brest, the Captaine, the head of a mans body: it seemeth then that the venturous Captaine putting himselfe in danger without cause, is not onely carelesse of his owne life, but also of all theirs whose lives depend upon his safety. And contrarily, he being careful of his owne person, cannot but be careful of his Souldiers that serve under him. Therefore Callicratidas a LACEDÆMONIAN Captaine, and a worthy man otherwise, did unwisely answer a Soothsayer that bad him take heed to himselfe; for the signes and tokens of the Sacrifices did threaten his death. SPARTA, said he, standeth not upon one man alone. It is true, that to fight by Sea or by Land, man for man, Callicratidas was but one man of himselfe: but as Captaine or Lieutenant General, he had the whole power and force of the Army in his person: For he was not a man alone, when so many mens lives were lost with him. Now old Antigonus was of a contrary minde: for he being ready to give battell by Sea, about the Isle of ANDROS, made a better answer to one that said unto him; his Enemies had more Shippes then himselfe. For how many Shippes then dost thou reckon, my selfe, said he? Therein he did wisely to make great account of the worthinesse of a Generall, specially when it is joyned with hardnesse and experience: For the chieffest point of service, is to save him that saveth all other. For when Chares on a time shewed the ATHENIANS openly, the sundry wounds and cuts he had received upon his body, and his Target also thrust through with many Pikes: Timotheus straight said unto him: Chares, I am not of thy minde. For when I did besiege the City of SAMOS, I was ashamed to see a Dart throwne from the walles, light hard by me, for that I shewed my selfe a rash young man, and more venturous then became a Generall of so great an Army. For when it standeth much upon the whole Army, and that it is necessary the Generall thereof doe put himselfe in danger: then he should put himselfe forward, and occupy both hands and body without respect, not regarding their words that say, A good and wise Captaine should die for age, or at the least, old. But where there is a small honour to be wonne by very good successe, and contrariwise much losse and destruction by great misfortune: no man of wisdom or judgement would with a Generall to fight as a private Souldier, to hazard the losse of a Generall. I thought good therefore to make this Preface before the Lives of Pelopidas and of Marcellus, both which were worthy men, and died otherwise then they should. For they were both valiant Souldiers in the field, and did both of them honour their Countrey with famous Victories, and specially against great and dreadfull Enemies. For the one was the first (as they say) that overthrew Hannibal, who was never overcome by any before. And the other also overcame the LACEDÆMONIANS in battell, that ruled all GREECE at that time both by Sea and by Land. Yet they both carelessly lost their lives, by venturing too boldly, when their Countrey stood in greatest need of such men and Captaines as they were. This is the cause why we following the resemblance that was betwene them, have compared their Lives together. Pelopidas, the Sonne of Hippoclus, came of one of the noblest houses of the City of THEBES, as Epaminondas did. He being brought up in great wealth, his Father left him Heir of all his Lands and Goods, being but a young man. So he straight shewed himselfe willing to doe good, with his Money, to those that needed helpe, and were worthy: to let the world see, that his Money was not his Master. For as Aristotle saith of these rich men, the most part of them doe not use their Goods for extreme covetousnesse: other againe doe abuse them, as being given to overmuch pleasures. So rich men become slaves all their life time, some to pleasure, other to profit. Now, all Pelopidas other friends would be beholding to him, and take very thankfully his courtesie and liberality towards them: but Epaminondas could never be brought to take any thing at his hands. Howbeit Pelopidas selfe followed Epaminondas manner: for he took a pride and pleasure to go simply apparelled, to fare meanely, to labour willingly, and to make Warres openly as he did. He was even such another, as Euripides the Poet described Capaneus to be, when he said of him:

He rich and wealthy was, yet was he therewithall No night that purchas'd worldly hate, nor insolent at all.

For he would have been ashamed, that the poorest man of the City of THEBES, should have worne meaner apparell upon his backe then himselfe. As for Epaminondas, his poverty was not dainty to him, because his Parents were ever poore, and yet for all that he passed it over more easily by study of Philosophy, which he gave himselfe unto, and for that from his youth he liked to leade a brake out to foule words, and lastly his Wife fell a cursing of him, and prayed the gods he might have ill lucke in his journey, and those that sent him. Chlidon having spent the most part of the day chiding and brawling with his Wife about the Bridle, and furthermore misliking the tokens of his Wives cursing and banning of him: he determined not to go afoote out of the doores on that errand, and so went about some other businesse. Thus had this noble enterprife in manner beene altogether dashed before it was fully begun. Now those that were in Pelopidas company, changed apparell with the countrey men, because they would not be knowne, and did devide themselves for that they would not come into the City all together, but at divers gates, being day light. At that time it was a marvellous winde and great snow, and the weather was so boisterous, that every man got him within doores: which fell out happily for the conspirators, that they were not knowne when they came into the City. So their friends and confederates within the City, received them as they came, and brought them to Charons house; where were assembled together, with those that were banished, eight and forty persons onely. Now for the Tyrants, thus stood the matter with them. Philidas their Secretary was of the conspiracy, as we have told you before, and he knew all the practise. Wherefore he had long before solemnly bidden Archias and his company, to supper to his house, that very night, to be merry together, and had promised to entertaine them with Women to accompany them withall: of purpose, that when they had in their full cups, and were in the midst of all their pleasure, the conspirators might then use them as they would. So they being set at table, before they were sped of their cups, one came to them, and told them truly of the Treason (not the particularities, neither as a thing certaine, but of a rumour onely that ran abroad in the Towne: that the banished men were hidden in Charons house. Philidas would have passed the matter over. Howbeit Archias would needs send one of his Guard straight for Charon, to command him to come to him presently. It was within night, and Pelopidas and his company prepared themselves to worke their feate, being armed every man, and their Swords in their hands, when upon a sodaine they heard one knocke at the gate. And one of the house running straight to the gate, came backe againe afraid, to tell them that it was one of Archias Guard that came for Charon, to come immediately to the Governours. Then were they in doubt that their practise was discovered, and that they were all cast away, before they could make any proofe of their valiantnesse: notwithstanding, they were all of opinion, that Charon should obey the message, and that he should present himselfe before the Governours, to take away all suspicion from them. Charon of himselfe was a stout man, very constant and resolute in danger for his owne person: yet it grieved him much at that time, for feare the confederates should suspect him he had bewrailed them, if so many honest Citizens whom he had lent his house unto, should unfortunately miscarry. Therefore before he went out of his house, he went into his Wives chamber, to fetch his Sonne, that was a goodly boy, but strong as any boy of his age could be: so he brought him to Pelopidas, and prayed him, if he understood he had betrayed them any way, or otherwise had sought their hurt, they should then use his Sonne as an enemy, without any compassion towards him. When the confederates saw the good zeale and true noble minde of Charon, they all fell a weeping, and were angry with him, that he should thinke any of them so faint hearted or timorous, for any danger could come to them, that they should suspect or accuse him for any thing: and therewithall they prayed him, not to leave the Boy with them, but rather to convey him into some place out of the Tyrants danger, where he might be brought up, that one day he might be revenged of the wrong and injury they had done to them, and to their Countrey. Charon answered them, he would not take him away, and that he saw no life nor health more happy for him, then to die with his Father without infamy, and with so many honest men his friends. So after he had besought the gods to prosper them, and had encouraged and embraced every one of the confederators one after another: he went to the Governours, and studied by the way so to frame his words and countenance, as though he should seeme to thinke of any thing else, then of that he purposed to doe. When he came to Philidas doore that made the feast, Archias and Philidas himselfe came unto him, and asked him; Charon, What are they (said they) that are come into the City, and hidden in some house, with certaine Citizens, that doe accompany them? Charon was somewhat abashed at the first, and asked them againe: What men be they? Who are they that hide them in the City? But when he perceived that Archias could tell nothing of certainty, then he thought straight that some man had informed them that was not privie to the practise, but had heard something of it. Thereupon he willed them to take heed it was no false alarme, to make them afraid: nevertheless (said he) I will enquire further of it; for at all adventure it is good to be circumspect in such a case to be sure. Philidas answered him, he said truly: and so he brought Archias backe againe into the Hall, where he made him drinke deeper then before, still entertaining the company with hope of the Womens coming. Charon returning home againe, found all the confederates ready to attempt their enterprife, not as men that reckoned of their lives, nor that had hope to prevale: but as those that were determined to die valiantly, and to sell their lives dearly. Now he truly told unto Pelopidas onely, what was said unto him: and the rest, he told that Archias had sent for him, to speake with him of other matters. The storme of the former danger was scant blowne over, but Fortune sent them another: for immediately upon talke had with Charon at the first, came a Messenger from ATHENS, that brought a Letter to the same Archias, written by the Bishop of ATHENS at that time, called Archias, also as himselfe, and was his old host and friend: wherein he wrote not of simple conjecture, nor furnished suspicion, but the plaine conspiracie in every degree, as afterwards wards it fell out. So the Messenger was brought to Archias that was drunke, and delivering him the Letter, he said unto him; Sir, he that sendeth you this Letter, straightly charged me to tell you, that you should presently reade the contents thereof, because it is a matter of great importance.

Archias laughing said unto him; Weighty matters to morrow. So he tooke the Letter and put it up, and then fell againe to his tale he had begun with Philidas. But ever after, the GRECIANS, made this a common Proverbe among them, Weighty matters to morrow. Now when the conspirators spied their time to go about their businesse, they divided themselves in two companies: Pelopidas and Damocleidas went with one company, to set upon Leontidas and Hypates, because they dwelt neare together: Charon and Melon with the rest went against Archias and Philip, because disguised in womens apparell they had put upon their privy coates, and wearing garlands of Pine apple and Firre trees on their heads, they covered all their faces. So when they came to shew themselves at the Hall doore where the banquet was made, they that were in the Hall at the first sight, thinking they had bene the Women they looked for, began to shout and made great noise for joy. But when the conspirators cast their eyes round about the Hall to know those that were at the Table, they drew out their Swords, and set upon Archias and Philip overthrowing the Table: then they shewed themselves what they were. Then Philidas bad his guests he had bidden to the banquet with them, that they should not stir, for they should have no hurt: so some of them fate still, but the greatest number of them would needs from the boord, to defend their Governours. Howbeit because they were drunke that they knew not what they did, they were soone slaine with them. Now Pelopidas enterprife was not so easie: For they went against Leontidas, that was a sober discreet man, and withall hardy of his hands: and they found he was gone to bed, his doores were shut up, and they knocked long before any man came to the doore. At the length one of his men that heard them rap so hard, with much ado came to open the doore: but he had no sooner thrust backe the bolt of the doore, and began to open it, but they pushed it from them with such a force upon him altogether, that they laid him on the ground, and went straight to his Masters chamber. Leontidas hearing the noise of them that ran up to him in such haste, presently mistrusted the matter: and leaping out of his bed, rooke his Sword in his hand, but did forget to put out the Lampes that burned in his chamber all night; for if they had bene out, they might easily have hurt one another in the darke. But the Lampes giving cleare light in the chamber, he went to the chamber doore, and gave Cephisodorus the first man that pressed to enter upon him, such a blow with his Sword, that he dropped downe dead at his feet. Having slaine the first man, he dealt with the second that came after him, and that was Pelopidas. The fight went hard betweene them two, both for that the chamber doore was very straight, as also for that Cephisodorus body lying on the ground, did choke the coming in at the chamber. Notwithstanding, Pelopidas overcame him in the end, and slew him: and went from thence with his company straight to Hypates house, where they got in, as they did unto Leontidas house before. But Hypates knew presently what it was, and thought to save himselfe in his neighbours houses. Howbeit the conspirators followed him so hard, that they cut him off before he could recover their houses. Then they gathered to him, and joyned with Melons company, and sent immediately with all possible speede to ATHENS, to the banished THEBANS there, and cryed through the City, Liberty, liberty, arming those Citizens that came to them with the armour and spoiles of their Enemies, that were hanged in common vaults, and Armourers shops about Charons house, which they brake open, or caused to be opened by force. On the other side, Epaminondas and Gorgidas, came to joine with them, with a company of young men and honest old men well appointed, whom they had gathered together. Hereupon the whole City was straight in an uprore and tumult, and every house was full of lights, one running to another to know what the matter was. Nevertheless the people did not yet assemble together, but every one being amazed, musing at this sturre, not understanding the troth, stayed till day came on, that they might call a Councell. But truly herein me thinks the Captaines of the Garrison of the LACEDÆMONIANS were greatly in fault, that they did not stir betimes, and set upon them incontinently: considering there was fifteene hundred Soldiers, besides a great number of Citizens that would have come, one after another to take their parts. But the great noise they heard made them afraid, and to see lights in every mans house, and the people running up and downe the streetes in great multitudes too and fro: whereupon they stirred not, but onely kept them within the Castle of CADMEA. The next morning by breake of day, came the other banished THEBANS from ATHENS, very well armed, and all the people of THEBS drew together in Councell. Thither did Epaminondas and Gorgidas bring Pelopidas and his consorts, and presented them before the people, compassed about with Priests and the possessed of the City, offering them Crownes to put upon their heads, and they prayed the assembly of the Citizens, that they would helpe their gods and their Country. All the people that were present when they saw them, arose up and stood on their feete, and with great shouts and clapping of hands received them, as their favours, that had delivered their Country from bondage, and restored them againe to Liberty: and thereupon before them all, even in the Market-place, by the whole voice and consent of the people, they chose Pelopidas, Melon and Charon, Governours and Capitaines of BOEOTIA. Pelopidas then immediately made them besiege the Castle of Cadmea about, with trenches and force of Wood, doing all he could possiblie to win it, and to expulse the LACEDÆMONIANS, before any supply or aide came to them from SPARTA. So he did, and prevented it so suddenly, that the Garrison being departed out of the Castle by composition, as they returned towards LACEDÆMONIA, they found Cleombrotus King of SPARTA in the Countrey of MEGARA, coming towards them with a great Army to helpe them. Afterwards, of the three Captaines which had charge of their Garrison that lay at THEBES, the SPARTANS condemned two of them to death: Hermippidas and Arcissus were presently executed: and the third Captaine, Dyscorides, they set so grievous a Fine on his head, that he went out of PELOPONNESUS. This enterprife being attempted, and executed with the like valiantnesse, and the same danger and trouble, that Thraſibulus practise was, when he delivered ATHENS from the slavery of the thirty Governours and Tyrants; and having the like fortune and happy end, the GRECIANS termed it Cofin-german to Thraſibulus act. And indeed it was a hard matter to finde two other such, besides them two, that with so few men overcame their Enemies, being many mo in number then themselves, or that with so small helpe did overcome those that were of so great force, or that performed their enterprife with their onely valiance and wisdom, and were cause besides of so great blessing and benefit to their Countrey, as Pelopidas and Thraſibulus attempt was. But the great change and alteration of the State afterwards, did make their acts farre more noble and famous. For the Warre that overthrew the majesty of SPARTA, and that tooke away all the Seigniorie and rule of the LACEDÆMONIANS both by sea and by land, beganne the very same night, when Pelopidas himselfe making the twelfth person, and entering into a private house, taking neither City nor Cattle, nor strong hold (to tell truly by figurative speech) did breake and cut in sunder, the linkes and chaines that linked straight together, and strengthened the LACEDÆMONIANS whole Empire and Monarchie over all GREECE: who untill that present time were thought so strong, as no possibility could breake or sunder them. Now the LACEDÆMONIANS fortuning afterwards to invade the Countrey of BOEOTIA with a mighty Army, the ATHENIANS trembling for feare of their great power, did utterly leave to protect them, and renounced the League and alliance they had made before with them. And moreover they did straightly prosecute Law against those, that were accused to take part with the BOEOTIANS: whereof some of them were put to death, other were banished from ATHENS, and the rest condemned in great summes of Money. To be short, every man said the THEBANES were but vndone, considering they had no helpe, and were beloved besides of none. At that present time it fell out Pelopidas and Gorgidas were Generals over all BOEOTIA for that year, who devising to throw a bone betwixt the ATHENIANS and the LACEDÆMONIANS againe, to make them square, they used this policie. There was a Captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS called Sphodrias, a valiant man, but else of small capacity, and vainely given, having a certaine fond ambition and humour, perswading himselfe he had done some notable good service in his time. This Sphodrias was left in the City of THEBES, with a great band of Souldiers to receive and favour all the BOEOTIANS that had a minde to revolt from the THEBANES. Pelopidas of himselfe sent a Merchant (a very friend of his) unto Sphodrias with a great summe of Money from him, and certaine perswasions withall, which prevailed more then the Money, wishing him to attempt some greater matter, and to seeke to winne the haven of PIRÆA: a thing soone wonne, if he came to assault it on the sodaine; and the rather, for that the ATHENIANS mistrust nothing, neither keepe watch nor ward there. Moreover that he might assure himselfe, nothing could be better welcome to the Lords of LACEDÆMONIA, then to make them Lords of the City of ATHENS also. And againe that the THEBANES being at deadly feud with the ATHENIANS, for that they had betrayed and forsaken them in their neede, would not aide nor succour them in any respect. Sphodrias giving too light eare to this vaine perswasion, tooke the Souldiers he had with him, and marching away by night entred the Realme of ATTICA, and went on to the City of ELEUSIN: but when he came thither, his Souldiers were afraid, and would goe no further. So his purpose being discovered, he was forced to returne backe to THEBES, having raised such a Warre to the LACEDÆMONIANS, as fell out to be of no small importance to them, nor easie to be pacified. For after that time, the ATHENIANS fought League and amity againe with the THEBANES, and did aide them very lovingly: and moreover, putting themselves to sea, they sailed up and downe, procuring and drawing to their League all such as were willing to rebell against the LACEDÆMONIANS: and the THEBANES besides, had many pretty skirmishes with the LACEDÆMONIANS in the meane time, in their owne Countrey of BOEOTIA. It is true they came to no great Battels, but yet it was such a great learning and continuall training of them in martiall discipline, as the THEBANES still increased in courage and valiantnesse, and waxed stronger and better Souldiers: for by those skirmishes they grew not only expert Souldiers, but waxed more skillfull in using their weapons, then before. As we read, that Antalcidas a SPARTAN said one day to King Agessilaus, coming home fore hurt from BOEOTIA: Surely the THEBANES have given you a worthy reward, for teaching them to be Souldiers against their wils. But to say truly, Agessilaus was not their Master to teach them to make Warres, but they were the good and wise Leaders of the THEBANES, who like good woodmen in chusing their Game, could skillfully chuse both time and place to give their Enemies Battell, and make them retire againe with safety, after they had bene fleshed, giving them a little tast of the fruits and commodity of Victory: but among them, Pelopidas was he that deserved most honour. For since the first time they gave him charge of men of Warre, they never failed, but chose him continually every yeare, either Captaine of the Holy Band, or Governour of BOEOTIA so long as he lived: so that Pelopidas only did the most things in this Warre. The LACEDÆMONIANS were overthrowne in sundry journies, that they were distressed by the Cities of PLATES, and of THE-

PIES, where Phaydas himselfe (that had before taken the Castle of CADMEA) was slaine among other. Another great Power of theirs also, was overthrowne here to the City of TEGYRA, where Panthoidas Governour of the same, was also slaine. Now all these Victories, though they much encouraged the hearts of the Conquerours, and made them hardy: yet did they not thereby altogether conquer the mindes of the vanquished. For the LACEDÆMONIANS were not overcome in any pitched Field, nor set Battell, where they had their whole Army together: but they were light Rodes, and Skirmishes properly laid of purpose, where sometime flying, sometime driving them againe, they bickered very oft, and put them to the worst. But the Battell of TEGYRA, which was but a flourish and prooffe to the Journey of LEUCTRES, wanne Pelopidas great honour: for he had no companion to challenge any part of his Glory and Victory, neither did he leave his Enemies any lawfull excuse, to shadow or cover their overthrow. For he spied all occasion he might possibly: how to take the City of ORCHOMENE, that tooke part with the LACEDÆMONIANS; and had received two Ensignes of Footmen of theirs to keepe it. Pelopidas being advertised one day, that the Garison of ORCHOMENE was gone abroad to make a rode into the Countrey of the LOCRIDES, hoping he should finde ORCHOMENE without Garrison, he marched thither with his holy Band, and certaine number of Horsemen. But when he drew neare the City, he had intelligence there was another Garison coming from SPARTA to supply the place of the Garison that was abroad: whereupon he returned backe againe by the City of TEGYRA, for he could have passed no other way, but to have turned downe by the foote of the Mountaine. For all the Valley that lay betwene both, was drowned with overflowing of the River of MELAS, which even from his very head carrieth ever such a breadth with it, as it maketh the Marishes navigable, so as it is unpassable for any shallow it hath. Not far from these Marishes standeth the Temple of Apollo TEGIRIAN, where was an Oracle in old time, but left off at this day, and had never long continuance, but onely untill the time of the Warres of the MEDES, when Echuerates was Master and chiefe Priest there. And some hold opinion, that Apollo was borne there: for they call the next Mountaine to it DELOS, at the foote whereof the Marishes of the River of MELOS do end, and behinde the Temple are two goodly Springs, from whence cometh great abundance of good sweet water: whereof the one of them is called to this day the Palme, and the other the Olive. And some say also, that the goddesse Larona was not brought to bed betwene two Trees, but betwene these two Springs. For Mount PTOUM to bed betwene it hard by it also, from whence the wilde Bore came of a sudden that flied her. And the Tale that is told of the Serpent Pytho, and of the Giant Tytius, do both confirme it, that Apollo was borne in the same place. I passe over many other conjectures confirming the same, for that we do not believe in our Countrey, that Apollo is among the number of those, who from mortall men have been translated to immortall gods, as are Hercules and Bacchus, that through the excellency of their vertue, did put off Mortality, and tooke immortality upon them: but we rather take him for one of those that never had beginning nor generation, at the least if those things be to be credited, which so many grave and ancient Writers have left in writing to us, touching so great and holy things. The THEBANES returning backe from ORCHOMENE, and the LACEDÆMONIANS on the other side returning also from LOCRIDE both at one time, they fortified both Armies to meete about the City of TEGYRA. Now so soone as the THEBANES had discovered the LACEDÆMONIANS passing the straight, one of them ran suddenly to Pelopidas, and told him: Sir, we are fallen into the hands of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Nay, are not they rather fallen into ours, answered Pelopidas againe? With these words he commanded his Horsemen that was in the Rereward, to come before, and set upon them: and himselfe in the meane time put his Footmen immediately into a pretty Squadron close together, being in all not above three hundred men, hoping when he should come to give charge with his Battell, he should make a lane through the Enemies, though they were the greater number. For the LACEDÆMONIANS divided themselves in two Companies, and every Company, as Ephorus writeth, had five hundred men: and as Callisthenes said, seven hundred. Polybius and divers other Authours say, they were nine hundred men. So Theopompus and Gorgoleon, the Captaines of the LACEDÆMONIANS, luttily marched against the THEBANES: and it fell out so, that the first Charge was given, where the Chieftaines or Generals were of either side, with great fury on either part, so as both the Generals of the LACEDÆMONIANS which set upon Pelopidas together, were slaine. They being slaine, and all that were about them being either hurt or killed in the Field: the rest of the Army was so amazed, that they divided in two, and made a lane on either side, for the THEBANES to passe through them if they would. But when they saw Pelopidas meant not to take the passage they offered him, and that he came on still with his men to set upon those that were yet in Battell ray, and slew all them that stood before him: then they turned taile, and tooke them to their legs. Howbeit the THEBANES did not chase them far, fearing the ORCHOMENIANS who were not far from them, and the new Garison besides, that were come from LACEDÆMON not long before. And this was the cause they were content that they had overcome them by force, and had passed through their Army in despite of them, and broken and overthrowne them. So when he had set up markes of Triumph, and spoiled their slaine Enemies, they returned home againe, glad men for their obtained Victory. For in all the Warres the LACEDÆMONIANS ever made, as well with the GRECIANS as with the barbarous People also, there was never Chronicle mentioned at any time, that their Enemies being so few, did overcome them: that were so many, nor that they were overcome also by any number equal in Battell. Whereupon they grew lo courageous and terrible, that no man durst once abide them: for

for their onely Fame did so terrifie their Enemies that came to fight against them, that they thought with no equal force so able to performe as much as they had done. But this Battell of TEGYRA was the first that made both them and the other GRECIANS know, that it was not the River of EUROTAS alone, nor the Valley that lieth betwene the Rivers of CNACTION, and of BABYCE, that breedeth the valiant and hardy fighting men: but that it is in all places else, where they learne, yea men reborn of dishonour and vile things, and to venture their lives for honest causes, fearing more dishonourable reproach, then honourable danger. These are the People most to be feared, and are most terrible also to their Enemies. And for the holy Band we mentioned before, it is said Gorgidas was the first creator of the same. They were three hundred chosen men entertained by the State, and they alwaies kept within the Castle of CADMEA, and the Band was called the Fownes Band; for at that time, and specially in that part of GREECE, they called the Castles and great Holds in Cities, the Townes. Other say it was a Band of Footmen that were in love one with another. And therefore Pammoneus pleasant words are noted, saying, that Nestor could not skill to set an Army in Battell ray, seeing he gave the GRECIANS the counsell, in the Iliades of Homer, that they should set them in Battell ray, every Countrey and Tribe by themselves.

The one might alwaies helpe at hand, that other do bebove.*

Men loving together, fight deperately against their Enemies.

For, said he, one friend should rather be set by another that loves together: because in danger, men commonly do little regard their Countreymen, or such as are of their Tribe. But men that do love one another, can never be broken nor overcome: for the passion of love that entertaineth each others affection, for affections fake, doth keepe them from forsaking one another. And those that are beloved, being ashamed to do any vile and dishonest thing before those that love them, for very love will stick one by another to the death. And sure the reason is good, if it be true that lovers do indeede more regard them they love, though they be asient, then other that be present. As appeared by the example of him, that being stricken downe to the ground, his Enemy lifting up his sword to kill him, he prayed him he would give him his death wound before, lest his friend that loved him, seeing a wound on his backe, should be ashamed of him. It is reported also, that Iolane being beloved of Hercules, did helpe and accompany him in all his Labours and Quarrels. Whereupon Aristote writeth, that unto his time; such as loved heartily together, became sworne Brethren one to another, upon Iolane's Tombe. And therefore methinks it is likely, that this Band was first called the holy Band, by the selfe same reason that Plato calleth a lover; a divine friend by Gods appointment. It is written also, that this Band was never broken, nor overthrowne before the Battell of CHERONIA. After that Battell, Philip taking view of the flaine bodies, he stayed in that place where the foure hundred men of that Band lay dead on the ground, one hard by another, and all of them flaine and thrust through with Pikes on their breasts, whereat he wondered much: and being told him that it was the Lovers Band, he fell a weeping for pity, saying: Wo be to them that thinke these men did, or suffered any evill or dishonest thing. And to be short, the misfortune of Laius, that was flaine by his owne Brother OEdipus, was not the first originall cause of this custome, that the THEBANES began to be in love one with another, as the Poets write: but they were their first Law-makers, who perceiving them to be a stout and fierce Nation on nature, they fought even from their youth to make them gentle and civill, and therefore in all their actions both of sport and earnest, they continually acquainted them with playing of the Flute, being highly esteemed of them in those dayes. They brought in the use also to make love in the midst of all their youthfull Sports and Exercises of their bodies, to frame the young mens manners, and to bring them to a civill life. And therefore they had reason that gave the goddesse Harmonia to the THEBANES, for Defendor and Patroneesse of their City, who was begotten (as they say) betwene Mars and Venus. For that giveth us to understand, that where force and warlike courage is joyned with grace, to winne and perswade, all things by this union and accord are brought to a goodly, profitable, and most perfect Government. Now, to returne againe to the matter of this holy Band of the THEBANES, Gorgidas dividing it in the former Rankes, and placing it all along the Front of the Battell of the Footmen, it did not appeare what they were able to do of themselves, for that he brought them not all into one Body: so as thereby they might see what service the whole Company could do being together, considering that it was divided and mingled amongst many other, that were a great deale of lesse value then themselves. But Pelopidas that had made good proofe of their valiantnesse before, when they fought about him of themselves, without others by them, at TEGYRA: would never after divide nor separate them one from the other, but keeping them together as one entire Body that had all his Members, he would alwaies begin with them to give a Charge in his most dangerous Battells. For, as we see in running of Coaches at Games, that Horses being tied all together in a Front, do runne faster and stronger then they do when they are loose, and put to it alone: and not for that they being many together, do breake through the aire better, but for that the contention and envie betwene them to over-runne one another, doth indeede set their hearts and stomachs on fire. Even so he thought, that valiant men giving one another a desire and envie to do well, should have the more courage, and would be of greater force, when they fought one in anothers fight. But the LACEDÆMONIANS afterwards being at peace and league with all the other GRECIANS, proclaimed open Warres against the THEBANES onely: and King Cleombrotus went to invade them with an Army of tenne thousand Footmen, and a thousand Horsemen. Whereupon the THEBANES were not onely in the like danger they stood in before before to lose their liberty, but the LACEDÆMONIANS did openly threaten they would utterly destroy them for ever: so that all the Countrey of BOEOTIA stood in greater feare then ever they did before. And one day as Pelopidas went out of his House to go to the Warres, his Wife bringing him to the doores to take her leave of him, weeping, she prayed him heartily to looke well to himselfe. But he answered her againe: My good Wife, it is for private Souldiers to be carefull of themselves, but not for Capitaines: for they must have an eye to save others lives. And when he came to the Campe, he found the Capitaines and the Lieutenants of the Army, in sundry opinions: and he was the first that agreed with Epaminondas opinion, who thought it best they should give Battell to the Enemies. Pelopidas at that time was neither Governour of BOEOTIA, nor Generall of the Army, but onely Capitaine of the holy Band: notwithstanding they had great affiance in him, and gave him great Authority in Councell concerning their affaires: such as became a man that had made so good testimony of his naturall love and affection to his Countrey, as he had done. Now being determined in Councell, that they should give the Enemy Battell, they all mustered together in the Valley of LEUCTRES, where he had a Vision in his Dreame, that troubled him very much. In that Valley there are the Tombes of the Daughters of one Scedafus, which by reason of the place, they call the LEUCTRIDES, for that they were buried there, after they had beene defiled and ravished by certaine Guests of the SPARTANS that lay in their House, travelling that way. This act being so horrible and wicked, the poore Father of these defiled Virgins, could neither have justice nor revenge of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and therefore after he had banned and cursed the LACEDÆMONIANS with most horrible and execrable railings and curses as might be possible, he killed himselfe upon the Graves of his Daughters. The LACEDÆMONIANS had many sundry Oracles, Prophecies, and Signes of the gods to warne them, to take heed of the wrath of the LEUCTRIDES: howbeit every man understood not the signification of this Prophecy, but were deceived by the equivocation of the name. For therewas a little Towne in the Countrey of LACONIA, standing upon the Sea side, called LEUCTRUM: and in ARCADIA also by the City of MEGALIPOLIS, there was another Towne called by the same name. This misfortune chanced long before the Battell of LEUCTRES: but then Pelopidas dreaming in his Tent, thought he saw in a Vision the Daughters of Scedafus weeping about their Graves, and cursing the LACEDÆMONIANS: and that he saw their Father also, commanding him to sacrifice a red Maiden to his Daughters, if they would obtaine the Victory. This commandment at the first, seemed very cruell and wicked: whereupon when he arose, he went to the Prognosticators, and Generals of the Army, and told them his Dreame. So some of them said, this was no matter to be lightly passed over, but to be considered of, alledging many examples in the like cases. As of Menecius the Sonne of Creon in old time, and of Macareus the Daughter of Hercules. And yet of latter memory, the wife Pherecydes, whom the LACEDÆMONIANS slew, and whose skin their Kings do keepe at this day, by commandment of an Oracle. And Leonidas, who following a Prophecy of the gods, did as it were sacrifice himselfe, for the safety of GREECE. And furthermore, the young boyes which Themistocles did sacrifice to Bacchus Omestes (to say, eating raw flesh) before the Battell of SALAMINA. And all these Sacrifices were acceptable to the gods, as the Victories following did plainly shew. In contrary manner also King Agessilaus, coming from those very places, from whence King Agamemnon came in the time of the Warres of TROYA, and going also against the same Enemies, dreamed one night in the City of AULIDE, he saw the goddesse Diana, asking him his Daughter for Sacrifice. But he tenderly loving her, would by no means performe it: and thereupon was compelled to breake off his Journey before he had executed his Enterprize, and departed with small honour. Other to the contrary stode to it stoutly, and said, it was not to be done. For, so cruell, abominable, and brutish a Sacrifice, could not be acceptable to any of the gods, nor to any god, better or mightier then ours: considering that they be no impressions in the aire, nor Giants that rule the World, but the one onely mighty and eternall God, Father of gods and men. And to believe that either gods or demi-gods do delight in murder, or shedding of mans blood, it is a meere mockery and folly. But admit it were so, they were no more to be regarded therein, then those that have no power at all: for it is a manifest token of a wicked spirit, when they have such damnable and horrible desires in them, and specially if they abide still with them. Now the Generals and Heads of the Army of the THEBANES being of sundry dry opinions, and Pelopidas being more afraid then before, by reason of their disagreement: a young Mare-colt, or Filly, breaking by chance from other Mares, running and flinging through the Campe, came to stay right against them. Then every man began to looke upon her, and to marke what a faire Filly it was, and red coloured every where, and what a pride she tooke with her selfe to heare her owne neighing. Theocritus then the Soothsayer being amongst them, did behold her, and knew straight what the Filly meant, and so cried out forthwith: O happy Pelopidas, loe here is the Sacrifice thou lookest for, seeke no other Virgin for thy Sacrifice, but take this that God himselfe doth fend thee. When Theocritus had said so, they tooke the Filly, and laid her upon the Tombe of Scedafus Daughters, and put Garlands of Flowers about her, as they handled other Sacrifices: and then after the Prayers made to the gods, they did sacrifice her with great joy, and told Pelopidas Vision in his Dreame the night before through all the Campe, and the Sacrifice they had made also according to the signification thereof. Moreover when they came to joyned Battell, Epaminondas being Generall, drew all his Army on the left hand, because he would bring the right Wing of the Enemies Army (where they had placed the naturall SPARTANS) further from the other GRECIANS their Friends and Allies, that were set in the other Wing of their Battell: that that he coming with his whole Power together to give a Charge upon Cleombrotus their King (being in a corner by himselfe) might be distressed or overthrowne. The Enemies finding Pelopidas intent, began to change their order, and having men enough, meant to thrust out their right Wing at length to compasse in Epaminondas. But Pelopidas in the meane time suddenly prevented them, and running in great fury with his Squadron of three hundred men, he set upon Cleombrotus before he could disorder his men to put forth the right Wing, and joyne them together againe. And so he found the LACEDÆMONIANS not yet settled in their Ranks, and brake them in this disorder, thrusting one in anothers place to put themselves againe in order: notwithstanding the LACEDÆMONIANS of all other men were the only Captains and most expert Souldiers in Martiall Discipline, as men so trained and practised, that no sudden altering, of forme or order in their Ranks, could either trouble or disorder them. For they were men so trained, that they could turne head or side upon any sudden occasion offered, and could fight and order themselves in Battell every way alike. So Epaminondas going to give the onset upon them alone, with the whole force of his Battell together, not tarrying for others: and Pelopidas also with an incredible courage and readinesse, presenting himselfe in Battell before them, did put them into such a terrible feare, that they cleane forgot their skill in fighting, and their wanted courage failed them. For they cowardly turned their backs, and there were moe LACEDÆMONIANS slaine at that day, then ever were before in any former Battell. Pelopidas therefore, being neither Governour of BOEOTIA, nor Generall of all the Army, but only Captaine of the holy Band: did notwithstanding winne as much Honour and Glory of this Victory, as Epaminondas, that was Governour of BOEOTIA, and Generall of all the Army. Indeed afterwards they were both Governours of BOEOTIA together, when they invaded the Countrey of PELOPONNESUS: where they made most part of the Cities and People rebell against the LACEDÆMONIANS, and take their part; as the ELIANS, the ARGIVES, and all ARCADIA, and the best part of LACONIA selfe: notwithstanding it was in the heart of Winter, and in the shortest dayes of the yeare, and towards the latter end also of the last Moneth of their yeeres Authority and Rule, having not many dayes to continue in Office, being forced to leave their Authority, upon paine of death if they did refuse, unto other Officers new chosen, the beginning of the next Moneth following. Whereupon their other companions, and Governours also of the Countrey of BOEOTIA, what for feare to incur the danger of the Law, as also to avoid the trouble to lye in Campe in the sharpest of Winter: they did urge and perswade them to bring the Army backe againe into their Countrey. But Pelopidas was the first that yeelded to Epaminondas opinion, and wanne the other THEBANES also to consent unto it, to be contented to be led by them, to give assault to the City selfe of SPARTA. So, through their perswasions they passed over the River of EUROtas, and tooke many little Townes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and waisted and destroyed all the Countrey to the Sea side, leading under their Enignes an Army of threescore and ten thousand fighting men, and all GRECIANS, the THEBANES not making up the twelfth part of them. Now, the honour and great reputation of these two persons, Epaminondas and Pelopidas, brought their friends and confederates, that they followed them, without any resolution of Councill or publick order, and never opened their mouths against them, but willingly marched under their conduction. And in my opinion, truly methinks it is the first and chiefe point in the Law of Nature, that he that is weake, not able to defend himselfe, should leane to one that is strong, and able to defend both. Even much like to fresh-water Souldiers, and raw Sea-men, that lying at Sea in calme weather, and in safe Harbour, are as lusty and bragge with the Masters and Boate-Swaines as may be: but let a little storme of weather come upon them suddenly, and that they be in any danger, then they looke on the Masters, hoping for no life but at their hands. And even in like manner the ELIANS and ARGIVES, who though in all Assemblies of Councill they would ever jarre and strive with the THEBANES, for Honour and Superiority in the Army: yet when any Battell came to be fought, wherein they saw there was danger, then their Peacocks bravery was gone, and they were glad to obey their Generals commandment. In this Journey they brought all the Cities of the Province of ARCADIA to be in League with them, and tooke all the Countrey of MESSENIA from the LACEDÆMONIANS, which they peaceably enjoyed: and called home againe all the ancient Inhabitants of the same, and restored them to their Countrey, and replenished the City of ITHOME. Then returning afterwards into their Countrey by the City of CENCHREES, they overthrow the ATHENIANS that came to trouble them, in entering into the Straight of PELOPONNESUS, supposing to have stopped their passage. Thus was the valiantnesse of these two worthy men greatly commended and honoured of every body, for so many notable Exploits and Victories as they had wonne, and their marvellous good success, greatly wondered at. But as their Glory and renowne increased abroad, so did their Countreymens malice and envie increase against them at home: who had prepared such a welcome home for them, as was so bad and vile for so honourable Service as they had done. For Epaminondas and Pelopidas both, at their returne were accused of Treason. For there was a speciall Law at THEBANES, that commanded all such as should happen to be Governours of BOEOTIA, to resigne their Office immediately to the new Officers elect, at the beginning of the first Moneth of the yeare, which in BOEOTIA they call BOUCATION: and they had kept it foure whole Moneths above their terme appointed, in which time they had done all that we have spoken of before, as well in the Province of MESSENIA and of ARCADIA, as also in the Countrey of LACONIA. Pelopidas was the first of the two that was called in by Proceffe, therefore he stood in the greater danger: howbeit howbeit in the end, they were both discharged againe. As for Epaminondas, he tooke his Accusation and the attempt of his Enemies (whereby they sought to have cast them both away) quietly enough: judging, that patience to those that deale in State and Government, is a great shew of force and magnanimity. But Pelopidas being of a hotter nature, and more cholerick, and set on besides by some of his friends, did take this occasion to be revenged. Meneclidas the Orator was one of those that came into Charons house with Pelopidas and Melon: but notwithstanding the THEBANES did nothing honour him, as they did the rest. He taking this ill at their hands, being marvellous eloquent of speech, but viciously given otherwaies, and a man of a vile and mischievous nature: did fondly abuse his Eloquence, fallily accusing those that were his betters, in honesty and credit. And not being contented with this first accusation, he practised so commonly, that he put Epaminondas one yeare from being Governour of BOEOTIA, which he sued for: and moreover, he was ever against him in all matters of State he tooke in hand. But he could never bring Pelopidas out of favour with the People: and therefore he sought to make debate betwixt him and Charon. For it is the common trick of all spitefull persons, who when they cannot be thought so honest as those whom they envie, to go about to prove that they are not so honest and meete men, as those whom they prefer and commend. So, in all his Orations he made to the People, he continually extolled and commended Charons noble Acts and Victories, and specially that Victory above other, which the THEBANES won before the Journey of LEUCTRES, in a Skirmish of Horsemen, that was before the City of PLATEES; he having charge of the same: of the which he would leave his memory. Androcles a CYZICENIAN and Painter, was at a price with the THEBANES to paint them some other Battell in a Table, and he did draw this Worke in the City selfe of THEBANES: but as he was in hand withall, the rebellion of the THEBANES fell out against the LACEDÆMONIANS, and Warre followed on the necke of that, whereupon the Painter forsooke THEBANES, leaving his Worke in a manner done and perfect. The THEBANES kept this Table by them, and this Meneclidas moved the People they would hang it up in some Temple of publick place, with an Inscription upon it, saying thus: This was Charons Victory; of purpose to deface and obscure the Glory of Pelopidas and of Epaminondas. Too vaine and fond was his ambition, to set before so many noble Battels and Victories, one simple overthrow of Charon, in the which Gerandas, one of the meanest Gentlemen of all SPARTA was slaine, and forty other with him: and this was all he did. Pelopidas milked Meneclidas motion, maintaining that it was directly against the Lawes of THEBANES, which did expressly forbid, that no private person should be honoured with the Title of common Victory, but willed the Glory thereof should be attributed to all the People generally. Indeed Pelopidas in his Orations did greatly praise and commend Charon, notwithstanding he made open prooffe, how Meneclidas was an envious and spitefull detractor, and a naughty wicked man, oftentimes asking the THEBANES, if they themselves were worthy of no honour? so as in the end he caused Meneclidas to be condemned in a great summe of Money. But he finding himselfe unable to pay it, being so great a summe, practised afterwards to alter the whole State and Government. I thought good to dilate this at large, because methinks it doth somewhat declare Pelopidas nature and manners, what they were. Now about that time Alexander the Tyrant of PHERES, was at open Warres with many People of THESSALY, and did use all the Tyrant of PHERES, to pray them to send them a Captaine with an Army to aide them. Then Pelopidas seeing Epaminondas occupied about the Warres of PELOPONNESUS, did offer himselfe to the THESSALIAN Ambassadors, being loth to drowne his experience and sufficiency in Wars, with unprofitable and tedious idlenesse, knowing that in those parts where Epaminondas lay, there needed no other Captaine. Now when he came with his Army into THESSALY, the City of LARISSA yeelded presently unto him: where the Tyrant Alexander came to meete with him, and to pray him to treat a Peace betwixt him and the THESSALIANS. Pelopidas, attempting to bring it to passe, seeking instead of a Tyrant to make him a gentle, just, and lawfull, Governour of THESSALY. But when he saw no perswasions could take place with the Tyrant, and that he grew more stubborn and untractable, and would not heare reason: and moreover, that he heard many grievous complaints of his great cruelties, and how they accused him to be a marvellous dissolute and unruly person in all his doings, and extremely covetous besides: then he began to speake roundly to him, and to handle them roughly. But the Tyrant thereupon stole away secretly from him, and fled with his Guard and Souldiers about him. So Pelopidas leaving the THESSALIANS out of all feare and danger of the Tyrant, and furthermore in good peace and amity one with the other, he went into MACEDON: where Ptolemy made Warre at that time with Alexander, being King of MACEDON, they both having sent for him to heare and determine the quarrell betwixt them, and also to helpe him that had the right, against him that did the wrong. So when he came thither, he pacified them both, and restored the banished men of either side, to their Lands and Goods againe. For assurance of Peace, he tooke the Kings Brother in Hostage, whose name was Philip, and thirty other Children of the Noblest mens Sonnes of MACEDON, whom he brought away with him to THEBANES, to let the GRECIANS see, that the Reputation of the THEBANES Power stretched far, and the Renowne also of their manner of Government and Justice. It is the same Philip, that made Warre afterwards with the GRECIANS, to take their Liberty from them, howbeit being but a Boy at that time, he was brought up at THEBANES in Pammenes house. And this is the cause, why some thought Philip did follow Epaminondas manner: and

and it might be peradventure, he did learne of him to be quick and ready in the Warres, which was indeed but a piece of Epaminondas vertue. But as for the continency, justice, magnanimity, and clemency, which were the speciall points that made Epaminondas of great fame: Philip could neither by nature, education, or study, ever attaine unto. The THESSALIANS having sent afterwards to THEBES, to complaine of Alexander the Tyrant of PHERES, that did againe molest and trouble the free Cities of THESSALY, Pelopidas was sent thither Ambassadour with Ismenias, carrying no Power with him from THEBES, little thinking he should have needed to have made Warres: whereupon he was compelled to take men of the Country selfe, upon the instant necessity offered. At the very same time also, all MACEDON was up in Armes: for Ptolemy had slaine the King, and usurped the Kingdome, and the servants and friends of the dead King called upon Pelopidas for aide, who desiring to come even upon the fact, and having brought no men of Warre out of his owne Country with him, did presently leavie certaine men where he was, and so marched forward with them against Ptolemy. Now Ptolemy when both their Powers met, did corrupt the Souldiers Pelopidas had brought, with Money to take his part. But notwithstanding this policy he had practised, yet he was afraid of the Name onely, and greatnesse of Pelopidas Reputation: wherefore he went unto Pelopidas, as to a better man then himselfe, and making marvellous much of him, and intreating of him, he made promise, and bound it by Oath, that he would keepe the Realme for the Brethren of the dead King, and that he would take all those for his friends or Enemies, whom the THEBANS did either love or hate. As for assurance of his promise, he gave him his Sonne Philoxenus in hostage, and fifty other of his friends, all the which Pelopidas sent unto THEBES. But in the meane time, being marvellously offended with the Treason of the Souldiers against him, understanding the most part of their Goods, their Wives and Children, were in the City of PHARSALA, he thought if he could winne that, it were a marvellous good way for him to be revenged of the treachery of the Souldiers against him: whereupon he leaved certaine THESSALIANS, and went to chery of the Souldiers come thither, but Alexander the Tyrant arrived also with his Army. Pelopidas supposing he had come to justifie himselfe, clearing the complaints of the THESSALIANS made against him: went to him, though he knew him to be a very wicked man, and one that delighted in murder and shedding of blood. Nevertheless, he hoped he durst not have attempted any thing against him, for the Authority and Seigniorie sake of THEBES, by whom he was sent thither, as also for his owne Reputation. But the Tyrant seeing him slenderly accompanied, and without Traine of Souldiers, tooke him Prisoner, and wanne the City of PHARSALA at that present time. But this act of his put his Subjects in a great feare, who seeing him commit so shamefull a deed against all equity, did thinke straight he meant to spare no man, but would use men, and all things else that came in his hands, like a desperate man, and one that reckoned himselfe cast away. But when the THEBANS understood this newes, they were marvellous fory, and straight sent an Army thither, appointing other Captaines then Epaminondas: because then they had some misliking of him. Alexander the Tyrant having brought Pelopidas in the meane time to PHERES, did suffer any man that would at the first to come to see him, and speake with him: supposing his imprisonment had killed his heart, and had made him very humble. But when he was told the contrary, how Pelopidas did comfort the Citizens of PHERES, and willed them to be of good cheare, telling them the houre was now come, that the Tyrant should smart for all the mischiefes he had done: and that he sent him word to his face, he had no reason to hang and put his poore Citizens daily to death as he did, with sundry kindes of cruell torments, who had in nothing offended him; and did let him alone, knowing that if ever he got out of his hands, he would be revenged of him. The Tyrant wondering at this great stomach of Pelopidas being told what he said, answered him againe: Mary, said he, because thou shouldst die the sooner, being more odious to the gods and men, then yet thou art. After this answer, the Tyrant would never suffer any man to come and speake with him againe. But Thebe, that was the Daughter of the Tyrant Jason deceased, and Wife at that time of Alexander the Tyrant, hearing report of Pelopidas noble minde and courage by his Keepers: she had a marvellous desire to see him, and to speake with him. But when she came to see him, like a Woman she could not at the first disferne the greatnesse of his noble heart, and excellent hidden vertue, finding him in such misery: yet conjecturing by exterior shew, noting his simple Apparell, his haire and beard growne very long, and how poorely he was served, and worfe entertained: she thought with her selfe his case was to be pitied, and that he was in no fate meete for the glory of his Name; wherewith she fell a weeping for compassion. Pelopidas, that knew not what she was, began to muse at the first; but when it was told him she was Jason's Daughter, then he courteously saluted her for her Father Jason's sake, who while he lived was his very good friend. So Thebe said unto him: My Lord Pelopidas, I pity thy poore Lady and Wife. Truly so do I pity thee, quoth Pelopidas againe to her: that thou being no Prisoner, canst abide such a wicked Alexander. This answer tickled Thebe at the heart, who with great impatience did beare the cruelty, violence, and villany of the Tyrant her Husband: that besides all other infamous acts of his detestable life, committed Sodomy with her youngest Brother. So she oft visiting Pelopidas, and boldly making her moane to him, telling him closely all the injuries her Husband offered her: through Pelopidas talke with her, by little and little she grew to abhor him, and to conceive a hate in heart against him, desiring revenge on him. But now the Captaines of the THEBANS that were sent to deliver Pelopidas, being entred into THESSALY with their Army: whether it was through default of ignorance, or their mishap: they returned home with shame, and did nothing. Whereupon the THEBANS at their returne home condemned them every man in the summe of tenne thousand Drachmes, and sent Epaminondas thither againe with another Army: at whose coming, all the THESSALY rose incontinently for the reputation of so great a Captaine. And his fortune was so good, that he had in a manner utterly overthrowne the whole State of the Tyrant: his friends and Captaines were so much afraid, and his Subjects on the other side so well disposed to rebell, and marvellous glad for the hope they had, quickly to see the Tyrant have his deserved hire, for all his former wicked deeds he had committed. Notwithstanding, Epaminondas preferring the delivery and safety of Pelopidas, before the consideration of his owne Honour and Glory, and fearing lest Alexander seeing himselfe in danger to be turned out of all he had, falling into despair like a bedlem Beast, would bende all his desperation and fury against Pelopidas: he drew these Warres out in length, compassing him round about, but not fiercely setting upon him, with colour to prepare his way the better by delaying still, thereby to soften the cruell minde of this Tyrant, going on in this gentle sort; and partly to cut his combe and extreme pride, but specially to preserve Pelopidas from the danger and cruelty of his beastly rage. For he knew right well he was a cruell man, and one that never regarded reason, nor justice in any fort, considering how he made some men to be buried alive, and others to be put in the skins of Beares and wilde Bores, and then to set Hounds upon them to teare them in pieces, or else himselfe for his pastime would kill them, with shooting or throwing of Darts at them. And in the Cities of MELIBEA and of SCOTUSA, both of them being in league and friendship with him, he spying time one day when the Citizens were assembled in Councell together, suddenly compassed them in with his Guard and Souldiers, and put them every one to the Sword, even the little Children. And he consecrated the Dart also wherewith he had slaine his owne Uncle Polyphron, and having put Garlands upon it, he did sacrifice to it, as to a god, and called it Tychon, as one would say, happy killer. And another time being in a Theater, where the Tragedie of Tronides in Euripides was played, he went out of the Theater, and sent word to the Players notwithstanding, that they should go on with their Play, as if he had beene still among them: saying that he came not away for any misliking he had of them or of the Play, but because he was ashamed his People should see him weepe, to see the miseries of Hecuba and Andromacha played; and that they never saw him pity the death of any one man, of so many of the Citizens as he had caused to be slaine. The guilty conscience therefore of this cruell and Heathen Tyrant, did make him tremble at the onely name and reputation of Epaminondas: and as the common Proverbe saith:

He let his wings downe fall, not much unlike the Cocke, Which doth refuse the pit prepar'd, and list not bide the stocke,

So he sent straight unto Epaminondas to excuse himselfe. But Epaminondas would in no wise suffer the THEBANS, through his meanes, to make League with such an Helhound: onely he yeilded to abstinence of Armes for thirty dayes, upon delivery of Pelopidas and Ismenias into his hands, whom he straight returned unto THEBES. Now the THEBANS being adverted that the LACEDÆMONIANS and the ATHENIANS did send Ambassadors to Artaxerxes the mighty King of PERSIA, to make League with him: they sent to him Pelopidas for them also, being wisely considered of them to send a man of such Fame and Reputation. For Pelopidas passing first through Countries subject to the King of PERSIA, his Fame was such where he came, that the Peoples talke was onely of him. For the report of the famous Battels he had wonne of the LACEDÆMONIANS, was not onely carried into the next Regions and Countreys of ASIA: but since the first news of the Journey of LEUCTRES was brought thither, Pelopidas having after that wonne Victory upon Victory, his estimation grew so great, as it was blowne abroad through the World, even to the highest and furthest parts of the East Countreys. And when he came to the King of PERSIAES Court, the Princes, great Lords, and Captaines of PERSIA that saw him, had him in great admiration, saying: Lo this is he that conquered the LACEDÆMONIANS, and tooke all their Seigniorie and Authority from them, both by Sea and by Land, and drave the SPARTANS beyond the River of EUROTAS, and from Mount TAUGETUM, who not long before made Warres with the great King of PERSIA, being led under their King Agessilans, even in the midst of ASIA, for the Realms of SUSE, and of ECBATANE. So King Artaxerxes selfe was very glad of his coming, and praised him above them all, and made his estimation greater then it was before, by his great and honourable entertaining of him, meaning thereby to returne the honour to himselfe againe: because men should thinke that the most famous men of the World came to honour him, and to see his Court, as esteeming both him and his greatnesse, the onely happinesse of the World. But when he had seene his face, and heard him speake, and perceived that his words were much greater then the ATHENIANS, and plainer then the LACEDÆMONIANS: he then was further in love with him then before, and without disguising, he did honour and favour him above all the other Ambassadors, who found that he made more estimation of him, then of them all. Notwithstanding, he seemed to beare greater good will unto Antalcidas LACEDÆMONIAN, then to any other of the GRECIANS: for that one day being at the Table, he tooke a Garland of Flowers from his owne head, and washed it in perfuming water, and sent it unto him. Indeed he did not use Pelopidas with that open familiarity, yet did he send him the goodliest and richest Presents he could devise, and granted him besides all his requests he made unto him: which were, that all the People of GREECE should be free: that the City and Countrey of MESSINA should be inhabited againe: and that the Citizens of THEBES by their Successors should be taken, as ancient friends and Allies of the Kings of PERSIA. So when he had received these Answers, he returned home againe, and would by no means accept any of the great Presents the King had offered him : which caused the other Ambassadors of the GREEKIAN to be so ill welcome home to their Cities. For among other, Timagoras was accused to the ATHENIANS, and condemned to die, and was executed : which it they did in respect of the great Presents he had taken of the King, truly they had reason, and it was worthily done of them. For he tooke not onely Gold and Silver enough, as much as they would give him : but received a very rich Bed also, and PERSIAN Chamberlaines to make and dresse it up, as if no GREEKIAN Servants of his could have served that turne. Moreover, he received fourscore milke Kine to the Paile, and Neateheards to keepe them, having neede of Cowes Milke belike, to heale a Discaie that fell upon him : and would needs be carried in a Litter upon mens armes from the Kings Court, unto the Mæm-diterræneum Sea, the King rewarded them for their paines that carried him, with foure Talents. Yet it seemed the Gifts he tooke did not offend the ATHENIANS so much, considering that Epicrates (a Drudge or Tankerd-bearer) did not onely confesse before the People, how he had taken Gifts of the King of PERSIA : but said furthermore, that he would have a Law made, that they might re- and meane Citizens, and send them Ambassadors unto the King of PERSIA, that they might re- turne home rich men with Gifts. The People laughed to heare him, but yet were they very angry the THEBANS had obtained all that they had demanded : and considering that Pelopidas continu- the THEBANS did more prevaile and take better effect, then all the Orations the other could make, and specially to a Prince that fought alwaies to entertaine those GREEKIAN, which were of greatest force and power in the Warres. This Ambassage did greatly increate every mans love and good will unto Pelopidas, because of the replenishing againe of MESSINA with Inhabitants, and infranchizing and setting at liberty of all the other GREEKIAN. But the Tyrant Alexander of PHERES, returning againe to his old accustomed cruelty, and having destroyed many Cities of THESSALY, and placed his Garrisons through all the Countrey of the PHTIOTES, ACHAI- ANS, and MAGNESIANS : the Cities being advertised of Pelopidas returne againe to THEBES, they sent Ambassadors immediately to THEBES, to pray them to send them an Army, and namely they sent Ambassadors to deliver them from the miserable bondage of the Tyrant. The THEBANS willingly granted them, and put all things in readinesse very suddenly. But Pelopidas be- ing ready to set forward in his journey, there fell a sudden Eclipse of the Sunne, so as at noone day it was very darke in THEBES. Pelopidas seeing every man afraid of this Eclipse above, he would not compell the People to depart with this feare, nor with so ill hope to hazard the losse of seven thou- sand THEBANS, being all billed to go this Journey : but notwithstanding, he put himselfe alone into the THESSALIANS hands, with three hundred Horsemen of strangers that were glad to serve with him, with whom he tooke his Journey against the Soothsayers mindes, and against the good will of all his Citizens, who thought this Eclipse did threaten the death of some great person like him- selfe. But Pelopidas though he needed no spur to be revenged upon the Tyrant Alexander, being by nature hot, and desirous of himselfe to revenge the spight and villany he had offered him : yet he had a further hope to finde the Tyrants house divided against himselfe, by the former talke he had with his Wife Thebe, in time of his imprisonment there. Nevertheless, the Fame and Reputation of the Journey undertaken, did wonderfully increate his noble courage, and the rather because he was de- siderous (all he could) the GREEKIAN should see, that at the very same time when the LACEDÆ- MONIANS did send Governours and Captaines to Dionysius the Tyrant of SICILE, to serve and aide him, and that the ATHENIANS as hirelings tooke pay of the Tyrant Alexander of PHERES, in whose honour they had set up a Statue of Braffe in their City, as unto their Saviour : the THEBANS onely at the selfe-same time tooke Armes against them, to deliver those whom the Tyrants oppressed, and fought to roote out all tyrannicall Government over the GREEKIAN. So when he came to the City of PHARSALE, and had gathered his Army together, he went presently to the Field to meete with the Tyrant. Alexander perceiving Pelopidas had very few THEBANS about him, and that he had twice so many THESSALIANS with him; then the other had : he went unto the Temple of THE TIS, to meete with Pelopidas. There one telling Pelopidas, that Alexander was coming against him with a great Power, Pelopidas answered him straight, All the better, we shall kill the more. Now in the midst of the Valley, there are certaine round Hills of a pretty height, which they commonly call the Dogs head : they both strived which of their Footmen should first get those Hills. Pelopidas having a great number of Horsemen, and good men at Armes in the Field, sent them before to give charge upon the Enemies, that pressed to winne the vantage of the place : and having overthrowne them, they followed the chafe all the Valley over. But in the meane time Alexander having his Footmen by, marched forwards and got the Hills, because the THESSALIANS that were further off, came too late : notwithstanding when they came to the Hills, they fought for- cibly to climbe them up, being very high and steepe : but Alexander coming downe the Hill, gave charge upon them to their disadvantage, and slew the first that gave the attempt to get up against the Hill : and the residue being fore hurt, retired againe without their purpose. Pelopidas seeing that, founded the Retreat for the Horsemen that followed the chafe, to repaire to the Standard, and com- manded them they should set upon the Footmen of the Enemies that were in Battell ray : and he him- selfe ranne to helpe those that fought to winne the Hills. So he tooke his Target on his arme, and passing through the Rereward, he got to the foremost Ranks : to whom, the sight of his person did so redouble their force and courage, that the Enemies themselves thought it had beene a fresh supply of new mens hearts, and other bodies then theirs with whom they had fought before, that came thus lustily lustily to set againe upon them. And yet they did abide two or three onsets. Howbeit in the end, perceiving those men did still more fiercely force to get up the Hill, and moreover, how their Horse- men were come in from the chafe : they gave way, and left them the place, retiring back by little and little. Then Pelopidas having wonne the Hills, stayed on the top of them, viewing the Army of his Enemies, which were not yet returned from their flying, but waved up and downe in great dis- order. And there he looked all about, to see if he could spie out Alexander : and at the length he found him out amongst others, in the right Wing of his Battell, setting his men againe in order, and encouraging of them. After he had set eye on him, it was no holding of him backe, his heart so rose against him upon sight of him, that giving place to wrath, he neither regarded his person, nor the intent of his Journey, but returning far before his men, he cryed with a loud voyce to the Tyrant, and challenged the Combate of him. The Tyrant would not abide him, nor come out to fight with him, but fled, and hid himselfe amongst his Souldiers. But for his Souldiers, the first that thought to set upon Pelopidas, was slaine by him, and many left dead in the Field. The residue standing stoutly to it, and close together, did passe his Curaces through with their long Pikes, and thrust him into the breast. The THESSALIANS seeing him thus sore handled and distressed, for pity sake came running from the top of those Hills, to the place where Pelopidas was, to helpe him. But even as they came, he fell downe dead before them. Then did they together with their Horsemen so fiercely set upon them, that they made the whole Battell of the Enemies to flie : and following them in chafe a great way from that place, they covered the Valley with dead bodies, for they slew above three thousand men. It is no marvell, if the THEBANS that were at Pelopidas death, tooke it very heavily, and lamented bitterly : calling him their Father, their Saviour and Master, as one that had taught them the worthiest things that might be learned of any. But the THESSALIANS, and other friends and Confederates also of the City of THEBES, besides their exceeding in setting out their common Proclamations and Edicts in praise of his memory, and doing him all the honour that could be due to the most rare and excellent person that ever was : they did yet more shew their love and affection towards him, by their passing great sorrow and mourning they made for him. For it is said, that they that were at the Battell, did not put off their Armour, nor unbridle their Horses, nor would dresse their wounds, hearing tell of his death, before they went first and saw his body, not yet cold with fighting, laying great heapes of the Enemies Spoiles about it, as if he could have told what they had done ; nor before they had clipped off their owne haire, and the haire of their Horses, in token of sorrow. And many of them also, when they were come into their Tents and Pavillions, would neither have fire, eate, nor drinke : and all in the Campe were full of sorrow and mourning, as if they had not wonne a notable Victory, but had beene overthrowne and made subject by the Tyrant. Afterwards when the newes of his death was spread through all the Countrey, the Magi- strates of every City through which Pelopidas body was conveyed, went to receive it very honoura- bly, accompanied with all the young men, the Priests and children carrying Tokens and Crownes of Triumph, and other Ornaments of Gold ; and when his Funerall day was come, and that his body should be carried to be buried, the oldest and the noblest persons of the THESSALIANS went unto the THEBANS, and prayed them that they might have the burying of him : and one among them being the mouth of the rest spake in this manner to the THEBANS. " My Lords of THEBES, " our good beloved Friends and Confederates, we onely crave this good turne at your hands, where- " in you shall much honour us, and in our great calamity somewhat also comfort us. For we shall " never more accompany Pelopidas alive, nor requite his honourable deserts to us, that he shall ever " know them. But if it please you to let us handle his body with our hands, and that we may bury " him, and set forth his Obsequies, we will imagine then at the least, that you do thinke that which " we our selves do certainly believe : That we THESSALIANS, not you THEBANS, have re- " ceived the greater losse of both. For you have lost indeed a worthy Captaine, and we have not " only received the like losse with you, but the hope also of recovering of our Liberty. For how dare " we againe send to you for another Captaine, when we cannot redeliver you Pelopidas ? The THE- " BANS hearing their Petition, granted their desire : and in mine opinion, no Funerals could be done with greater Pompe and Honour, then the THESSALIANS performed his, being men that reckon not Dignity, Magnificence, and Pompe, to consist in Ornaments of Ivory, nor of Purple : as Phi- listus doth set it out, who praisth to the Moone the burying of Dionysius the Tyrant of SYRACUSA, which was the end of his Tyranny, as a sumptuous conclusion of a stately Tragedy. And Alexander himselfe did mourne for his death, shewing that deformity in stead of their former beauty. But all such things are done onely by force and compulsion, upon the Lords commandments, which do but raise up envie against their memory for whom they are done, and hatred of them that are against their wills constrained to do the thing they disliked : and are no just proofes of honour nor good will, but rather vaine shews of barbarous pompe and pride in him, that disposeth his Authority and plenty of Goods, in trifling toys not to be desired. Where contrariwise it plainly appeareth, that a private man dying in a foraigne Countrey, by reason should be accounted most happy of all other creatures, that having neither his Wife, Kinne, nor his Children by him, he should be conveyed to his Funerals, pinest- accompanied with such multitudes of crowned People and number of Cities, envying one another, who should most honour the Funerals, as being unrequited, and fast of all compelled. For saith Esope, The death of a happy man is not grievous, but most blessed, seeing it bringeth all good mens doings doings to happineffe, and leaveth Fortune to her fickle change, and sporting pleasure. But in my judgement a LACEDÆMONIAN spake better, when he said to Diagorus an old man, that had himfelfe in old time gotten victory in the Games Olympicall, and had seene besides his owne Children, and his Childrens Children (both Sonnes and Daughters) crowned with Victories also in the selfesame Games: O Diagorus, die presently, else thou shalt never come to Heaven. But these Victories of the Olympicall and Pythian Games, whosoever should put them all together, are not to be compared with one of the Battels onely, that Pelopidas had fought and wonne: having spent the most part of his time in great Calling and Dignity, and lastly ended the same, being Governour of BOE-OTIA the third time (which was the highest Office of State in all his Countrey) when he had destroyed the Tyrants that kept the THEBANES in bondage, and was also flaine himfelfe, valiantly fighting for the recovery of the THESSALIANS Liberty. But as Pelopidas death was grievous to the THEBANES Friends and Confederates: so fell it out very profitable for them. For the THE-BANES hearing of Pelopidas death, did not delay revenge, but sent an Army forthwith of seven thousand Footmen, and seven hundred Horsemen, under the conduct of Malcitas and of Diagiton.

They finding Alexanders Army overthrowne, and that he had lost the most part of his strength, did compell him to give up the THESSALIANS Townes he kept by force against them, and to set the MAGNETIANS, the PHTIOTES, and the ACHATANS at liberty, withdrawing his Garisons he had placed in their strong Holds: and therewithall to sweare, that from thenceforth he would march under the THEBANES, against any Enemy they should leade him, or command him to go against. So the THEBANES were pacified upon these Conditions. Now will I tell you how the gods plagued him soone after for Pelopidas death, who (as we have told you before) had prettily instructed Thebe his Wife, that she should not feare the outward appearance nor power of his Tyranny, although she were environed with Souldiers of banished men, whom the Tyrant entertained to guard his person. Her selfe on the other side, fearing his fallhood, as also hating his cruelty, conspired her Husbonds death with her three Brethren, Tiphonius, Pytholamus, and Lycophron, and executed her Conspiracy after this sort. The Tyrants Palace where he lay, was straightly guarded every where with Souldiers, who nightly watched his person: but their Bed-chamber which they commonly used to lye in, was in the top of all his Palace, where they kept a Dogge tied at the Chamber doore, to give warning, which was a terrible Dogge, and knew none but the Tyrant and his Wife, and his Keeper that gave him meate. Now when Thebe purposed to worke her feate, she locked up her three Brethren a whole day neare unto their Bed-chamber. So when night was come, and being bed time, she went her selfe alone according to her manner, into Alexanders Chamber: and finding him asleep, she stole out straight againe, and bade the Keeper of the Dogge to carry the Dogge away, for her Husband was disposed to take rest, and would have no noise. There was no way to get up to this Chamber but by a Ladder, which she let downe: and fearing lest her Brethren should make a noise, she had covered the Ladder-staves with wooll before she let it fall downe. When she had gotten them up with their Swords, and had set them before the doore, she went first her selfe into the Chamber, and tooke away the Tyrants Sword that hung at his Beds head, and shewed it them as a token given them that he was asleepe. When it came to the pinch to do the deede, these young men were afraid, and their hearts began to faile them. But she tooke on with them, and called them cowardly Boyes, that would not stand to it when it came to the point; and withall sware in her rage, that she would go wake the Tyrant, and open all the Treason to him. So partly for shame, and partly for feare, she compelled them to come in, and to step to the Bed, her selfe holding a Lampe to light them. Then one of them tooke him by the feete, and bound them hard: another caught him by the haire of his head, and pulled him backward: and the third thrust him through with his Sword. So by chance he died sooner then he should have done, and otherwise then his wicked life deserved, for the manner of his death. So Alexander was the first Tyrant that was ever flaine by the Treason of his Wife, whose body was most villanously and despitfully used after his death. For when the Townesmen of PHERES had drawne him through the City in the mire and dirt, they cast him out at the length to the Dogges to devoure.

MARCELLUS.

Ann. Mund.
3736.

Ant. Christ.
212.

Marcus Claudius that was five times Consul at ROME, was the Sonne Marcellus Kin-(as they say) of another Marcus: and as Polidonius writeth, he was red.
the first of his House surnamed Marcellus, as who would say, a martiall and warlike man by nature. For he was cunning at Weapons, skilfull in Warres, strong and luffy of body, hardy, and naturally given to fight.
Yet was he no quarreller, nor shewed his great courage, but in Warres against the Enemy: otherwise he was very gentle, and faire conditioned.
He loved Learning, and delighted in the Greeke Tongue, and much esteemed them that could speake it. For he himfelfe was so troubled in matters of State, that he could not study and follow it, as he desired to have done. For if God (as Homer saith) did ever make men

To use their youth in Warres, and Battels fierce and fell, Till crooked age came creeping on, such feates for to expell.

They were the noblest and chiefeest men of ROME at that time. For in their youth, they fought with the CARTHAGINIANS in SICILE: in their middle age, against the GAULES, to keepe them from the winning of all ITALY: and againe in their old age, against Hannibal and the CARTH-AGINIANS. For their age was no priviledge for them to be dispensed with, in the service of their Warres, as it was else for common Citizens: but they were both for their Nobility, as also for their valiantnesse and experience in Warres, driven to take charge of the Armies delivered them by the Senate and People. Now for Marcellus, there was no Battell could make him give ground being practised in all Fights: but yet he was more valiant in private Combate man for man, then in any other Fight. Therefore he never refused Enemy that did challenge him, but slew all those in the Field that called him to combate. In SICILE he saved his Brother Octavius life, being overthrowne in a Skirmish: for with his Shield he covered his Brothers body, and slew them that came to kill him. These valiant parts of him, being but a young man, were rewarded by the Generals under whom he served, with many Crownes, and warlike honours, usually bestowed upon valiant Souldiers. Marcellus increasing still his valiantnesse and good service, was by the People chosen Aedylis, as of the number of those that were the worthiest men, and most honourable: and the Priests did create him Augure, which is a kinde of Priesthood at ROME, having Authority by Law, to consider and observe the flying of Birds, to divine and prognosticate things thereupon. But in the yeare of his Office of Aedile, he was forced against his will to accuse Capitolinus, his Brother in Office with him. For he being a rash and dissolute man of life, fell in dishonest love with his Collegues Sonne Marcellus, that bare his owne name: who being a goodly young Gentleman, and newly come to mans state, was as well thought of, and taken of every man for his manhood and good qualities, as any way for his beauty

beauty and personage. The first time Capitolinus moved this dishonesty to him, he did of himselfe repulse his shamelesse offer, without any other privacy: but when he saw he came againe to tempt him the second time, he straight revealed it to his Father. Marcellus his Father being marvellously offended withall (as he had good cause) went and accused Capitolinus before the Senate. Capitolinus at the first, laid in many exceptions and feigned excuses, to keepe him from appearing, and in the end he appealed to the Tribunes of the People: but they declared plainly they would not receive his Appeal, nor take any knowledge of the matter. At the length he was forced to answer the matter before the Senate, and denied flatly that he attempted ever any such thing, because there were no Witnesses to prove it against him. Whereupon the Senate thought good to send for young Marcellus, who coming before them, both blushed and wept together. The Senate seeing shamefastnesse in him, mingled with teares, and a malice that could not be pacified: without seeking other proofe, they tooke it a cleare case, and so condemned Capitolinus presently in a great summe of Money, which Marcellus converted into Silver Vessels, to serve at Sacrifices, and so did consecrate them to the service of the gods. Now when the ROMANES had ended their first Warre against the CARTHAGINIANS, which held them fully the space of two and twenty yeares: immediately after that, they began a new Warre against the GAULES. For the INSUBRIANS, being a People derived from the GAULES, and dwelling at the foote of the Mountaines of the ALPES on ITALY side, being able to make a good Power of themselves, did notwithstanding pray aide of the other GAULES inhabiting on the other side of the Mountaines: and they called the GESSATES, mercenary People and hirelings to them that would give Pay, to bring great numbers with them. Truly methinks it was a marvellous matter, and wonderfull good hap for the ROMANES, that this War of the GAULES came not upon them, while they were at wars with the CARTHAGINIANS: and that the GAULES also had lien quiet all that while (as if they had purposely tworne to set upon the Conquerors) expecting still an end betwene them, and then to set upon the Conquerors, when they had nothing to say to any other. Yet the situation of their Countrey did trouble the ROMANES much, because they were so neare Neighbours unto them, and had Wars as it were at their owne doores. And so did the ancient reputation of the GAULES somewhat appaule the ROMANES, whom, as it should seeme, they did feare more then any other Nation whatsoever: because ROME had beene taken before by the GAULES. Since which time a Law was made, that Priests and Ecclesiasticall persons should be dispenced with from going to the Wars, unlesse the GAULES did rise against them. The preparation they made for this Warre at that time, did plainly shew the feare they had then of the GAULES. For it is thought, that never before nor since, there were so many naturall ROMANES assembled together in Field, as were then at that present. Moreover, the new-come cruelty they used in their Sacrifices, doth record this to be true. For before they never used any strange manner in their Sacrifice, or barbarous fashion, but were favourable in their opinions about the Ceremonies of Religion, and agreeable to the GRECIANS touching the service of the gods. But then they were compelled to obey certaine Oracles and ancient Prophecies they found written in Sibyls Bookes: and they buried two GRECIANS alive in the Oxe-Market, a Man and a Woman, and likewise two GAULES, a Man and a Woman. Unto them they do yet continue certaine secret Anniversaries in November, that are not to be seene of every body. The ROMANES in their first Battels of this Warre, were often overcome, and did overcome: but these Battels, were to little purpose for ending of the Wars. In the yeare that C. Quintus Flaminius, and P. Furius Philo were Consuls, and sent with great Armies to make Warre upon the INSUBRIANS, People subject to the State of MILLANE, newes were brought to ROME, there was a River seene in the Countrey of ROMANIA, red as bloud, and three Moones also at the very same time in the City of RIMINI. Furthermore, the Priests and Sooth-sayers that had observed and considered the tokens and significations of Birds on that day, when these two were chosen Consuls: they told plainly there was error in their election, and that they were directly chosen against all signes and tokens of the Birds. Thereupon the Senate wrote immediately to the Campe to them, and willed them to come home to depose themselves of their Consulship, before they did attempt any thing as Consuls against the Enemies. The Consull Flaminius received the Letters in time: but because he was ready to give Battell, he would not open them, before he had first overthrowne his Enemies, and spoiled their Countrey, as indeed he did. But when he was come backe to ROME againe, and had brought marvellous great Spoiles with him, the People for all that would not go out to meet him, because he did not presently obey the Letters they wrote unto him, nor returned upon it as they commanded him, but contemptuously, without any regard of their pleasure, followed his owne fantasie: whereupon they had almost flatly denied him the honour of Triumph. For his Triumph was no sooner ended, but they compelled him to give over his Consulship, and made him a private man with his companion. The ROMANES therein were so religiously bent, as they would all things should be referred unto the gods good grace and pleasure, and would suffer none to contemne the observations and prognosticating of the Sooth-sayers, nor their ancient uses and customes, for any prosperity and felicity that could happen. For they thought it more necessary and profitable, for benefit of the Common-weale, that the Senate and Magistrates should reverence the Ceremonies and Service of the gods, then that they should overcome their Enemies in Battell. As for example, Tiberius Sympronius, a man as much honoured and esteemed of the ROMANES for his justice and valiantnesse, as any other of his time, being one yeare Consull, did nominate and elect two other for Consuls the yeare following, Scipio Nasica, and Caius Marcius. These two being entred into their Consulship, and sent from ROME also to their severall Provinces appointed them by lot: Sempronius by

by chance took certain little Bookes in his hand, where were briefly written the rules appertaining to the Ceremonies of publike sacrifice: and reading in them, he found a certaine ordinance he never heard before. And this it was: That if a Magistrate were set in any Tent or hired House without the City, to behold and observe the Prognostications of Birds, and that upon any sodain occasion he were driven to come againe into the City, before the Birds had given any certaine signes: the second time when he returned againe to end his observations, there was no remedy, but he must leave his Tent or first hired House, and take another, and begin new observations againe. Tiberius utterly ignorant of this ordinance before, had kept his observations twice in one self House, and had chosen there Nasica and Martius, Consuls to succeed him. But when he knew he had offended, he told the Senate of it: who would not let slip so little a fault, but wrote to the new Consuls, and they straight left their Provinces, and returned againe to ROME, willingly resigning up their Offices. That was a pretty while after. Again also, about the very present time we write of now, there were two Priests of Noble Houses (and Noble persons also) the one called Cornelius, and the other Cetheus, both which were degraded of their Priesthood, because they had not given the intrails of the sacrificed Beast in order as they should have done. Quintus Sulpitius in like manner, was degraded of his Bishoprick, because his Miter which the FLAMINIUS do weare, fell off his Head in his sacrificing. Minnius being Dictator also, and having chosen Caius Flaminius Generall of the Horsemen: because they heard the noise of a Rat at the Election of Flaminius, they were both put out of their authority and other chosen in their place. Now, though they were thus precise even in trifles, it was not by reason of any superstition mingled with their Religion: but because they would not break any jot of the Ancient Institutions and Ceremonies of their Countrey. But to our story againe. Flaminius being deprived of his Consulship, Marcellus was created Consull in his place, by the regents at that time called Interreges, Marcellus being instituted in his Office, chose Cneus Cornelius for his companion: and they say, that the GAULES being inclined to peace, and the Senate of ROME, also willing to harken to peace, Marcellus did stir up the People, and made them desire war. Notwithstanding, they concluded peace at that time: but the GAULES GESSATES immediately after renewed the Wars againe. For there came over the mountaines of the ALPES, thirty thousand of them, and they joyned with the INSUBRIANS, which were many more in number then themselves. Now, they being in a marvellous jollity, went incontinently to lay siege to the City of ACERRES, that standeth upon the River of Po: and during the siege, King Britomarus taking Ten thousand GESSATES with him, went and destroyed all the Countrey above the Po. Marcellus hearing that, left with his companion Cneus Cornelius, all the Armed Footmen, and the third part of the Horsemen, in his Camp by ACERRES: and he himselfe with the residue of the Horsemen, and six hundred Footmen light Armed, marched towards the Enemy, travelling night and day, until he met with Ten thousand GESSATES, neare unto a village of GAULE on this side the mountaines, called CLASTIDIUM, which was subject not long before to the ROMANES. So he had no leasure to take rest, nor to refresh his men a little: for the Barbarous People knew straight he was come, and took him for no better then by and by overcome, because he had so few Footmen. And for his Horsemen the GAULES made no reckoning of them: for besides themselves are very good men at Armes, and excell all other in that fight, yet were their number of Horsemen far above Marcellus. Therefore they straight marched towards him in a marvellous fury, and with thundring shouts, as if they would have devoured them at their coming, Britomarus their King advanced himselfe before all his company. Marcellus fearing to be compassed in behinde, being so small a number: he put out the wings of his Horsemen as much as he could, to have the Countrey at large, so that his two wings were very slender, until he came neere his Enemies. And being ready to gallop towards the Enemy, it fortuneed his Horse being afraid with the noise of his Enemies, turned about, and carried Marcellus back againe in spite of his teeth. But he fearing the ROMANES superstition, in taking this for an evil, token, and that they would take a conceit upon the same: blucking the bridle with his left hand, turned his Horse head again upon the Enemy, and then he worshipped the Sun, as though he had not turned his Horse by chance, but purposely for that cause. For it is the ROMANES manner to turne about so, when they do honour their gods. So when they began to joynne Battell he made a vow to Jupiter Feretrian, to offer him up the goodliest spoiles of the Enemies, if he did overcome. The King of the GAULES seeing him at that instant, imagined by the marks and tokens he saw, that he should be the Generall of his Enemies: So he set spurs to his Horse, and galloped towards him from all his company, giving him defiance, and challenged him, shaking his staffe in his hand. He was the goodliest person and strongest man of all the GAULES, and his Armour was all gilt and silvered, and so set forth with sundry workes and Colours, that it shined as the Sun. Marcellus on the other side having viewed all the Army of his Enemies throughout, and perceiving none so richly Armed as the King, thought straight it was against him, that he had made his Prayer and vow to Jupiter. Then he put his Horse in full carriere against him, and came with such a force and fury to him, that he pierced his Armour with his staffe, and overthrowne him, but yet he killed him not dead: whereupon he so dauidely redoubled two or three strokes besides upon him, and so slew him right out. Then he lighted from his Horse, and taking the dead Kings Armour in his hand, he lift up his eyes to heaven, and said: O Jupiter Feretrian, thou that dost from heaven behold and direct all martiall feates and Captaines deeds: thy self I call to witnesse, that I am the third ROMANE Captaine, that being Generall of the Army, have slaine with my own hands, The King and Generall of the Enemies: and I promise here to thee, to offer thee up the richest spoiles of mine Enemies, so thy gohhead will vouchsafe to grant us the like good fortune in all this Warre besides. His prayer ended, the men of Armes of the ROMANES ranne in among the Horsemen and Footemen of the GAULES, one being unperturbed from another: and Fortune did so favour them, that they won a passing Victory, in such a strange and wonderfull manner, as was incredible. For it was never seene before nor since, that so few Horsemen did overthrow so great a number of men of Armes and Footmen ranged together. Now when Marcellus had slaine the greater number of them, and had gotten their spoiles and all their baggage, he returned againe to his Companion Cnem Cornelius, whom he found making Warres unfortunately with the GAULES, before the greatest and most populous City they had, called MILLAINE, which the GAULES on this side the Mountaines take for their chiefe City, and from whence all other had their first originall. Whereupon they did all their possible endeavour to defend it, and did as straightly besiege the Confull Cornelius, as he did them. Now when Marcellus was come to the Campe againe, the GESSATES understanding that their King Britomarus was slaine in battell, returned back againe into their country, and the City of MILLAINE was taken. After that all the other Cities thereabouts yielded of themselves, without force of siege, and the GAULES wholly submitted themselves and all that they had to the mercy of the ROMANES, who granted them Peace upon easie conditions. For these famous Victories, the Senate of ROME gave all the honour of Triumph unto Marcellus onely, and that was as wonderfull and worthy a sight, as any that ever past before him: what for the infinite spoiles, and the number of great men taken Prisoners, as also for the exceeding sumptuousnesse and stately shew thereof. But the goodliest sight of all for the rarenesse, was to behold Marcellus selfe, carrying on his shoulders the whole spoile of the barbarous King, to offer up to Iupiter Feretrius. For he had cut downe a goodly young Oke of the Mountaine, straight, and shot up very long, which he had trimmed up in forme of Triumph, hanging all the armed pieces he had wonne of the King, very orderly round about it. Then when all the shew of his Triumph was past, he himselfe tooke the Oke upon his shoulders, and got up upon his Triumphant Chariot, and so marched thorow the City, carrying these signes thereupon: which was the noblest sight, and honourablest shew of the whole Triumph. His Army followed after the Chariot, singing Verses and Songs of Victory, in praise of the gods and their Captaine: and when he had passed through the whole City, and was come to the Temple of Iupiter called Feretrius, there he set up this young Oke and token of Triumph. This Marcellus is the third and last ROMANE Captaine, to whom happened this honour in our age. For the first man that ever offered up to Iupiter the spoiles of the Generall of their Enemies, was King Romulus, who won the like spoiles of Acran King of the CENINIANS. The second was Cornelius Cossus, who slew Tolumnius Generall of the TUSCANS. And the third was Marcellus, who slew with his owne hands Britomarus King of the GAULES: and after him, no man ever since could obtaine the like good fortune. The god to whom these manner of spoiles are consecrated thus, is called Iupiter Feretrius, so termed as some write, because they do carry this token of Triumph to him, following the derivation of this Greek word, Ferin, which signifieth to carry: for in those former times, many Greeke words were mingled with the Latine. Other affirme it is one of the surnames of Iupiter, signifying as much as lightning: for Ferire in the Latine tongue signifieth to strike. And some say also, in Wars it is properly to hurt or kill with his owne hands: for the ROMANES do use at this day when they give a charge upon their Enemies in battell, or that they have them in chase flying, to cry, encouraging one another, Feri, Feri, which is as much as, kill, kill. And the spoiles taken from the Enemies also, are generally called Spolia: but those which Lieutenants generally, or Generals, do take from the Generals of their Enemies, when they have slaine them, they are called particularly, Spolia opima. Yet some hold opinion that King Numa Pompilius mentioning the rich spoiles, or Spolia Opima, in his Commentaries, speaketh of the first, the second, and the third: and commandeth that the first spoiles which are wonne, should be consecrated to Iupiter Feretrius: the second unto Mars: and the third unto Quirinus. And that they should give to him that had wonne the first spoiles, three hundred * Asles, the second, two hundred: and the third a hundred. But notwithstanding, the best opinion, and usuall taking of Spolia Opima, referreth them to be the first spoiles wonne in a foughten field, and those which the Lieutenant of an Army, or a Generall doth take from the Generall of the Enemies, after he hath slain him with his owne hands. And thus much for the declaration of this matter. Furthermore, the ROMANES were so joyfull of this Victory, and of their good successe in this warre, that they caused a massie cup of Gold to be made of the spoil they had gotten, weighing a hundred Pound weight, which they sent to offer up in the Temple of Apollo Pythias, in the City of DELPHES in token of thanks: and they made liberall division besides of the spoiles unto their friends and confederates, and sent a great part of it unto Hieron King of SYRACUSA, who was their confederate. Not long after Hannibal being entred ITALY. Marcellus was sent with an Army by sea, into SICILE. And after the great overthrow was given at the battell of CANNES, wherein there died so many thousand ROMANES, and that very few of them saved themselves by flying into the City of CANNUSIUM: they looked that Hannibal having overcome the flower of all the ROMANES youth, and their greatest force, would not fail to come straight to ROME. Wherefore Marcellus first sent fifteene hundred of his men by sea, to helpe to defend ROME: and having afterwards received commandement from the Senate, he came to CANNUSIUM, where he took such as were fled thither for succour after the battell, and so brought them out of the field, to defend the Country. Now the ROMANES having lost the most part of all their best Captaines, in divers sundry Battels before: of all those that remained, Fabius Maximus was the only able and reputed man for commendation of his honesty and wisdom, yet they misliked of him notwithstanding, for a timorous man, and of no courage, as a man too full of doubts and considerations; and loth to put any thing in hazard: saying, he was a good Captaine to defend, but not to offend the Enemy. Whereupon they thought good to joyne Marcellus lively youth and courage, with Fabius feminine feare and wisdom: and therefore some years they chose them both Consuls together, or else they sent one of them as Confull, and the other as Proconfull, each in his turre, to the Countrey where they had Warres. And for prooffe hereof Posidonius writeth, that the ROMANES at that time called Fabius Maximus their Target, and Marcellus their Sword. Therefore Hannibal himselfe said, he feared Fabius Maximus as his Governour, and Marcellus as his Enemy: because the one kept him from hurting of others, and the other did hurt to himselfe. Immediately after this great Victory at CANNES, Hannibals Souldiers became so bold, so carelesse and disordered, that they kept the Field without feare of any thing, and dispersed themselves far from their Camp: wherefore Marcellus setting upon those straglers, he slew them every man, and so by little and little did still lessen the power and strength of his Enemy. Afterwards he aided the Cities of BIZANTIUM and of NOLA, and stablished the true devotion and love of the BYZANTINES towards the ROMANES: from thence he went to NOLA, and found great sedition there betwixt the Senate and the People, because the Senate could not keepe the People in obedience, but they would needs take Hannibals part. The Cause of the Peoples stubbornnesse grew, by occasion of a Gentleman of the City called Bandius, a noble Gentleman to the People, and a valiant man of his hands. This Bandius having fought valiantly at the Battell of CANNES, after he had slaine many a CARTHAGINIAN, was himselfe in the end stricken downe, and found lying among the dead bodies, fore wounded and mangled: whereupon Hannibal greatly commending his valiantnesse, did not only let him goe without Ransome, but also gave him rich Gifts, and made him his Host and Friend. Hereupon Bandius at his coming home, to requite Hannibals honour and courtesie, became one of those that most favoured Hannibal, and most perswaded the people of NOLA to take his part. Notwithstanding this, Marcellus thinking it too great a sinne against the gods, to put a man to death that had made so great prooffe of his valiantnesse, and had served with the ROMANES in their greatest Warres and extremest danger, and who besides the goodnesse of his nature, had a marvellous gift also to winne mens good wils by his great courtesie: when this Bandius came one day to doe his duty to him, Marcellus of purpose asked him what he was, though he had knowne him long before, onely to take occasion to talke with him. The other answered him, his Name was Lucius Bandius. Then Marcellus seeming to be marvellous glad, and to wonder at him said: And art thou that Bandius they speake so much of at ROME, whom they say did so notable service in person at the Battell of CANNES, and never forsooke Paulus Emylius the Confull, but received so many wounds upon his body in defence of him? Bandius answered, that he was the man, and therewith shewed him many wounds he had upon his body. Marcellus then replied: Alas, thou that carrest such notable marks of thy unfeigned love toward us, what didst thou meane, that thou camest not straight againe unto us? art thou perswaded we are so miserable and unthankfull, that we will not worthily reward the vertue and valiantnesse of our friends, whom our Enemies selves do honour? After Marcellus had used this courteous speech unto him, and had embraced him, he gave him a goodly Horse for service in the Warres, and five hundred Drachmes of silver besides. So after that time, Bandius did ever take Marcellus part, and alwayes followed him, being very faithfull to him, and shewed himselfe very severe and earnest to accuse them that tooke Hannibals part in the City: which were many in number, and had conspired among themselves, that the first time the ROMANES should goe into the Field to skirmish with the Enemies, they would shut the gates after them, and take the spoile of all their Carriages. Marcellus being informed of this Treason, did set his Men in battell ray within the City, hard by the gates, and behind them he placed all the Sumpters and Carriage in good order: besides that, he made proclamation by Trumpet, that no Citizen upon paine of death should approach the Walles. This occasion drew Hannibal to come hard to the City, seeing no watch upon the Walles, and made him the bolder to come in disorder, imagining there had been some Mutiny or sedition within, between the Noble men and the People. But in the meane time, Marcellus set open the gate being hard by, and sallying out upon the sodaine with the best men of Armes he had, he gave a charge upon Hannibal in the vaward. Immediately after came out his Footmen at another gate, running straight upon Hannibal, with a wonderfull cry and shour: so as Hannibal to withstand them, was driven to divide his men into two Companies. But as he was dividing of them, sodainly a third gate opened upon them, from whence all the residue of the ROMANES issued out, who set upon the CARTHAGINIANS on every side, they being marvellously amazed to be so sodainly set on, which they looked not for: so having their hands full with those that came first upon them, being scant able to defend themselves against them, and seeing this new and last charge also, they were forced to retire. This was the first time, that ever Hannibals Souldiers began to give place to the ROMANES, who drave them back unto their Campe, and slew a great number of them, and did hurt divers of them besides. For some write there were slaine of the CARTHAGINIANS at that conflict, above five thousand, and of the ROMANES there died not past five hundred men. But Titus Livius doth not set out the overthrow so great, and yet confesseth that Marcellus wan great honour by it, and that it made the ROMANES marvellous valiant againe, after so many and sundry Battels as they had lost one after another: for then then they were perswaded that they fought not with an Enemy altogether invincible, but that he might sometime also, as well as themselves, receive both losse and hurt. Therefore, one of the Consuls dying about that time, the people caused Marcellus to be sent for, and placed him in his roome: and in spite of the Senate they deferred all deputation untill his returne from the Campe. Marcellus came no sooner to Rome, but he was chosen Confull in the dead mans roome, by all the voices of the People. Notwithstanding, when they went to choose him, it thundered marvellously: which the Priests and Augures tooke for an ill token, but yet they durst not openly speake against his election, because they feared the People. Howbeit Marcellus of himselfe did willingly give up his Consulship, and yet was it no exception to him for his service in the Warres; for they created him Proconfull, and sent him againe to the Campe at NOIA, where he did severely punish such as tooke Hannibals part: who being advertised thereof, came thither with all possible speede to helpe them: and even at his first coming he offered Marcellus Battell, which he refused at that time. Nevertheless he tooke his time, when Hannibal had sent the best part of his Army to forage, as meaning to fight no more Battels: and then he set upon him, having given his Footmen long Pikes, such as they use in fight upon the Sea, and taught them also, how to hurt the Enemy a-farre off, keeping them still in their hands. But the CARTHAGINIANS having no skill of their Pikes, and fighting with short Javelins in their hands, did strike downe right blowes: which was the cause, that they being set upon by the ROMANES, were driven to turne their backs, and flie before them. So there were five thousand of the CARTHAGINIANS left dead in the field, foure Elephants slaine, and two taken alive: and furthermore, three dayes after the Battell, there came three hundred Horsemen, some of them SPANIARDS, and other NUMIDIANS, that submitted themselves to the ROMANES. Never came there such a misfortune before to Hannibal: who had of long time kept together in love and amity, an Army assembled of sundry barbarous Nations and people. Howbeit these three hundred continued ever after faithfull to the end, both to Marcellus, and to all other Lieutenants and Generals of the ROMANES. Shortly after, Marcellus being againe chosen Confull the third time, went into SICILE. For Hannibals prosperous successe and Victories, had so encouraged the CATHAGINIANS, as they fought againe to conquer this Island: and specially because that after the death of Hieronymus the Tyrant, there rose some tumult at SYRACUSA. Upon which occasion the ROMANES had sent an Army thither before, and a Prator called Appius: at whose hands Marcellus having received the Army, a great number of the ROMANES became humble suiters to him, to pray him to aide them in their calamity, which was this: Of those that escaped from the Battell of CANNES, some saved themselves by flying, other were taken Prisoners, of which there was such a number, as it appeared that Rome had not people enough left onely to keepe the wallies. Nevertheless those few that remained, their hearts were so great, that they would never redeeme the Prisoners, which Hannibal was contented to deliver them upon small ranfome, but made a Decree they should not be redeemed: and so suffered some of them to be killed, others to be sold for slaves out of ITALY. And moreover, those that saved themselves by flying, they sent straight into SICILE: commanding they should not set a foote againe in ITALY, whilest they had Wars with Hannibal. These were the men that came altogether, and fell downe at Marcellus feet, so soone as he arrived in SICILE, and humbly besought him, to appoint them to serve under some Ensigne, that they might fight to doe their Country honour and service: promising him with teares running downe their cheekes, that their faithfull service then should witness for them, that the overthrow they had at CANNES, fell upon them rather by misfortune, then through lack of courage. Whereupon Marcellus having compassion on them, wrote to the Senate in their favour, and prayed them that they would grant him licence to supply the bands of his Army, as they diminished, with those poore ROMANES his Countrymen. Many reasons passed too and fro, against this sute: nevertheless it was concluded in the end by the Senate, that the Common-wealth made no reckoning of the service of faint-hearted men like Women: wherefore if Marcellus thought good of their service, yet it should not be lawfull for him to give them any Crownes or rewards of Honour, for any notable service soever they did, as all Generals are wont to give to honest men that serve valiantly. This Order of the Senate milked Marcellus very much, who at his returne home out of SICILE, made his complaint in open Senate, and told them they did him manifest wrong, to deny him that favour, that having done the Common-wealth such faithfull service divers times, as he had done, he might not restore so many poore ROMANES to their Honour againe. Now when Marcellus was in SICILE, he received great hurts and injuries by Hippocrates Generall of the SYRACUSANS: who, to pleasure the CARTHAGINIANS, and by their meanes to make himselfe chiefe Lord of SYRACUSA, did put many ROMANE Citizens to death. Whereupon Marcellus went and laid siege to the City of the LEONTINES, and when he had taken it by assault, he hurt never a Townsman, nor naturall Citizen of the same: but such Traitors as he found there, who had fled from his Campe, and yielded to the Enemies, them he caused to be whipped, and then hanged. But notwithstanding, Hippocrates had caused it to be bruited at SYRACUSA, that Marcellus had put all the LEONTINES to the sword, not sparing little Children: and afterwards Hippocrates coming thither on the sodaine, in the feare and garboile of this false brute, he easily tooke the City. Marcellus hearing Hippocrates had taken SYRACUSA, left forthwith the LEONTINES, and went with his whole Army and camped hard by SYRACUSA: and sent his Ambassadors to tell the SYRACUSANS truly, what he had done in the City of the LEONTINES, and quite contrary to that they were were informed of. Howbeit that prevailed not, for they beleevd not Marcellus, because Hippocrates being the stronger, had won the City. Whereupon he began then to approach the Wallies, and to assault in every quarter, as well by Sea as by Land. Appius tooke charge of them that gave assault by Land. Marcellus himselfe with three score Gallies of five Oares at every banke, well armed, and full of all sorts of Artillery and Fire-works, did assault by Sea, and rowed hard to the Wall, having made a great Engine, and device of Battery, upon eight Gallies chained together, to batter the Wall: trusting in the great multitude of his Engines of Battery, and to all such necessary provision as he had for Warres, as also in his owne reputation. But Archimedes made light account of all his devices, as indeed they were nothing comparable to the Engines himselfe had invented: and yet were not his owne such, as himselfe did reckon of, to shew singularity of worke and device. For those he had made, were but his recreations of Geometry, and things done to passe the time with, at the request of King Hieron: who had prayed him to call to minde a little his Geometrical speculation, and to apply it to things corporall and sensible, and to make the reason of it demonstrative and plaine, to the understanding of the common people by experiment; and to the benefit and commodity of use. For this inventive art to frame Instruments and Engines, (which are called mechanicall, or organically, so highly commended and esteemed of all sorts of people) were first set forth by Architas and by Eudoxus, partly to beautifie a little the science of Geometry by this finesse; and partly to prove and confirme by material examples and sensible instruments, certaine Geometrical conclusions, whereof a man cannot finde out the conceivable demonstrations, by enforced reasons and proofes. As that conclusion which instructeth one to search out two lines meane proportionall, which cannot be proved by reason demonstrative: and yet notwithstanding is a principle and an accepted ground, for many things which are contained in the art of portraiture. Both of them have fashioned it to the workmanship of certaine Instruments, called Mesolabes or Mesographes; which serve to finde these meane lines proportionall, by drawing certaine curve lines, and overthrow and oblique sections. But after that, Plato was offended with them, and maintained against them, that they did utterly corrupt and disgrace the worthinesse and excellency of Geometry, making it to descend from things not comprehensible, and without body, unto things sensible and materiall, and to bring it to a palpable substance, where the vile and base handy-work of man is to be employed: since that time I say, handy craft, or the art of Engines, came to be separated from Geometry; and being long time disposed by the Philosophers, it came to be one of the warlike arts. But Archimedes having told King Hieron, his Kinsman and very Friend, that it was possible to remove as great a weight as he would, with as little strength as he listed to put to it: and boasting himselfe thus (as they report of him) and trusting to the force of his reasons, wherewith he proved this conclusion, that if there were another Globe of earth, he was able to remove this of ours, and passe it over to the other: King Hieron wondering to heare him, required him to put this device in execution, and to make him see by experience, some great and heavy weight removed by little force. So Archimedes caught hold with a Hooke of one of the greatest Carefts or Hulkes of the King, (that to draw it to the shore out of the water, required a marvellous number of people to goe about it, and was hardly to be done so) and put a great number of men more into her, then her ordinary burthen: and he himselfe sitting alone at his ease a-farre off, without any straining at all, drawing the end of an Engine with many wheelles and pulleys, faire and softly with his hand, made it come as gently and smoothly to him, as it had floated in the Sea. The King wondering to see that fight, and knowing by proofe the greatnesse of his art: he prayed him to make him some Engines, both to assault and defend in all manner of sieges and assaults. So Archimedes made him many Engines, but King Hieron never occupied any of them, because he reigned the most part of his time in peace, without any Warres. But this provision and munition of Engines, served the SYRACUSANS turne marvellously at that time: and not only the provision of the Engines ready made, but also the Engineer and Work-master himselfe that had invented them. Now the SYRACUSANS seeing themselves assaulted by the ROMANES both by Sea and by Land, were marvellously perplexed, and could not tell what to say, they were so afraid: imagining it was impossible for them to withstand so great an Army. But when Archimedes fell to handle his Engines, and to set them at Liberty, there flew in the aire infinite kinds of shot, and marvellous great stones, with an incredible noise and force on the sodaine, upon the Footmen that came to assault the City by Land, bearing downe and tearing in pieces all those which came against them, or in what place soever they lighted, no earthly body being able to resist the violence of so heavy a weight: so that all their ranks were marvellously disordered. And as for the Gallies that gave assault by Sea, some were sunke with long pieces of Timber like unto the Yards of Shippes, whereto they fasten their sayles, which were sodainly blowne over the Walls with force of these Engines into their Gallies, and so sunke them by their over great weight. Other being hoisted up by the Prooes with hands of Iron, and Hooks made like Cranes bils, plunged their Poopes into the Sea. Other being taken up with certaine Engines fastened within, one contrary to the other, made them turne in the aire like a Whirlegig, and so cast them upon the Rocks by the Town walls, and splitted them all to fitters, to the great spoile and murder of the Persons that were within them. And sometimes the Ships and Gallies were lift cleane out of the Water, that it was a fearefull thing to see them hang and turne in the aire as they did: untill that casting their Men within them over the Hatches, some here, some there, by this terrible turning, they came in the end to be empty, and to breake against the Wallies, or else to fall into the Sea againe, when their Engines left their hold.

hold. Now for Marcellus Engine, which he brought against the Walles, upon a Bridge made of Gallies joyned together: that was called Sambuca, by reason of the fashion it had like to an instrument of musick of the same name, which is a Harpe. The same being yet a good pretty way off from the Walles, there fell a great stone upon it sent from the Walles, weighing ten Talents: then a second after that, and a third one after that, the which falling all into this Engine with such a thunder and terrible tempest, brake the foundation of the Engine, and tore all the Bridge of the Gallies joyned together in pieces, that sustained it. So that Marcellus being amazed withall, not knowing well what it meant, was glad to retire quickly, and sent to make his Trumpet found the retreat to those that gave assault by Land. Hereupon they fate in counsell to determine what was to be done, and they resolved, that the next morning before day they should approach the Walles if it were possible: because that Archimedes Engines, which were very strong and hard wound up, should by this meanes fend all the force and fury of their stones and shot over their heads, and that neare hand also he could doe no good with them, for that they had not the scope of their levell and carriage they should have. But Archimedes had prevented this device by long preparation before, having made provision of Engines for farre and neare, the levell and carriage whereof was proportioned for all distances: their shot short, their Arrowes not very long, many holes and arches in the Walles one hard by another, where there were store of Crosbowes to kill neare at hand, set in such places, as the Enemies could not see them without. Wherefore, when the ROMANS thought to approach, thinking they had bene safe and clofe, and no man saw them: it amazed them all when they were received againe with infinite shot, and stricken to the ground with stones that fell upon their heads like lead: (for there was no part of all the Walles, from whence they had not the like shot.) Whereupon they were forced againe to retire from the Walles. And yet when they were further off from them, the Arrowes, stones, and other kinde of shot, that flew in every place among them, killed a great number of them, scattered farre from thence: so that many of them were slaine and sore wounded, and divers of their Shippes splitted, and they not once able to be revenged, nor to hurt their Enemies, because Archimedes had placed his Engines very closely behind the Walles, and not upon the Walles in sight of the Enemy. So that it appeared the gods fought against the ROMANS, they were so slaine and wounded, and yet they could not tell how, nor by whom. Notwithstanding, Marcellus escaped with life, safe from hurt, and mocking his Workmaisters and Engineeres he had in his Campe, he said unto them: What shall we not leave to make Warres with this Briarian Engineer and Geometrician here? who sitting still upon the Wharfe in sporting manner hath with shame overthrowne our Navy, and exceeded all the fabulous hundred hands of the Giants, discharging at one instant so many shot among us? For indeed, all the residue of the SYRACUSANS, were as the body and members of Archimedes preparation: and he himselfe was the only creature that moved and did all, all Weapons else being quiet, and his Engines onely occupied, to assault and defend. At the length Marcellus seeing his men thus afraid, as if they did but see the end of a Rope, or any piece of Timber upon the Wall, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes was letting loose some of his Engines upon them: he would no more approach the Walles, nor give assault, determining to see if he could win it by long siege. Notwithstanding, Archimedes had such a great minde, and was so profoundly learned, having hidden in him the onely treasure and secrets of Geometrical inventions, as he would never set forth any Booke how to make all these warlike Engines, which wan him at that time the fame and glory, not of mans knowledge, but rather of divine wisdom. But he esteeming all kinde of handicraft and invention to make Engines, and generally all manner of Sciences bringing common commodity by the use of them, to be but vile, beggery, and mercenary droffe: employed his wit and study only to write things, the beauty and subtilty whereof, were not mingled any thing at all with necessity. For all that he hath written, are Geometrical propositions, which are without comparison of any other writings whatsoever: because the subject whereof they treat, doth appear by demonstration, the matter giving them the grace and the greatnesse, and the demonstration proving it so exquisitely, with wonderfull reason and facility, as it is not repugnable. For in all Geometry are not to be found more profound and difficult matters written, in more plaine and simple termes, and by more easie principles, then those which he hath invented. Now some doe impute this, to the sharpnesse of his wit and understanding, which was a naturall gift in him: other doe referre it to the extreme paines he tooke, which made these things come so easily from him, that they seemed as if they had bene no trouble to him at all. For no man living of himselfe can devise the demonstration of his Propositions, what paines soever he take to seeke it: and yet straight so soone as he cometh to declare and open it, every man then imagineth with himselfe he could have found it out well enough, he can then so plainly make demonstration of the thing he meaneth to shew. And therefore that methinks is like enough to be true, which they write of him: that he was so ravished and drunke with the sweete enticements of this Syren, which as it were lay continually with him, as he forgot his meate and drinke, and was carelesse otherwise of himselfe, that oftentimes his servants got him against his will to the Baths, to wash and annoint him: and yet being there, he would ever be drawing out of the Geometrical figures, even in the very imbers of the chimney. And while they were annointing of him with Oyles and sweete savours, with his finger he did draw lines upon his naked body: so far was he taken from himselfe, and brought into an extasie or trance, with the delight he had in the study of Geometry, being ravished with the love of the Muses. But among many notable things he devised, it appeareth, that that they most esteemed the demonstration of the proportion between the Cylinder (to wit, the round column) and the sphere or globe contained in the same: for he prayed his Kinsmen and Friends, that after his death they would put a Cylinder upon his Tombe, containing a massie sphere, with an inscription of the proportion, whereof the continent exceedeth the thing contained. So Archimedes being as you have heard, did as much as lay in him, both to save himselfe and SYRACUSA from taking. But now againe to Marcellus. Marcellus during the siege at SYRACUSA, wan the City of MEGARE in SICILE, one of the ancientest Cities in all the Island: and he tooke besides, the Campe of Hippocrates, lying by ACILES, where he slew above 8000 men, surprising them upon the sodaine, even as they were preparing to lodge, and to fortifie their Campe. Then he overcame a great part of the Champion Countrey of SICILE, and made the Cities to rebell that tooke the CARTHAGINIANS part: and in all the Battels he fought, he ever overcame them that durst bid him Battell. It chanced afterwards, that he tooke a LACEDÆMONIAN Captaine prisoner, called Danippus: even as he came out of SYRACUSA by Sea. The SYRACUSANS desirous to redeeme him, sent to him to pray he might be ransomed. They made many parlies about his ransome, and drew out this practise to divers meetings: untill Marcellus had taken good markes of a certaine Tower, that had no great watch set upon it, and into the which he might secretly convey a certaine number of men, the Wall of the City in that place being no very hard thing to scale. Therefore when he had given a good guesse by estimation at the height of that Tower, by often approaching to it, having parlied many a time hard by it: he provided skaling Ladders, andooke the opportunity of a Feast which the SYRACUSANS solemnized in the honour of Diana, on which day they gave themselves to all feasting, sporting and playes. So he tooke not only the Tower, but filled all the Walles round about with armed men before day, and brake open the maine gate and entry of the City called Hexapile. And as the SYRACUSANS began to stirre, perceiving the ROMANS on the Walles, Marcellus made his men sound their Trumpets on every side. Whereupon the SYRACUSANS were so afraid and amazed, that they began to fly, thinking all the City besides had bene taken, where indeed the greatest and strongest part of the City called ACRADINA, was not yet touched: because it is walled in round about, and separated from the rest of the City, which is divided into two other parts, the one called the new City, and the other Fortune. The two parts whereof being won, Marcellus by the breake of the day forced in by the gate or entry of the Hexapile. And when his Captaines told him he was happy, to win so goodly a City so easily: they say that he (looking about him, and considering the greatnesse and stateliness of the same) wept for very pity, foreseeing whereto it should come, thinking with himselfe what a sudden change it should have, when his Army came to spoile and sacke the same. For there was not a Captaine that durst deny the Souldiers when they demanded the spoile, and yet were there many that would needs have it burnt and rased to the ground. But Marcellus would not agree to that in any case; and besides, it was fore against his minde to grant them the spoile of the goods and slaves: straightly commanding them notwithstanding, not to lay hands on any free-man, and not to kill, hurt, nor to make any SYRACUSAN slave. Wherein, though he shewed great favour and mercy, yet it grieved him to see so famous a City, brought to that miserable state: and in the midst of all the joy he had for his Victory, he could not refrain from weeping for pity, to see so rich and wealthy a City, in the turning of a hand, spoiled and brought to nought. For it is said, that the riches and goods taken away at the sacke of SYRACUSA, were nothing inferior to the spoiles of CARTHAGE, which was also sacked not long after that: for the other part of the City of SYRACUSA called ACRADINA, was soone after also taken by treason, and spoiled against the Captaines wils, saving the Kings Treasure, which was reserved to be carried to the common Treasure of ROME. SYRACUSA being taken, nothing grieved Marcellus more, then the losse of Archimedes: who being in his study when the City was taken, busily seeking out by himselfe the demonstration of some Geometrical proposition which he had drawne in figure, and so earnestly occupied therein, as he never saw nor heard any noise of Enemies that ranne up and downe the City, and much lesse knew it was taken: he wondered when he saw a Souldier by him, that bade him goe with him to Marcellus. Notwithstanding, he spake to the Souldier, and bade him tarry untill he had done his conclusion, and brought it to demonstration: but the Souldier being angry with his answer, drew out his Sword and killed him. Other say, that the ROMANE Souldier when he came, offered the Swords point to him to kill him: and that Archimedes when he saw him, prayed him to hold his hand a little, that he might not leave the matter he looked for imperfect, without demonstration. But the Souldier making no reckoning of his speculation, killed him presently. It is reported a third way also, saying, that certaine Souldiers met him in the streets going to Marcellus, carrying certaine Mathematicall instruments in a little pretty coffer, as Dials for the Sunne, Spheres and Angles, where-with they measure the greatnesse of the body of the Sunne by view: and they supposing he had carried some Gold or Silver, or other precious Jewels in that little coffer, slew him for it. But it is most true, that Marcellus was marvellous sory for his death, and ever after hated the villaine that slew him, as a cursed and execrable person: and how he made also marvellous much afterwards of Archimedes Kinsmen for his sake. The ROMANS were esteemed of at that time by all Nations, for marvellous expert Souldiers, and taken for very valiant and dangerous men to be dealt with: but they never shewed any example of their clemencie and courtesie, and left of all of any civill manner to any strangers, untill Marcellus taught the way, whose acts did shew the GRECIANS then, that the ROMANS were more gracious and mercifull then they. For he did so courteously ously intreate those that had to doe with him, and shewed such favour to private persons, and also to whole Cities: that if there were any cruelty shewed in the Cities of ENNA, or at MEGARES, or against the SYRACUSANS, it was rather through their owne fault and folly that were hurt, then theirs that did them the hurt. And for prooffe hereof, I will recite you one example only among many. There is a City in SICILE called ENGyum, it is no great thing, but a very ancient City of Name, by reason of the trafficke thither, for that there are certaine goddesses to be seene, whom they worship, called the Mothers. Some say the CRETANS were the first builders and founders of the Temple there, where you shall see Spears and Helms of Copper, and upon them are graven the Name of Meriones: and upon others, Ulysses Name also, which are consecrated to these goddesses. This City stood altogether at the devotion of the CARTHAGINIANS: and Nicias being the chiefeest man of the same, was all he might against it, and perswaded them openly in all their counsels to take part with the ROMANES, proving it by many reasons, that his Enemies counselling the contrary, were unprofitable members of the Common-wealth. Whereupon Nicias Enemies fearing his greatnesse and authority, they did conspire among themselves to apprehend him, and to deliver him to the CARTHAGINIANS. But Nicias hearing of such a matter, and finding that they lay in waite to take him, used this policy to prevent their treason. He gave out openly very ill speeches against the goddesses, and did many things in derogation of their honour: and said the sight of them (which was a matter of great credit) was but a device, and that there was no credit to be given to them. These words tickled his Enemies, imagining that the common people would lay the mischief they pretended against him, to himselfe, as the only causer of his owne hurt. So they having appointed a day to apprehend him, by chance a common Councell was kept that day they had determined of: where Nicias speaking to the people about matters of counsell, in the midst of his Oration he fell to the ground, to the great wonder of the whole assembly, as every man may conjecture. Howbeit, never a man stirred, and a pretty while after he began to lift up his head a little, and to looke gaitly about him, with a faint trembling voice, which he still gathered higher and lower by little and little, untill he saw all the people wondrously afraid and amazed, that not one of them durst speake. Then throwing his Gowne from him, and renting his Coate, he got upon his feete halfe naked, and ran towards the gate of the Theater, crying out that the goddesses Mothers did torment him: and not a man durst once come neare him, nor offer to stop him, they were so superstitious and foolishly afraid of the goddesses, imagining it was some divine punishment. But by this meanes he easily got to the gates of the City, and fled from them all, and he was never seene after that time, to doe or speake like a mad man in any thing. His Wife that was made privie to his device, and furthered his intent, went first and fell downe on her knees before the goddesses mothers in the Temple, as she had heartily prayed unto them: and faining afterwards she would goe seeke her Husband, that ran up and downe the fields like a mad man, she went out of the City with her little Children, and no body troubled her. Thus did they escape without danger, and went unto Marcellus to SYRACUSA. The ENGIENIANS afterwards played such insolent parts, that Marcellus in the end went thither, and caused them all to be taken and bound, as though he would have put them to execution. But Nicias came to him with teares in his eyes, and embracing his knees, and kissing his hands, besought him to take pity upon his poore Citizens, beginning first with those that were his greatest Enemies. This good nature of Nicias so pacified Marcellus wrath, that he pardoned them all, and did no hurt to the City, and gave Nicias certaine Land, besides many other rich gifts he bestowed upon him. Thus it is reported in the History of Pisidianus the Philosopher. Now Marcellus being sent for home by the ROMANES, because they had Warres in their owne Countrey, and even at ROME gates: he departed out of SICILE returning towards ROME, and carried the goodliest Tables, Pictures, and Statues, and other such Ornaments as were in SYRACUSA, meaning first to beautifie his Triumph with them, and to leave them afterwards for an Ornament to ROME, which before that time, never knew what such curious works meant. For, this finenesse, and curious Tables and imagery, never came into ROME before, but was thoroughly set out with Armour and Weapons of barbarous people, and with bloody spoiles, and was also crowned with monuments of Victories and Triumphs of divers Enemies, which were no pleasant, but rather fearfull sights to looke upon, farre unfit for feminine eyes. But even as Epaminondas called the plaine of BOEOTIA, Mars his scaffold, where he kept his Games; and Xenophon also called the City of EPHEBUS, the Armourers shop: even so me thinks (as Pandarus said) they might rightly have termed ROME, the Temple of Mars fighting. And this was the peoples good wils much more to Marcellus, because he did so passingly set forth ROME with such excellent fine toys of GREECE. But Fabius Maximus on the other side, was better beloved of the old men; because he brought no such toys with him from the City of TARENTUM, when he wan it. Indeed he brought away Gold and ready Coine, and much other goods that were profitable; but for Images and Tables, he left them standing in their places, speaking a thing of great note. Let us leave the TARENTINES their gods offended with them. And furthermore the Noblemen were angry with Marcellus, saying, that by this act he had purchased ROME great malice and hate. First, because he did not only leade men Prisoners in his Triumph, but the gods also: and secondly, because he had filled the people full of prittle prattle, and idle curiosity, spending the whole day in gazing, and wondering at the excellency of the Workmen, and of the Works; where before they would fall to their labour, or else they went to the Warres, not being acquainted with curiosity, nor idle life, as Enripides said, speaking of Hercules:

In

In wicked practises he simple was to see,
But he exceld in vertuous deeds, and feates that worthy be.

Notwithstanding, Marcellus did glory among the GRECIANS themselves: saying that he had taught the ROMANES to esteeme the wonderfull works of GREECE, which they knew not before. But at his returne out of SICILE, his Enemies procured, that his honour of Triumph was denied him. So Marcellus knowing that he had yet left somewhat to doe in SICILE, and that the Warre was not altogether ended, and fearing besides left a third Triumph would make him too much envied: he was contented with good will to have the honour of the great Triumph in the Mountaine of ALBA only: and of the little Triumph, in the City of ROME. This manner of little Triumph is called in Greek Evan, and the ROMANES call it Ovatio. And this difference there is betweene them: that in the Ovatio Triumph, the party to whom it is granted, doth not enter into the City upon a triumphing Chariot drawne with foure Horses, nor doth carry any Lawrell upon his head in token of Triumph, nor hath any Trumpets or hornes blown before him, but doth march on foote with a paire of slippers on his feete, having Flutes and Howbowes playing before him, and wearing a Garland of Firre-tree upon his head: so as this manner of entry is nothing warlike, and is rather a pleasant then fearfull sight. Whereby it plainly appeareth, that these two kinds of entries they granted to the Captaines, returning from the Warres with Victory, were distinguished in the old time, rather by the manner, then by the greatnesse of their doings. For such as had overcome their Enemies by great slaughter and bloody Battels, they did make their entry with pompe of Triumph, that was altogether martiall and terrible, followed with their Souldiers armed, and crowned with Lawrell Garlands, as their custome was in mustering their Campe in the Warres. But they on the contrary side, that without any exploit of armes returned home with Victory, either by peaceable meanes, or by force of their eloquence; the Law granted them the honour of Ovatio Triumph, which was quier, and full of all joy and mirth. For the Flute is an instrument of pleasure belonging to Peace, and the Firre-tree is a tree consecrated to Venus, which goddess, above all gods and goddesses doth most detest Warres. This second kinde of entry was called Ovatio, not as many GRECIANS have taken it, coming of this word Evan, which is a voice and Song of joy, although they did use also to accompany the Captaines making their entry in this sort, crying, and singing Evan: but there were certaine GRECIANS that would have fetched the derivation of this word, from an old common custome they had: and were of opinion besides, that part of this honour did appertaine to god Bacchus, whose surname we call Evinus, and sometimes Triambus; Howbeit this is not the true derivation of the name, but after this sort. At the great Triumph and entry made, the Captaine or Generall that triumpheth as a Conquerour, did offer the Sacrifice (by the old Orders and ancient Customes of ROME) one or divers Oxen: where at the second Triumph called the Ovatio, he only sacrificed a Mutton, which the ROMANES call in their tongue Ovem, and thereof it was called Ovatio. And here by the way is to be noted, the difference betwixt the Law-maker of the ROMANE Laws and customes, and the Law-maker of the LACEDÆMONIANS: how each of them was contrary to the other, in appointing the sacrifices for Victory. For at SPARTA, the Captaine or Generall that had done his feat by policy or friendship, the Sacrifice he did offer up to the gods, was an Oxe: and he that by force, and bloody Battell had obtained Victory, only offered up a Cock for sacrifice. For though they were very good Souldiers, yet they thought better of his service, that by his wisdom and wise perswasions obtained Victory, then of his, that wan it by valiantnesse and force of armes. Thus you may see which of these two Law-makers had best reason by his Ordinances. But now to Marcellus againe. He being chosen Consul the fourth time, his Enemies and evill willers did stirre up the SYRACUSANS against him, and perswaded them to complaine to the Senate of him, that he had cruelly and uncourteously used them, contrary to the ancient League and alliances made long before with the ROMANES. Marcellus being sacrificing one day in the Capitoll, while the Senate were set in counsell, the SYRACUSANS Deputies came before them, and kneeling downe besought them to give them audience, and that they would doe them justice. The other Consul that was present rebuked them, being angry that they had so maliciously spied the occasion of Marcellus absence. But when Marcellus heard of it, he straight left off all, and came to the Senate, and first sate him downe in his Consuls chaire, where he gave audience as Consul, and dispatched divers Causes: when he had so done, he rose out of his chaire and came downe among them, standing as a private person to answer at the Barre, as other offenders and men accused, suffering the SYRACUSANS to alledge and say against him what they would. Then were the SYRACUSANS blanke, when they saw the majesty of Marcellus, and his staied countenance in all things: and as they had found him before a very valiant man in Wars, and unconquerable, they found him then a man no lesse dreadfull in his Consuls robe: so that they hung downe their heads, and durst not looke him in the face. Notwithstanding they being suborned by his Enemies, began at the length boldly to accuse him, and yet with sorrow and lamentation, the effect whereof was this: That they being the ROMANES friends and confederates, had abidden such injuries at Marcellus hands, as all other Generals never offered their very Enemies. Whereto Marcellus straight answered againe to the contrary: That for many injuries the ROMANES had received of them, they suffered nothing but that which was impossible they should not suffer, that resisted untill they were taken by force: and yet they might thanke themselves for any thing they suffered, because they would not obey nor consent to reasonable capitulations and Articles of Peace,

which he had oftentimes offered them. And againe, they could not alledge for their excuse, that the Tyrants had compelled them to make Warres: when they to the contrary because they would enter into Warres, were contented to be subject to a Tyrant. So, when both parties had spoken their mindes, the SYRACUSANS (as the manner is) went out of the Senate house, and Marcellus also leaving his fellow Consull in his place in the Senate; and tarried without the door, attending the sentence of the Senate, never altering his countenance nor wonted looke, neither for feare of sentence, nor for malice nor anger against the SYRACUSANS, quietly looking for his judgement. Afterwards when the Senators voices were gathered together, and that Marcellus was cleared by most voices: then the SYRACUSANS fell downe at his feete weeping, and besought him not to wreake his anger upon them that were present, and moreover that he would have compassion on the residue of the Citizens, who did acknowledge his great grace and favour extended to them, and confessed themselves bound to him for ever. Marcellus moved with pity by their intreaty, he pardoned them, and ever after did to the SYRACUSANS what pleasure he could possibly. For through his intreaty and request, the Senate did confirme and ratifie his Grant unto them, which was, that they might use the liberty and benefit of their owne Lawes, and quietly enjoy their goods also which were left them. To requite the speciall grace procured them by Marcellus, the SYRACUSANS gave him many honours, and among others they made a Law, that ever after as oft as any of Marcellus Name or House came into SICILE, the SYRACUSANS should keep a solemne Feast, with Garlands on their heads, and should also sacrifice unto the gods. After this, Marcellus went against Hannibal: and where all the other Consuls almost, and Generals, after the overthrow at CANNES, had used this only policy with him, not to come to Battell: he took a contrary course to them all, thinking that tract of time (whereby they thought to eate out Hannibal's force) was rather a direct consuming and destroying of all ITALY: and that Fabius Maximus standing too much upon safety, took not the way to cure the disease and weakenesse of the Common-weale of ROME, looking to end this Warre, consuming by little and little the strength and power of ROME, committing a fearful Physitions fault and error, being afraid to heale the patient sodainly, imagining that to bring them low, doth lessen the disease. So first of all he went to besiege certaine great Cities of the SAMNITES, which were revolted from obedience of the ROMANES: and those he wan againe with a great provision of Corne and Money, he found in them, besides three thousand Souldiers Hannibal had in garison there, whom he tooke prisoners. Hannibal after that, having slaine the Viceconsull Cneius Fulvius in APULIA, with eleven Tribunes Militum (to wit, Colonels) every one having the charge of a thousand Footmen, and overthrowne the greatest part of his Army: Marcellus wrote Letters to ROME, hoping to comfort the Senate and people, telling he would go thither, and did warrant them he would drive Hannibal out of APULIA. When the ROMANES had read his Letters, they were nothing the more comforted, but rather (as Livy writeth) more afraid and discouraged: because they doubted the danger to come would be greater then the losse past, taking Marcellus to be a far greater and better Generall, then ever was Fulvius. Nevertheless, Marcellus performing the contents of his Letters written to ROME, drave Hannibal out of APULIA, and made him retire into LUCANIA. And Marcellus finding him in that country, by a City called NUMISTRON, lodged upon hills, and in place of strength and advantage: he camped hard by him in the valley, and the next morning he was the first that presented his Enemy Battell. Hannibal on the other side, came downe into the valley, and they joynt Battell: which was so cruelly fought, and so long time, as it could not be discerned who had the better. For the Battell being begun at nine of the Clocke in the morning, 'twas darke night ere they gave over. The next morning by peepe of day, Marcellus set his men againe in battell ray, in the midst of all the dead bodies that lay slaine in the Field, and challenged Hannibal, to prove who should have the field, but Hannibal refused, and marched his way thence: so as Marcellus thereby had good leisure left him to strip his slaine Enemies, and also to bury his owne Souldiers. When he had finished that, he presently followed his Enemy by the footte, who laid many ambushes for him, but he could never trap him in any: and in every encounter or skirmish they had together Marcellus had ever the better, which wan him great fame and credit. Now time being come about to chuse new Consuls, the Senate thought good to send rather for the other Consull that was in SICILE, then to remove Marcellus thence, who had fought with Hannibal. So when the other Consull was come to ROME, the Senate commanded him to name Quintus Fulvius Dictator, because the Dictator was neither chosen by the People, nor by the Senate: but one of the Consuls or Prators, in open assembly of the People, nameth such a one Dictator as he liketh of. Wherefore it seemeth, that this word Dictator, came upon that word, naming: for, Dicere in the ROMANE tongue, signifieth to name. Howbeit other hold opinion, that he was called Dictator, because he commandeth of himselfe what he will, without the counsell of the Senate, and the voices of the people: and this seemeth to be true, because the commandements of the Senate of ROME are called Edicta, which the GRECIANS call Diatagmata. Now the other Consull and companion of Marcellus being come out of SICILE, he would needs name another Dictator then him whom the Senate offered him: and because he would not be compalled to doe that he was unwilling to doe, he stole away one night, and returned againe into SICILE. Hereupon the people did name and appoint Quintus Fulvius Dictator, and the Senate wrote their Letters to Marcellus, to confirme him; which Marcellus did, and authorized the Peoples election. So he himselfe was chosen againe Proconsull for the next yeare following: in the which he having conferred with Fabius Maximus about the Warres, they were agreed that Fabius should prove if he could win the City of

TARENTUM againe: and that Marcellus in the meane time should keepe Hannibal occupied, that he might not come to aid it. This resolution being taken between them, Marcellus went to meet Hannibal by the City of CANNUS: who as he stil changed and shifted lodging, because he would not come to the Battell against his will, found Marcellus ever in his eye before him. Infomuch as Hannibal removing thus his Campe, Marcellus plied him so one day with continuall alarms and skirmishes, that he brought him to a Battell that held all day long till night, and compelled them both to leave off till the next morning: where Marcellus shewed againe in field by breake of the day, in Battell ray. Whereat Hannibal being in a marvellous rage, he called his souldiers together and made an Oration to them, earnestly moving them once again to fight with Marcellus, if ever they had heretofore fought for his sake. You see, said he, that having fought so many Battells, and gotten such Victories as we have done, we cannot yet take breath as we would, nor be in quiet, how much soever we win, if we drive not away yonder fellow Marcellus. When Hannibal had ended his Oration to the CARTHAGINIANS, he led them on to the Battell: where Marcellus, to no purpose and out of time, would needs shew Hannibal a stratageme of war, that turned to himselfe the worst. For Marcellus perceiving the right wing of his Army distressed, made one of his Legions that was set in ray in the rereward of his host, to march to the front of his Battell, to helpe those that needed aid. But this removing of the Legion, troubled them that fought, and gave the Enemies the Victory: who slew that day two thousand seven hundred of the ROMANES. So, when Marcellus was come againe into his Campe, he straight called his souldiers before him, to whom he spake in this manner: That he saw a great deale of armour, and bodies of men, but he could see no ROMANES. The ROMANES hearing him say so, besought him to pardon the fault they had committed. Marcellus answered, he would never pardon them, so long as they were overcome: but when they overcome againe, he was content to remit all. So the next morning he agreed to bring them again to fight with the Enemy, that such as were at ROME should rather heare newes of their Victory, then of their running away. When he had said, he appointed they should give those bands that first turned their backs to Hannibal, Barly for Wheate. So as though many of them were in great danger of their lives, for the fore wounds they had received in the Battell: yet their was not a man of them, but Marcellus words did more grieve them then the grievous woundes they had. The next morning betimes was let out of the Generals tent, the Coat armour died in skarlet, which is the ordinary signe of Battell: and the bands that had received dishonour the day before, were placed at their own request in the front of the Battell. The other Capitaines besides, that were not overthrowne, led their bands also to the field, and did set them in Battell ray. Hannibal hearing of that cried out: O gods, what a Man is this, that cannot be quiet, neither with good nor ill fortune? for he is the only odde man, that never giveth rest to his Enemies, when he hath overcome him, nor taketh any for himselfe when he is overcome. We shall never have done with him, for any thing that I see, sith shame, whether he win or lose, doth still provoke him to be bolder and valianter. After Orations made of both sides, both Armies marched forwards to joyne Battell. The ROMANES being as strong as the CARTHAGINIANS, Hannibal, put his Elephants in the vaward and front of his Battell, and commanded his men to drive them upon the ROMANES: and so they did. Which indeed did somewhat trouble and disorder the first ranks of the ROMANES: untill such time as Flavius Tribune of the souldiers, tooke an Ensigne in his hands, and marched before the beasts, and gave the first of them such a thrust with the point of his Ensigne, that he made her turne back. The first beast being turned back thus, ran upon the second that followed her, and the second made the third go backe also, and so from one to another, untill they all turned. Marcellus perceiving that, commanded his Horsemen to set upon the Enemies with all the fury they could, in that place where he saw them somewhat troubled with these beasts that turned back againe upon them: and that they should drive them further in amongst them. Which they did, and gave so hot a Charge upon the CARTHAGINIANS, that they made them turne their backs and run away, and they pursued them still, killing them down right, even to their Campe side: where was the greatest slaughter of all, by reason their Elephants that were wounded, fell downe starke dead within the Gate of their Camp. And they say, of the CARTHAGINIANS, there were slaine at this Battell, about eight thousand, and of the ROMANES onely three thousand: howbeit all the rest of them for the most part were very fore hurt. Which fell out very well for Hannibal, that he might march away at his pleasure, as he did that night, and got him away far off from Marcellus, as knowing he was not in state to follow him over sodainly, because of the great number of hurt men in his Camp: and so by small journeys he went into CAMPANIA, where he lay in garrison all the Sommer, in the City of SINUSSE, to heale the wounds of his fore mangled Souldiers. Hannibal having now gotten himself at the length out of Marcellus hands, and having his Army free to serve him as he thought good: he burned and destroyed all ITALY where he went, and flood no more in feare of any thing. This made Marcellus ill spoken of at ROME, and caused his Enemies to take hold of such a matter against him: for they straight raised Publius Bibulus Tribune to accuse him, who was a hot barebraine man, but very eloquent, and could deliver his minde very well. So this Bibulus called the people off to counsell, and told them there, that they must needs call home Marcellus, and appoint some other to take the charge of the Army: for as for him, said he, because he hath fought a little with Hannibal (and as a man might say, wrestled a little with him) he is now gotten to the Bathes to solace himselfe. But Marcellus hearing this, left his Lieutenants in the Campe, and went himselfe to ROME, to answer to the untrue accusations laid against him, and

and there he perceived at his coming, how they intended to prosecute the matter against him upon these informations. So a day of hearing was appointed for his matter, and the parties came before the People assembled in council, in the great lists or show place, called Circus Flaminius, to give judgement. There Publius Bibulus the Tribune, sitting in his chaire, laid open his accusation with great circumstance: and Marcellus, when Bibulus had told his tale, answered him in a few words, and very discreetly, onely touching his purgation. But the Noble and chiefe men of the City, rose up and spake on Marcellus behalfe, telling the People plainly that they did Marcellus wrong, to reckon worke of his valiantnesse, then their Enemy did: and to judge of him as a coward, considering Hannibal onely fled from him, of all other Captaines, and would by no means fight with him, never refusing to fight with any other whatsoever. These persuasions took such effect, as where Marcellus accuser looked for his condemnation, Marcellus to the contrary, was not onely cleared of his accusation, but furthermore, they chose him Consul againe the fift time. So being entred into his Office he went first into THUSCAN: where visiting the good Cities one after another, and quieting them, he pacified a great sedition in the Countrey, when they were all ready to rise and rebel. Afterwards at his returne, he thought to consecrate the Temple of Honour and Vertue, which he had built with the spoiles he got in the wars of SICILE. But the Priests were against it, laying, two gods might not be in one Church. Thereupon he built another Temple, and joyne it to the first, being very angry the Priests denied so his consecration: and he did take it for an evil token, besides divers others signes in the element that afterwards appeared, and troubled him much. For there were many Temples set on fire with lightning at one time: and the Rats and Mice did gnaw the Gold that was in the Chappell of Jupiter Capitoline. And it is reported also, that an Ox did speake: and a Child came out of the Head of an Elephant, and that the Child was alive. Furthermore, the Priests and Soothsayers, sacrificing to the gods, to withdraw the evil from them these sinister tokens did threaten: they could never finde any favourable signes in their sacrifices. Whereupon they fought to keep Marcellus still at ROME, who had a marvellous earnest desire to be gone with speed to the wars: for never man longed for any thing so much, as Marcellus did, to fight with Hannibal. Infomuch as he never dreamed other thing in the night, nor speake of any matter else in the day to his friends and companions, nor prayed to the gods for any other thing, but that he might fight with Hannibal in the Field: and I thinke he would willingly have fought a private combat with him in some walled City or inclosed lists for the combat. And had it not bin that he had already won himself a great fame, and shewed himself to the world (by sundry great proofes and experience of his doings) a grave, skilfull, and valient Captaine as any man of his time: I would have said it had been a pang of youth, and a more ambitious desire, then became a man of his age, who was three score yeares old at that time, when they made him Consul againe the fift time. Nevertheless, after he had ended all his propitiatory sacrifices and purifications, such as the Soothsayers had appointed, he departed from ROME with his fellow Consul Quintus Crispinus to the wars. He found Hannibal lying between the Cities of BANCIA, and VENOUSA, and fought all the meanes he could to procure him to fight, but he could never get him to it. Howbeit Hannibal being advertised by spies, That the Consuls set an Army to besiege the City of the LOCRIANS surnamed EPITAPHYRIANS (as you would say) the occidentals, because the GRECIANS in respect of the ITALIANS, are called the orientals: he laid an ambush for them that went under the Hill of PETELIUM, which was directly in their way, where he flew above two thousand five hundred ROMANES. That overthrow did set Marcellus on fire, and make him more desirous of Battell: whereupon he removed his Camp from the place he lay in, and marched neerer to his Enemy. Between their two Camps there was a pretty little Hill, strong of situation, a wilde thing overgrown with Wood: and there was high hillockes, from whence they might discerne a great way, both the one and the others Campes, and at the foot of the same ran pretty springs: Infomuch as the ROMANES wondered that Hannibal coming thither first, did not take that place, but had left it to his Enemies. Howbeit Hannibal was crafty enough, leaving it of purpose: For as it was commodious to lodge his Camp, so it served his turne better for an ambush. So he filled the Wood, the hollow places, and the vallies thereabout, with store of shot and spearmen, assuring himself that the place would intice the ROMANES thither: and indeed he guessed rightly, for so it fell out. Straight there flue a rumour abroad in the ROMANES Campe, that there was a passing place to lodge in, and every man took upon him like a skilfull Souldier, to tell what vantage they should have upon their Enemies by taking that place, and specially if they did lodge there, or otherwise built a fort upon it. Whereupon Marcellus determined to go see the place himselfe, taking a few Horsemen with him. Notwithstanding, before he would take Horse, he called for his Soothsayer to sacrifice to the gods. The first beast that was sacrificed, the Soothsayer shewed Marcellus the liver of it without a Head. The second beast sacrificed, had a faire great Head of a Liver, and all the other parts were also found, and very new: that by them it appeared all the feare of the first signes and tokens were taken away. Yet the Soothsayers on the other side said, it did make them worke afraid then before: for these so favourable and lucky tokens of the sacrifice, following immediately after the first foule and naughty signes, made them doubt them much, by reason of so strange and suddaine an alteration. But as the Poet Pindarus saith:

Nor whatsoever other thing, is here this earth upon.

So Marcellus tooke his Horse, with Quintus Crispinus his fellow Consul, and his Sonne one of the Tribunes of the Souldiers, having onely two hundred and twenty Horsemen with him, of the which there was not one ROMAN among them, but all were THUSCANES, saving forty FREGELLANIANES, who from the beginning of these Warres, had alwaies shewed themselves very faithfull and loving to Marcellus. The hill we spake of before, being thicke covered with Woode and Bushes, the Enemies had set a Scout to watch on the top of it, to give warning if they saw any coming towards it. The ROMANES could not see him, and he on the other side might see even into their Campe, and perceive what was done: as he did advertise those at that time that lay in ambush for Marcellus coming: and they suffered him to passe on, untill he came directly against them. Then they shewed upon the sudden, and compassing in Marcellus, they both shot and strake at him, some following them that fled, and other fighting with the forty FREGELLANIANES which onely stuck to it: who came roundly in together (notwithstanding the THUSCANES were fled) upon the first cry they heard, to defend the two Consuls, untill such time as the Consul Crispinus having two wounds on his body with a dart, did turne his Horse to flie. And with that, one of the Enemies gave Marcellus such a fore blow with a Speare having a broad Iron head, that he ran him quite through. The FREGELLANIANES that were left alive, being but a few in number, seeing Marcellus slaine, left him lying on the ground, and tooke his Sonne away with them, that was very sore hurt, and by the swiftnesse of their Horses recovered their Campe, and saved themselves. At this overthrow, there were not slaine above forty men, and five and twenty taken Prisoners, of which five of them were the Consuls Sergeant, and their Officers that carried Axes before them, and the other were all Horsemen. Within few daies after, the other Consul Crispinus died also of his hurts, which was such a misfortune, as never came before to the ROMANES, that both their Consuls were slaine at one Battell. Now Hannibal made no great reckoning of all that were slaine or taken at this Field: but when he heard that Marcellus selfe was slaine at this overthrow, he went himselfe straight to the place to see him. So when he had viewed his body a great while, standing hard by it, and considering his strength, his stature, and countenance, having taken full view of all the parts of him, he spake no proud words against him, nor shewed any glad countenance, as some other would have done, that had slaine so valiant and dangerous an Enemy: but wondering how he came to be slaine so strangely there, he tooke off his Ring from one of his fingers that sealed his Letters, and giving his body buriall according to his estate, made it to be honourably burnt, and then put all his bones and ashes into a silver pot, on which he himselfe put a Crowne of Gold, and sent it unto Marcellus Sonne. It fortune so, that certaine light Horsemen of the NUMIDIANS met with them that carried this Silver pot, and would have taken it from them by force, but they stoode to it, and would not part withall, and so fighting and striving together for it, the bones and ashes were scattered all about. Hannibal hearing this, said to them that were about him: See, how nothing can be, which the gods will not. So he punished the NUMIDIANS, and cared no more to get Marcellus bones together, but perswaded himselfe it was the will of their gods he should die so strangely, and that his body should have no buriall. Cornelius Nepos, and Valerius Maximus write it thus: but Livy and Augustus Caesar say, that the pot was carried unto his Sonne, and honourably buried: Marcellus did consecrate many Monuments in divers places, besides those at ROME. As at CATANA in SICILE: a place for young men to exercise themselves in. In the Isle of SAMOTHRACIA, in the Temples of the gods called Cabires: many Images and Tables he brought from SYRACUSA. And in the Isle of LINDOS, in the Temple of Minerva, where among other, there is a statue of his, and this Epigram graven under it, as Posidanius the Philosopher writeth:

O thou my friend (I say) which passest forth by me,
Of Claudius Marcellus here, the Image mayst thou see:
Whose Family at Rome, was of the noblest Name.
Seven times he Consul chosen was, in which he overcame Great numbers infinite, (in open Field and Fight)
Of such as sought his Countreys spoile, and put them all to flight.

The Author of this Epigramme reckoneth the two times of his being Viceconsul, for two whole Consulships: but his Posterity continued alwaies in great honour, unto Marcellus the Sonne of Octavia (Augustus Caesars Sister) and of Caius Marcellus. He died a young man, being Edilis of ROME, and married unto Julia, Augustus Daughter, with whom he lived no long time. But to honour the memory of him, Octavia his Mother built the Library, and Augustus Caesar the Theater, which are called to this day, Marcellus Theater and Library.

THE COMPARISON OF MARCELLUS with PELOPIDAS.

Pelopidas and Marcellus acts in Warres.

*Marcellus acts
pretiered before Pelopidas.*

*The manner of Marcellus
deeds.*

*Marcellus made the Ro-

THese are the greatest things and best worthy of memory (in my opinion) of all Pelopidas and Marcellus doings: and for their manners and naturall conditions otherwise, they were all one, because they were both valiant, painfull, and noble minded: saving that this difference onely was between them, that Marcellus in many Cities he tooke by assault, did cruelly murder them, and spilt much blood: where Epaminondas and Pelopidas contrarily did never put any to the Sword they overcame, neither did they take away the liberty from any City they tooke: as it is thought the THEBANES would not have handled the ORCHAMENIANS so cruelly as they did, if one, or both of them had beene present. Now for their acts, it was a noble and wonderfull piece of Service that Marcellus did, with so small a company of Horsemen as he tooke with him, to overthrow so great a company of Horsemen and Footmen both, of the GAULES: a thing that never Generall but himselfe did, and specially that slew with his owne hands in the Field, the Generall of his Enemies: which Pelopidas could never attaine unto; for he seeking to kill Alexander the Tyrant of PHERES, was slaine first himselfe, and suffered that, which he desired to have done to another. And yet for that Service may be objected, the Battels of LEUCTRES, and of TEGYRA, which were both famous and notable. But to encounter with those, there was no notable ambush or secret practice done by Marcellus, that was any thing like comparable to that Pelopidas did at his returne from exile, when he slew the Tyrants that kept THEBES in bondage. For that was as notable a policy and sudden an enterprize stollen upon, as none was ever greater, or more famous. It is true, Marcellus was yoked with Hannibal, who was a dreadful and a violent Enemy: so were the THEBANES also at that very time with the LACEDÆMONIANS, who notwithstanding were overcome of Pelopidas, at the Battels of TEGYRA, and of LEUCTRES. Whereas Marcellus did never so much as once overcome Hannibal, as Polybius writeth; but remained unconquered alwaies, untill that Scipio overcame him in Battell. Notwithstanding, we do give best credit to the reports of Cæsar, Livie, Cornelius, Nepos, and of King Juba among the GRECIANS: who write that Marcellus otherwhile did overthrow certaine of Hannibals Companies; howbeit they were never so great overthrows to speake of, and it seemeth rather, it was through some mockery or deceit of that AFRICAN then otherwise. Yet sure it was a great matter, and worthy much commendation, that the ROMANES were brought to that courage, as they durst abide to fight with the CARTHAGINIANS, after so many great overthrows, and having so many Generals of their Armies slaine in battell, and the whole Empire of ROME being in so great danger of utter destruction. For it was Marcellus onely of all other Generals, that put the ROMANES in heart againe, after so great and long a feare thoroughly rooted in them: and encouraged the Souldiers also so long to fight with their Enemy, and not onely to hope, but to assure themselves of Victory. For, where by reason of their continuall losses and fearefull overthrowes they had, they thought themselves happy men to escape Hannibals hands by running away: he taught them to be ashamed to flie like cowards, to confesse they were in distresse, to retire, and leave the Field, before they had overcome their Enemies. And where Pelopidas was never overcome in Battell being Generall, and Marcellus did overcome more then any Generall in his time: it might seeme therefore that the great number of the Victories of the one, should compare with the good hap of the other, that was never overcome. It is true that Marcellus tooke the City of SYRACUSA, and Pelopidas failed of taking the City of SPARTA: but yet do I thinke that it was more valiantly done of Pelopidas to come so neare neare SPARTA as he did, and that he was the first that passed the River of EUROTAS with an Army, which never Enemy did before him, then it was of Marcellus to winne all SICILIE. Unlesse some peradventure will say againe, this was Epaminondas, not Pelopidas act, as also in the Victory of LEUCTRES: whereas no man living can challenge any part of Glory in the doings of Marcellus: for he tooke SYRACUSA, being onely Generall alone, and did overthrow the GAULES without his fellow Confull, and fought with Hannibal, without any mans helpe or encouragement (for all other were against it, and perswaded the contrary) and he was the first that altered the manner of Warres the ROMANES used then, and that trained his Souldiers that they durst fight with the Enemy. For their death, I neither commend the one nor the other, and the strangenesse of either of their deaths doth grieve me marvellously: as I do greatly wonder also, how Hannibal in so many Battels as he fought (which are innumerable) could alwaies scape unhurt. I cannot but greatly commend also the valiantnesse of one Chrysantas, whom Xenophon speaketh of in his Bookes of the institution of Cyrus, saying: that he having lift up his Sword in his hand ready to kill one of his Enemies, and hearing the Trumper found the Retraite, he softly retired, and would not strike him. Howbeit it seemeth Pelopidas is more to be excused: for beside that he was very hot and desirous of Battell, his anger was honourable and just, and moved him to seeke revenge. For as the Poet Euripides saith:

*The best that may betide, is When a Captaine lives, And doth survive the Victories, which he with force achieves:
But if he need: must fall, then let him valiantly Even thrust amid the thickest throng, and there with honour dye.*

For so becometh his death famous, and not dishonourable. But now, besides Pelopidas just cause of anger, yet was there another respect that most pricked him forward, to do that he did: for he saw his Victory ended, in the death of the Tyrant: otherwise he hardly should have found so noble an occasion to have shewed his valiantnesse, as in that. And Marcellus contrarily, without any instant necessity, and having no cause or heate of choler (which putteth all men valiant in Fight besides themselves, that they know not what they do) did rashly and unadvisedly, thrust himselfe into the midst of the danger, where he died not as a Generall, but as a Light-horseman and Scout (abandoning his three Triumphs, his five Consulships, and his Spoiles and Tokens of Triumph, which he had gotten of Kings with his owne hands) among venturous SPANIARDS and NUMIDIANS, that sold their blood and lives for pay unto the CARTHAGINIANS: so that I imagine they were angry with themselves (as a man would say) for so great and happy Victory, to have slaine amongst FREGELLANIAN Scouts, and Light-horsemen, the noblest and worthiest person of the ROMANES. I would no man should thinke I speake this in reproach of the memory of these two famous men, but as a griefe onely of them and their valiantnesse, which they employed so, as they bleished all their other vertues, by indiscreet hazarding of their persons and lives without cause, as if they would and should have died for themselves, and not rather for their Countrey and friends. And also when they were dead. Pelopidas was buried by the Allies and Confederates of the City of THEBES, for whose cause he was slaine: and Marcellus in like manner, by the Enemies selves that had slaine him. And sure the one is a happy thing, and to be wished for in such a case: but the other is far above it, and more to be wondred at: That the Enemy himselfe should honour his valiantnesse and worthinesse that hurt him, more then the Office of friendship performed by a thankfull friend. For nothing moveth the Enemy more to honour his dead Enemy, then the admiration of his worthinesse: and the friend sheweth friendship many times, rather for respect of the benefits he hath received, then for the love he beareth to his Vertue.

ARISTIDES the Sonne of Lyfimachus, was certainly of the Tribe of Antiochides, and of the Towne of ALOPECIA. But for his Goods and Wealth they diversly write of him. For some say, he lived poorly all the daies of his life, and that he left two Daughters, which by reason of their poverty, lived unmarried many yeares after their Fathers death. And many of the oldest Writers do confirme that for truth. Yet Demetrius Phalerus, in his Booke intituled Socrates, writeth the contrary, that he knew certain Lands Aristides had in the Village of PHALERIA, which did yet beare the name of Aristides Lands, in the which his body is buried. And furthermore, to shew that he was well to live, and that his house was rich and wealthy, he bringeth forth these proofes. First, that he was one yeare Mayor or Provost of ATHENS, whom they called Archon Eponymus, because the yeare tooke the name of him that had it yearly. And they say, he came to it by drawing of the Beane, according to the ancient use of the ATHENIANS. and their wonted manner of making their Election of the said Office: in which Election none were admitted to draw the Beane, but such as were highest set in their Subsidie-bookes, according to the value and rate of their Goods, whom they called at ATHENS, Pentacosmedimnes, as you would say, those that might dispend five hundred bushels of Wheate by the yeare, and upwards. Secondly, he alledgeth he was banished by the Ostracismos, which banisheth the Nobility and great rich men onely, whom the common People envie because of their greatnesse, and never dealeth with poore men. The third and last reason he makes, is, that he left of his gift, three-footed Stooles in the Temple of Bacchus, which those do commonly offer up, as have wonne the victory in Comedies, Tragedies, or other such like Pastimes, where they themselves had borne the charge. And those three-footed Stooles remaine there yet, which they say were given by Aristides, and have this Inscription upon them: The Tribe of Antiochides wanne the Victory, Aristides defrayed the charges of the Games, and Archestratus the Poet taught them to play their Comedies. The last reason, though it seeme likeliest of them all, yet is it the weakest of the rest. For Epaminondas (whom every man knoweth was poore even from his birth, and alwaies lived in great poverty) and Plato the Philosopher, tooke upon them to defray the charges of Games that were of no small expence: the one having borne the charges of Flute-players at THEBES, and the other the Daunce of the Children which daunced in a round at ATHENS: towards the furnishing of which charges, Dion the SYRACUSAN gave Plato Money, and Pelopidas also gave Epaminondas Money. Now, this is not spoken that vertuous men should alwaies refuse the gifts of their friends, and that they might not in some sort accept their friends courtesie offered them: but because they should thinke it uncomely and dishonourable for them, to take any thing to enrich themselves, or to spare and hoord up

Howbeit

Howbeit where there is an honourable Act to be done, or any publick Shew to be made, not tending to their private benefit: in such a case they should not refuse their friends loving offer and good will towards them. And where Demetrius saith, the three-footed Stooles was offered up in the Temple of Bacchus, Panatus declareth plainly, that Demetrius was deceived by the semblance of the name. For since the time of the Warres of the MEDS, unto the beginning of the Warre of PELOPONNESUS, in all the Registers and Records kept of the defrayers of the charges of common Playes, there were found but two men bearing name of Aristides that obtained Victory: and neither of them both was Sonne unto Lyfimachus, whom we write of at this present. For the one is expressly named the Sonne of Xenophilus, and the other was long after the same Aristides we now speak of: as appeareth easily by the writing and Orthography, which is according to the Grammer Rules, we have used in GREECE ever since Euclides time. Moreover it is easie to be knowne, by the name of the Poet Archestratus that is adjoining to it: for there is no man that maketh mention of a Poet of this name, in all the Warres of the MEDS: but in the time of the Warres of PELOPONNESUS, many do put him in for an Authour and maker of Rimes and Songs that were sung in common Daunces. Yet for all Panatus objections, the matter is to be better looked into, and considered of. But for the Ostracismos banishment, it is true, that such as were great men in estimation above the common People, either in Fame, Nobility, or Eloquence, they onely were subject unto this banishment. For Damon himselfe, being Pericles Schoole-master, was banished, onely because the common People thought him too wise. Moreover, Idomeneus writeth, that Aristides was their Provost for a yeare, not by lot of Beanes, but by voyce of the ATHENIANS that chose him. And if he were Provost since the Journey of PLATES, as Demetrius writeth, it is likely enough that they did him this honour, for his great vertue and notable service, which other were wont to obtaine for their riches. But this Demetrius doth not onely defend Aristides, but also Socrates poverty, as if it were a foule vice and reproach to be poore. For he writeth, that he had not onely a house of his owne, but also threescore and ten Minas at usury, which Crison gave him Interest for. But now to our Story againe. Aristides was *Clesthene*s very friend, he that restored the Government at ATHENS after the expulsion of the thirty Tyrants, and did reverence Lycurgus the Law-maker of the LACIDEMONIANS for his Laws, above all the men in his time: and therefore he ever favoured the state of Aristocratie, that is, where the Noblemen rule and have the Sovereignty. Howbeit he ever had Themistocles (Neocles Sonne) his continuall adversary, as taking part with the contrary, and defending the Popular state of Government. Some say, that being Scholars, and brought up together, they were ever contrary one to another in all their actions and doings, were it in sport, or in matter of earnest: and ever after, men began to see the naturall inclination of them both, by their contrary affections. For Themistocles was quick, nimble, adventurous, and subtil, and would venture on any thing upon light occasion. Aristides contrariwise was very quiet, temperate, constant and marvellous well stayed, who would for no respect be drawne away from equity and justice, neither would lye, flatter, nor abuse any body, though it were but in sport. Notwithstanding Aristus of CHIO writeth, that their malice began first of light love, and that it grew to greatnesse by proceesse of time betweene them: For (saith he) both the one and the other of them fell in love with Stesileus, borne in the Isle of CAOS. This fond light love of theirs, fell not easily from them, nor the envie they conceived one against another, but continued against each other in matters of State: such were their malice towards one another. In which calling, Themistocles fought the way to winne friends, by whose meanes he came to great preferment in short time, and had made himselfe very strong by them. Therefore, when a friend of his told him one day, he was worthy to governe the City of ATHENS, and were very fit for it, if he were indifferent, and not partiall: The gods forbid (quoth he) I should ever occupie the place of a Governour, where my friends should not finde more favour then strangers, that do me no pleasure. But Aristides taking another course by himselfe, would not stand upon his friends in Governement. First, because he would do no man wrong with pleasuring his friends: nor yet would anger them, by denying their requests. Secondly, because he saw many Rulers and men of Authority bolde to do injustice and manifest wrong, bearing themselves upon their friends: but he carried this opinion, that no honest man or good Citizen, should trust to any bolstering of friends, but to his owne just and upright doings. Notwithstanding Aristides perceiving that Themistocles did rashly alter many things, and encountered all his wayes, and hindered his doings, he was enforced sometime to crosse Themistocles againe, and to speake against that he preferred, partly to be even with him, but most to hinder his Credit and Authority, which increased still through the Peoples favour and good will towards him: thinking it better by contrariying him a little to disappoint sometime a thing that might have fallen out well for the Common-wealth, rather then by giving him the head, to suffer him to grow too great. To conclude, it fortuned on a time, that Themistocles having preferred a matter very profitable for the Common-wealth, Aristides was so much against it, as Themistocles purpose tooke no place. Moreover Aristides was so earnest against him, that when the Councell brake up after Themistocles motion was rejected, he spake it openly before them all: that the Common-wealth of ATHENS would never prosper untill they both were laid in Barathrum, which was a Prison or hole, wherein they put all Thieves and condemned men. Another time, Aristides moved a matter to the People, which divers were against, but yet it went with him. And when the Judge or President of the Councell did put it to the People, to know their allowance of it: Aristides perceiving by the Arguments made against it, that the matter he preferred was hurtfull to the Common-wealth, he gave it over, and would not have it passe. Many times also Aristides spake by other men, when he would have a thing go forward, for feare lest Themistocles spight towards him, would hinder the benefit of the Common-wealth. They found him very constant and resolute in matters of State, whatsoever happened: which wanne him great commendation. For he was never the prouder for any honour they gave him, nor thought himselfe disgraced for any overthrow he received: being alwaies of this minde, that it was the duty of an honest Citizen, to be ever ready to offer his body and life to do his Countrey service, without respect and hope of reward of Money, or for Honour and Glory. Therefore when certaine Verses were repeated in the Theater, of one of the Tragedies of Aeschilus, made in commendation of the ancient Soothsayer Amphiaraus, to this effect:

But just indeed he will be found, and vertue still imbrace
With all his thought and soule, from whence there may proceed Grave counsels, for to beautifie his Countreys Crown indeed.*

All the People straight cast their eyes upon Arifides, as upon him, that in truth above all other most deserved the praise of so great a vertue. For he was so stout and resolute, not onely to resist favour and friendship, but to reject hate and anger also. For in case of justice, neither could friendship make him go awry for his friends sake: nor envie could move him to do injustice, to his very enemy. For prooffe hereof it is written, that he had an enemy of his in sure of Law, and did prosecute it to Judgement: infomuch as after the Plaint was read, the Judges were so angry with the offender, that without any more hearing of him, they would have given Sentence against him. But Arifides rising from his place, went and kneeled at the Judges feete with the offender his enemy, and besought them to give him leave to speake, to justifie and defend his Cause, according to the course of Law. Another time he being Judge betweene two private men that pleaded before him, one of them said unto him: Arifides, this fellow mine adversary here, hath done you great injury. My friend (quoth Arifides againe) I pray thee tell me onely the injury he hath done thee, for I am Judge here to do thee right, and not my selfe. Moreover, he being chosin high Treasurer of all the Revenues of ATHENS, did declare that all the Officers before him, and other his late Predecessors, had greatly robbed and spoiled the common Treasure, but specially Themistocles: who was a wife man, and of great judgement, but yet somewhat light fingered. Therefore when Arifides was brought to account, Themistocles and many other suborned by him, were against him, and accused him for abusing his Office, and followed him so hard, that through their practice they condemned him, as Idemeneus writeth. Yet the noblest Citizens seeing what injury they offered Arifides, took his cause in hand, and found means to procure the People not onely to release the Fine imposed upon him, but to restore him againe to his Office of high Treasurer for the year following: in the which he seemed to repent his former straightnesse in Government the year before, and dealt more favourably with those he had to do with, and would not examine every thing so straightly as he did before. Whereupon such as were thieves and stealers of the Treasure of the Common-wealth, did marvelously praise and like him, and became saters for him to continue in the Office. But when the day of election came, that the ATHENIANS would chuse him againe, Arifides selfe reproved them, and said: When I faithfully discharged the duty of mine Office committed to me by you, I then received thame and reproach at your hands: and now that I have dissembled, not seeming to see the thefts and robberies done upon your Treasure, ye claw me, and say I am an honest man, and a good Citizen. But I would you knew it, and I tell you plainly, I am more ashamed of the honour you do me now, then I was of the Fine you did set upon me, when you condemned me the last year: and I am sorry to speake it, that you should thinke it more commendation to pleasure the wicked, then to preserve the Common-wealth. did bend all their force, and made their greatest Right in that place. By which occasion, Themistocles and Arifides fighting one hard by another, for that the one was of the Tribe Leontides, and the other of Antiochides, they valiantly fought it out with the Enemies, envying one another : so as the barbarous People at the last being overthrowne, they made them flie, and drave them to their Ships. But when they were imbarqued and gone, the Captaines of the ATHENIANS perceiving they made not towards the Illes, which was their direct course to returne into ASIA, but that they were driven backe by storme of winde and Pyrries of the Sea, towards the Coast of ATTICA and the City of ATHENS, fearing lest they might finde ATHENS unfurnished for defence, and might set upon it : they thereupon sent away presently nine Tribes that marched thither with such speed, as they came to ATHENS the very same day, and left Arifides in the Campe at MARATHON, with his Tribe and Countrey-men, to looke to the Prisoners and Spoile they had wonne of the barbarous People. Who nothing deceived the opinion they had of his wisdom. For notwithstanding there was great store of Gold and Silver, much Apparell, Moveables, and other infinite Goods and Riches in all their Tents and Pavillions, and in the Ships also they had taken of theirs : he was not so covetous as once to touch them, nor to suffer any other to meddle with them, unlesse by stealth some provided for themselves. As amongst other, there was one Callias, one of Ceres Priests, called Dadouchos, as you would say, the Torch-bearer, (for in the secret Sacrifices of Ceres, his Office was to hold the Torch) whom when one of the barbarous People saw, and how he wore a band about his head, and long haire, he tooke him for some King, and falling on his knees at his feete, kissed his hand, and shewed him great store of Gold he had hidden and buried in a ditch. But Callias, like a most cruell and cowardly wretch of all other on the Earth, tooke away the Gold, and killed the poore soule that had shewed him the place, because he should not tell it to others. Hereof it cometh, that the Comical Poet do call those that came of him in mockery, Laccoplures, as made rich by a Ditch : because of the Gold that Callias found in it. Immediately after this Battell, Arifides was chosen Provost of ATHENS for the year : albeit Demetrius Phalerius writeth, that it was a little before his death, after the Journey of PLATES. For in their Chronicles, where they set in order their Provosts of ATHENS for the year, since Xanhippes time, there appeared no one name of Arifides in that year : that Mardonius the King of PERSIANS Lieutenant was overthrowne by PLATES, which was many years after : but contrariwise, they finde Arifides enrolled among the Provosts immediately after Phanippus : in the year the Battell was fought at MARATHON. Now the People did most commend Arifides justice, before all his other vertues and qualities : because that vertue is most common and in use in our life, and delivereth most benefit to men. Hereof it came, that he being a meane man, obtained the worthiest name that one could have, to be called by the whole City, a just man. This surname was never desired of Kings, Princes, nor of Tyrants, but they alwaies delighted to be surnamed, some Polioretetes, to say, Conquerors of Cities : other Cerauni, to say, lightning or terrible : other Nicanores, to say Subduers : and some other, Eri and Hieracles, to say, Eagles or Faulcons, or such like Birds that prey : desiring rather (as it should appeare by those Surnames) the praise and reputation growing by force and power, then the commendation that riseth by vertue and goodnesse. Yet notwithstanding, God whom they desire most to be likened to, doth excell all humane Nature in three severall things : in Immortality, in Power, and in Vertue, of which three, Vertue is the most honourable and precious thing. For as the Naturall Philosophers reason, all the foure Elements and Vacuum, are immortal and incorruptible, and so are Force and Power, Earth-quakes, Lightning, terrible Stormes, running Rivers, and Inundations of Waters : but as for Justice and Equity, no man is partaker of them, save onely God, by meanes of reason and understanding. Therefore, because men commonly have three sundry affections of the gods : the first, that they thinke them blessed : the second, that they feare them : the third, that they reverence them : it appeareth then that they thinke them blessed, for the Eternity and Immortality of their godhead : that they feare them, because of their Omnipotency and Power : and that they love and worship them, for their Justice and Equity. And yet notwithstanding, of those three, men do covet Immortality, which no flesh can attaine unto : and also Power : which dependeth most upon Fortune : and in the meane time they leave Vertue alone, whereof the gods of their goodnesse have made us capable. But here they shew themselves fooles. For Justice maketh the life of a Nobleman, and of one in great Authority, seeme Divine and Celestiall : where without Justice, and dealing unjustly, his life is most beastly, and odious to the World. But now againe to Arifides. This Surname of a just man at the beginning, made him beloved of all the People : but afterwards it turned him to great ill will, and specially by Themistocles practice : who gave it out every where, that Arifides had overthrowne all Justice, because by consent of the parties he was ever chosen Arbitrator to end all controversies : and that by this meanes he secretly had procured the absolute Power of a King : not needing any Guard or Souldiers about him. The People moreover being growne very dissolute and licentious, by reason of the Victory of MARATHON, and seeking to have all things passe by them and their Authority, began now to dislike, and to be greatly offended, that any private man should go before the rest in good Fame and Reputation. Whereupon, they came out of all Shires of ATTICA into the City of ATHENS, and so banished Arifides with the Ostracismos : disguising the envie they bare to his Glory with the Name of feare of Tyranny. For this manner of banishment called Ostracismos, or Exostracismos, was no ordinary punishment for any fault or offence committed : but to give it an honest cloke, they said it was onely a pulling downe and tying short of too much Greatnesse and Authority, exceeding ding far the matter and countenance of a Popular State. But to tell you truly, it was none otherwise, then a gentle meane to qualifie the Peoples envie against some private person: which envie bred no malice to him whose greatnesse did offend them, but only tended to the banishing of him for ten years. But afterwards when by practice, this Ostracism banishment was laid upon meane men; and Malefactors, as upon Hyperbolus that was the last man so banished, they never after used it any more at ATHENS. And by the way it shall not be amisse to tell you here, why and wherefore this Hyperbolus was banished. Alcibiades and Nicias were the chiefeft men of ATHENS at that time, and they both were ever at square together, a common thing amongst great men. They perceiving now by the Peoples assembling, that they went about to execute the Ostracism, were marvellously afraid it was meant to banish one of them: wherefore they spake together, and made both their followers friends with each other, and joyined them in one Tribe together, inso much, when the most voyces of the People were gathered to condemne him that should be banished, they found it was Hyperbolus. The People therewith were much offended, to see the Ostracism so embased and scorned, that they never after would use it againe, and so left it off for ever. But briefly to let you understand what the Ostracism was, and after what fort they used it: ye are to know, that at a certaine day appointed, every Citizen carried a great shell in his hand, whereupon he wrote the name of him he would have banished, and brought it into a certaine place railed about with wooden bars in the Market-place. Then, when every man had brought in his shell, the Magistrates and Officers of the City did count and tell the number of them: for if there were lesse then fix thousand Citizens, that had thus brought these shells together, the Ostracism was not full and perfect. That done, they laid apart every mans name written in these shells: and whose name they found written by most Citizens, they proclaimed him by sound of Trumpet, a banished man for ten years, during which time notwithstanding, the party did enjoy all his Goods. Now every man writing thus his name in a shell, whom they would have banished: it is reported there was a plaine man of the Countrey (very simple) that could neither write nor reade, who came to Aristides (being the first man he met with) and gave him his shell, praying him to write Aristides name upon it. He being abashed withall, did aske the Countreyman, if Aristides had ever done him any displeasure. No, said the Countreyman, he never did me hurt, nor I know him not: but it grieves me to heare every man call him a just him. Aristides hearing him say so, gave him no answer, but wrote his owne name upon the shell; and delivered it againe to the Countreyman. But as he went his way out of the City, he lift up his hands to Heaven, and made a Prayer contrary to that of Achilles in Homer, beseeching the gods that the ATHENIANS might never have such troubles in hand, as they should be compelled to call for Aristides againe. Notwithstanding, within three years after, when Xerxes King of PERSIA came with his Army through the Countreys of THESSALY and BOEOTIA, and entred into the heart of the Countrey of ATTICA, the ATHENIANS revoking the Law of their Ostracism, called home againe all those they had banished, and specially, because they were afraid Aristides would take part with the barbarous People, and that his example should move many other to do the like; wherein they were greatly deceived in the nature of the man: for before that he was called home, he continually travelled up and downe, perswading and encouraging the GRECIANS to maintaine and defend their Liberty. After that Law was repealed by Proclamation, and that Themistocles was chosen the onely Lieutenant Generall of ATHENS, he did alwaies faithfully aide and assist him in all things, as well with his travell, as also with his counsell: and thereby wan his Enemies great honour, because it stood upon the safety and preservation of his Countrey. For when Eurybiades, Generall of the Army of the GRECIANS, had determined to forsake the Isle of SALAMINA, and that the Gallies of the barbarous People were come into the middest of the Seas, and had environed the Isles all about, and the mouth of the arme of the Straight of SALAMINA, before any man knew they were thus inclosed in: Aristides departing out of the Isle of Egina with a marvellous boldnesse, ventured through the middest of all the barbarous Ships and Fleete, and by good hap got in the night into Themistocles Tent, and calling him out, spake with him there in this sort: Themistocles, if we be both wise, it is high time we should now leave off this vaine envie and spight we have long time borne each other, and that we should enter into another fort of envie more honourable and profitable for us both: I meane, which of us two should do his best endeavour to save GREECE: you, by ruling and commanding all like Lieutenant Generall: and I, by counselling you the best, and executing your commandment: considering you are the man alone that will roundliest come unto the point that is best: which is in my opinion, that we should hazard Battell by Sea within the Straight of SALAMINA, and that as soone as might be possible. But if our Friends and Confederates do let this to be put in execution, I do assure you your Enemies do helpe it forward. For it is said, the Sea both before and behinde us, and round about us, is covered all over with their Ships, so as they that would not before, shall now be compelled of force, and in spight of their hearts, to fight and bestir them like men: because they are compassed in all about, and there is no passage left open for them to escape, nor to flee. Whereunto Themistocles answered: I am forry, Aristides, that herein your honesty appeareth greater then mine: but since it is so, that you have deserved the honour in beginning, and procuring such an honourable and commendable strife betweene us, I will henceforth endeavour my selfe to exceed you in continuing this your desire. After which Answer, he told Aristides, how he purposed to mocke the barbarous King, and prayed him to intreate Eurybiades to yeeld to his device, and to perswade him that there was no other way to save GREECE, but to fight by Sea: for Eurybiades gave more credit to Aristides perswasions, then he did to Themistocles words: for when all the Captaines were called to Councell, to determine whether they should give Battell, or not: one Cleocritus CORINTHIAN said to Themistocles, that his counsell did not like Aristides at all as it seemed, because he spake never a word to it being present. Aristides answered him straight, that he utterly mistooke him. For (quoth he) if I did not thinke his counsell good, I would not hold my peace as I do: but now I am mute, not for any good will I beare him, but because I finde his counsell wife and found. While the Captaines of the GRECIANS were reasoning in this sort, Aristides seeing PSYTTALEA (a little Island before SALAMINA within the Straight) full of men of Warre of their Enemies: imbarqued immediately the valiantest and lustiest Souldiers he had of all his Countrey men, into the least Foystes or Pinnaces he had among all his Gallies: and went with them, and landed in that Isle, and overthrew all the barbarous People he found there, and put them to the Sword every man, taking the chiefeft of them onely Prisoners: among which were three Sonnes of Sandaunce, the Kings Sister, whom he sent unto Themistocles. These three Lords were all slaine by the commandment of Euphrantides the Soothsayer, and sacrificed to Bacchus Omeftes, as to say, the cruell Bacchus, and eater of raw flesh, and all upon an Oracle they had received. That done, Aristides dispersed his Souldiers about the Isle, to receive all such as were by fortune of Warre, or of the Sea, cast into the Island: to the end that no Enemy of theirs should scape their hands, nor any of his friends should perish. For the greatest Fleete of all their Ships, and the sharpest encounter of the whole Battell, was about this little Island: and therefore the Tokens of Triumph were set there. After the Battell was wonne, Themistocles to seele Aristides opinion, said unto him: We have done a good piece of service, but yet there is another behinde of greater importance, and that is this: We must bring all ASIA into EUROPE, which we may easily do, if we saile with all speede to the Straight of HELLESPOINT, and go breakage the Bride the King hath made there. Then Aristides cried out, Stay there, never speake of that: but I pray you let us rather seeke all the waies we can, how to drive this barbarous King out of GREECE, lest if we keepe him in still with so great an Army (and he shall see no way before him to escape out) we drive him then to fight like a desperate man, and perill our selves, we cannot tell to what. When Themistocles had heard his opinion, he secretly sent the Eunuke Arnaeus his Prisoner, unto King Xerxes, to advertise him from him, that he had altered the GRECIANS purpose, which was fully bent to have broken up the Bridge he had made at the Straight of HELLESPOINT, to passe over his Army: and that he was the willing to let him understand it, that he might the better provide for the safety of his Person. King Xerxes being nettled with this advertisement, tooke straight his journey, and with all speed went to recover the Straight of HELLESPOINT and left Mardonius his Lieutenant Generall in GREECE, with three hundred thousand of the best Souldiers of his Army. This Mardonius was marvellously dreared of all the GRECIANS, for the wonderful great Army he had by Land, and he did threaten them also by his Letters he wrote unto them: You have (said he) with your Ships by Sea, overcome men acquainted to fight by Land, and that never handled Oare: but now, the Plaines of THESSALY, or the Fields of BOEOTIA, are very faire and large for Horsemen and Footmen to make proofe of their valiantnesse, if you will come to the Battell in the Field. He wrote Letters to the ATHENIANS, by the King his Masters commandment, of other effect, and offered them from him, to build up their City againe, to give them a great Pension, and furthermore to make them Lords of all GREECE, so they would give over, and leave off these Warres. The LACEDÆMONIANS being forthwith advertised of his Letters written to the ATHENIANS, and fearing lest they would have beene perswaded by them: sent their Ambassadors with all speed to ATHENS, to pray them to send their Wives and Children unto SPARTA, and also to offer them Victuals, to relieve their poore old People, because of the great scarcity that was at ATHENS, for that their City was burnt and razed, and all their Countrey besides destroyed by the barbarous People. The ATHENIANS having heard the offers of the Ambassadors of LACEDÆMON, made them a marvellous answer through Aristides counsell, and this it was: That they bare with the barbarous People, though they thought all things were to be sold for Gold and Silver, because they esteemed nothing more precious nor better in this World, then to be rich and wealthy: but on the other side, they were greatly offended with the LACEDÆMONIANS, that they only regarded the present poverty, and necessity of the ATHENIANS, and did forget their vertue and noble courage, thinking to make them fight more valiantly for the preservation of GREECE, by offering them Victuals to live withall. The People approving this Answer, Aristides then caused the Ambassadors of SPARTA to come to the Assembly, and commanded them to tell the LACEDÆMONIANS by word of mouth, that all the Gold above, or under the ground, could not corrupt the ATHENIANS, to make them take any summe of Money or reward, to leave the defence of the Liberty of GREECE. And to the Herauld that came from Mardonius, he shewed the Sunne, and said unto him: So long as yonder Sunne keepeth his course about the World, so long will the ATHENIANS be mortall Enemies unto the PERSIANS, because they have spoiled and destroyed all their Countrey: and have defiled and burnt the Temples of their gods. Besides, he willed that the Priests, by commandment of the People, should excommunicate and curse him that would procure them to send unto the PERSIANS to make peace with them, and to breake their League and Alliance with the other GRECIANS. Hereupon, when Mardonius came againe the second time to over-run the Countrey of ATTICA, the ATHENIANS got them againe into the Isle of SALAMINA, and then they sent Aristides Ambassadour unto the LACEDÆMONIANS. He sharply tooke them up, and reproved their sloth and negligence, because they had againe forsaken ATHENS, and left it to the spoile of the barbarous People: and prayed them yet they would look to save the rest of GREECE. The Ephori (which were certaine Officers that ruled all things within the City of SPARTA) when they had heard Aristides perswasions, straight tooke order for aide, though it appeared they did nothing all day but play, and make good cheare, keeping that day one of their Solemne Feasts they called Hyalinthia. Howbeit the next night following, they sent out five thousand Citizens borne in SPARTA, into the Field, all proper men and valiant Souldiers, every one of them carrying with him seven Ilotes (which are the Countreymen and Slaves in the Countrey of LACEDÆMONIA) not making the Ambassadors of ATHENS privie to it at all. Wherefore Aristides came againe another time into their Councell, to complaine of their negligence. But they fell a laughing, and said he dreamed, or else he mocked them: for their Army which they had sent against the strangers (for so they called the PERSIANS) was already at the City of ORKOSTION in ARCADIA. Aristides hearing their answer, replied, that they were to blame to mocke them in that sort, to send away their men so secretly, that they might not know of it: and that it was no time for them now to go about to deceive their friends, but their Enemies rather. Idomenus in his Story reporteth the matter thus in every point: notwithstanding, in the Decree that was made to send Ambassadors to SPARTA, Aristides is not named for Ambassadour, but there are other appointed: as Cimon, Xanthippus, and Mironides. Afterwards Aristides was chosen by voyces of the People, Lieutenant Generall of the Army of ATHENS, in this Warre against the PERSIANS, and went unto the Campe of the GRECIANS by the City of PLATÆES, with eight thousand Footmen well armed and appointed. There he found King Pausanias the onely Generall of all the whole Power and Army of the GRECIANS, who brought with him the force of SPARTA: and there came daily into his Campe one after another, a marvellous great multitude of other GRECIANS. Now touching the Army of the barbarous People, they incamped all along the River of ASOPUS: but because their Campe stretched out a marvellous way in length, they were not intrenched at all, but had onely fortified a piece of ground four square with a wall about, which was ten furlongs on every side, to place all their carriage and chieftest things in. And for the GRECIANS againe, the Soothsayer Tisamenus, borne in the City of ELIDE, had told Pausanias, and all the GRECIANS together, that they should have the Victory, so they did not assault at all, but onely defend. And Aristides, that had sent to the Oracle of Apollo at DELPHES, in the name of the ATHENIANS, had answer: They should overcome their Enemies, so they did sacrifice and make speciall Prayers unto Jupiter and Juno of Mount CITHÆRON, unto Pan, and unto the Nymphs Sphragitides, and also unto the demy-gods, Androcrates, Leucon, Pisander, Damocrates, Hypion, Adæon, and Polydus: and so that they did hazard Battell also within their owne Territories, and in the Plaine of Ceres Eleusian, and of Proserpina. This Oracle troubled Aristides marvellously, because the demy-gods whom they had commandement to do Sacrifice unto, were the Founders and Ancestors of the PLATÆIANS: and the Cave of the Nymphs Sphragitides, is one of the tops of the Mount CITHÆRON, looking towards the West, where the Sunne setteth in Sommer. They say there was an Oracle there in old time, whose spirit possessed many Inhabitants thereofabouts, and bestraught them of their wits: whereupon, they called those so possessed, Nympholepti, as who would say, taken with the Nymphs. And againe, to tell the ATHENIANS they should have the Victory, so they did hazard Battell in the Plaine of Ceres Eleusian, and within their owne Territory: it was even to send them backe againe into the Countrey of ATTICA. Aristides being thus perplexed, Arminestus Captaine of the PLATÆIANS, had such a Vision in the night in his sleepe. He thought, that Jupiter the Saviour did appeare unto him, and asked him what the GRECIANS intended to do? and that he answered: My Lord, we must to morrow remove our Campe into the Territories of ELEUSIN, and there we will fight with the barbarous People, according to the commandement the Oracle of Apollo hath given us. Then that Jupiter replied, that they were greatly deceived: for all that Apollo had declared by his Oracle was meant within the Territories of the PLATÆIANS, and that they should finde it true, if they considered it well. Arminestus having plainly scene this Vision in his sleepe, when he did awake in the morning, he straight sent for the oldest Citizens, and considering with them where this place should be; he found at the length, that at the foot of Mount CITHÆRON, by the City of NYSSIA, there was an old Temple they called the Temple of Ceres Eleusian, and of her Daughter Proserpina. When he heard them say so, he went straight and told Aristides of it, and found that it was an excellent place to set an Army in Battell ray, that had but few Horsemen: for that the foote of Mount CITHÆRON did lett the Horsemen, they could not go to the place where the Temple stood, and where the Plaine and Valley did end: besides also, that the Chappell of Androcrates was even in that place, which was all hidden with thick Wood round about it. And because they should lacke nothing to hinder the expresse commandement of the Oracle for hope of Victory, the PLATÆIANS (through Arminestus counsell and advice) made a common Decree, that the Confines of the City of PLATÆES should be taken away towards ATHENS side, and that the Land thereof should be given clearly unto the ATHENIANS, because they should fight with the barbarous People in their own Land, for the defence and preservation of GREECE according to the commandement of the Oracle. This noble Gift and Present of the PLATÆIANS was so famous, as many years after, King Alexander the Great having conquered the Empire of ASIA, built up the Walls againe of the City of PLATÆES, and when he had done, made a Herald openly proclaime it at the Games Olympicall, that Alexander had done the PLATÆIANS that honour and dignity, for a memoriall and honour of their magnanimity; because in the Warre against the PERSIANS, they had freely and liberally given away their Land unto the ATHENIANS, for the safety of the GRECIANS: and

and hath shewed themselves of a noble courage also, and very willing to defend the state of GREECE. Now when the Army of the GRECIANS came to be set in order of Battell, there fell a strife betweene the ATHENIANS and the TEGEATES, because the ATHENIANS would needs (according to their old custome) have the left Wing of the Battell, if the LACEDÆMONIANS had the right Wing: and the TEGEATES on the contrary part, would have the preheminence before the ATHENIANS, alleging the famous Acts and notable Service of their Ancestors in former Warres, whereupon the ATHENIANS did mutiny. But Aristides slept betweene them, and told them, that it was no time now to contend with the TEGEATES about their Nobility and Valiantesse: and as for you, my Lords of SPARTA (said he) and you also my Masters of GREECE: we tell you, that the place neither giveth nor taketh vertue away, and we do assure you, that wheresoever you place us, we will go to defend and keepe it, as we will not impair nor blemish the honour we have wonne in former foughten Battels and gotten Victories. For we are not come hither to quarrell and fall out with our friends, but to fight with our common Enemies, nor to brag of our Ancestors doings, but to shew our selves valiant in defence of all GREECE. For this Battell will make good proofe of all the GRECIANS, how much estimation every City, every Captaine, and particular person will deserve for his part. When Aristides had spoken, the Captaines and all other of the Councell concluded in favour of the ATHENIANS, that they should have one of the Wings of the Battell. But by this means all GREECE stood in marvellous garboile at that time, and the State of the ATHENIANS specially in great danger. For a number of the noblest Citizens of ATHENS, and that brought great substance with them to the Warres, being now at low state, and in poverty, their Goods being spent and gone, and seeing themselves discountenanced, not bearing that Rule and Authority in the Common-wealth they were wont to do, because other were called to Authority, and preferred to the Offices of the City: they gathered together, and met at a house in the City of PLATÆES, and there conspired to overthrow the Authority of the People at ATHENS: and if they could not obtaine their purpose, then that they would rather lose all, and betray their Countrey unto the barbarous People. While these things were practised in the Campe, many being of the Conspiracy, Aristides came to an inckling of it, and was marvellously afraid, because of the time: wherefore he began to be careful of the matter, being of such importance as it was, and yet would not be curious to understand the whole Conspiracy, little knowing what a number might be drawne into this Treason, if it were narrowly looked into, but rather respected that which was just, then what was profitable for the time. So he caused eight persons onely of the great number to be apprehended, and of these eight, the two first whom they would have indicted as Principals, and were most to be burdened for the Conspiracy, Eschines of the Towne of LAMPARA, and Egefus of the Towne of ACHARNA, they found meanes to flie out of the Campe, and to save themselves. And for the other, Aristides let them at liberty, and gave them occasion that were not discovered, to be bold, and to repent them of their follies: saying, that the Battell should be their Judge, where they should purge themselves of all accusations laid against them, and shew the World also, that they never had any other intention but honest and good, towards their Countrey. Mardonius, to prove the courage of the GRECIANS, had sent all his Horsemen (wherein he was far stronger then the GRECIANS) to skirmish with them. Who were lodged at the foote of Mount CITHÆRON, in strong places and full of stones, saving the three thousand MEGARIANS, that camped in the Plaine: by reason whereof, they were sore troubled and hurt, by the Horsemen of the barbarous People that set upon them on every side, for they might charge them where they would. Insomuch, in the end, perceiving they alone could no longer resist the force of so great a multitude of the barbarous People, they sent with all speed possible to Pausanias, to pray him to send them present aide. Pausanias hearing this news, and seeing in his owne sight the Campe of the MEGARIANS almost covered with Shot and Darts which the barbarous People threw at them, and that they were compelled to stand close together in a little corner: he wist not what to do. For to go thither in person with the LACEDÆMONIANS that were Footmen heave armed, he thought that was no way to helpe them. So he proved to put some ambitious desire and envie of honour, among the private Captaines and Generals of the Army of the other GRECIANS, which were then about him: to see if he could move any mans courage and desire, to offer himselfe willingly to aide the MEGARIANS. Howbeit they had all deafe eares, but Aristides, who promised to go in the name of the ATHENIANS, and brought Olympiodorus into the Field (one of the valiantest Captaines that served under him) with his Company of three hundred chosen men, and certaine Shot mingled amongst them. These Souldiers were ready in a moment, and marched straight in Battell ray, a great pace towards the barbarous People. Masistius, that was Generall of the Horsemen of the PERSIANS, a goodly tall man, perceiving their coming towards him: turned his Horse, and galloped to them. The ATHENIANS tarried him, and kept their ground, and the encounter was very hot, because both the one and the other side did the best they could at this first onset to put the rest of the Battell in jeopardy: and they fought so long, that Masistius Horse was shot through the body with an Arrow, that put him to such paine, as he never left flinging, till he cast his Master on the ground, armed as he was at all peeces. So being on the ground, he could not rise againe, as well for the weight of his Armour, as for that the ATHENIANS came so suddenly upon him. And notwithstanding there were many about him to hew him in pieces, yet they could finde no way how to kill him, he was so thoroughly armed and loaden with Gold, Copper, and Iron, not onely upon his body and his head, but also on his legs and armes: untill at the length there was one that thrust the head of his Dart through his Bever, and so killed him.

The PERSIANS perceiving that, fled immediately, and forooke the body of their Generall. Shortly after it appeared to the GRECIANS, that they had sped well at this Skirmish, not because they had slaine many Enemies, but for the great lamentation the barbarous People made for the losse of Maffius. For his death did so grieve them, that they polled themselves, they clipped off their Horfe and Moyles haire, and filled besides all the Field thereabouts with pitfull cries and shriekes, as those that had lost the valiantest and chiefeft man of Authority of all their Campe, next unto Mardonius the Kings Lieutenant. After this first Skirmish, both the one and the other side kept their Campe, and would not come into the Field many daies after: for the Soothsayers did promise both sides the Victory, as much the PERSIANS, as the GRECIANS, so they did but only defend: and contrariwise, they did threaten them to be overthrowne, that did assault. But Mardonius finding Victuals waxed scant, and that they were stored but for few daies, and moreover how the GRECIANS daily grew stronger by continuall repaire to their Campe, the longer he delayed: in the end he resolved to tarry no longer, but to passe the River Asopus the next morning by breake of the day, and suddenly to set upon the GRECIANS. So he gave the Captaines warning the night before what they should do, because every man should be ready. But about midnight there came a Horseman without any noise at all, so neare to the GRECIANS Campe, that he spake to the Watch, and told them he would speake with Aristides Generall of the ATHENIANS. Aristides was called for straight, and when he came to him, the Horseman said unto Aristides: I am Alexander King of Macedon, who for the long and great good will I beare you, have put my selfe in the greatest danger that may be, to come at this present time to advertise you, that to morrow morning Mardonius will give you Battell: because your Enemies sudden coming upon you, should not make you afraid, being suddenly charged, and should not hinder also your valiant fighting. For it is no new hope that is come to Mardonius, that makes him to fight, but onely scarcity of Victuals that forceth him to do it, considering that the Prognosticators are all against it, that he should give you Battell, both by reason of the ill tokens of their Sacrifices, as also by the answers of their Oracles, which hath put all the Army in a marvellous feare, and stand in no good hope at all. Thus he is forced to put all at a venture, or else if he will needs lie still, to be starved to death for very famine. After King Alexander had imparted this secret to Aristides, he prayed him to keepe it to himselfe, and to remember it in time to come. Aristides answered him then, that it was no reason he should keepe a matter of so great importance as that from Pausanias, who was the Lieutenant Generall of their whole Army: notwithstanding, he promised him he would tell it no man else before the Battell, and that if the gods gave the GRECIANS the Victory, he did assure him, they should all acknowledge his great favour and good will shewed unto them. After they had talked thus together, King Alexander left him, and returned backe againe: and Aristides also went immediately to Pausanias Tent, and told him the talke King Alexander and he had together. Thereupon the private Captaines were sent for straight to Councell, and there order was given, that every man should have his Bands ready, for they should fight in the morning. So Pausanias at that time (as Herodotus writeth) said unto Aristides, that he would remove the ATHENIANS from the left to the right Wing, because they should have the PERSIANS themselves right before them, and that they should fight so much the lustier, both for that they were acquainted with their fight, as also because they had overcome them before in the first encounter: and that himselfe would take the left Wing of the Battell, where he should encounter with the GRECIANS that fought on the PERSIANS side. But when all the other private Captaines of the ATHENIANS understood it, they were marvellous angry with Pausanias, and said he did them wrong, and had no reason to let all the other GRECIANS keepe their place where they were alwaies appointed, and onely to remove them, as if they were Slaves, to be appointed at his pleasure, now on the one side, then on the other, and to set them in fight with the valiantest Souldiers they had of all their Enemies. Then said Aristides to them, that they knew not what they said, and how before they misliked, and did strive with the TEGEATES, onely for having the left Wing of the Battell; and when it was granted, they thought themselves greatly honoured that they were preferred before them, by order of the Captaines: and now where the LACEDÆMONIANS were willing of themselves to give them the place of the right Wing, and did in manner offer them the preheminance of the whole Army: they do not thankfully take the honour offered them, nor yet do reckon of the vantage and benefit given them to fight against the PERSIANS selves, their ancient Enemies, and not against their naturall Countreyemen anciently defended of them. When Aristides had used all these perswasions unto them, they were very well contented to change place with the LACEDÆMONIANS: and then all the talke among them was to encourage one another, and to tell them that the PERSIANS that came against them, had no better hearts nor Weapons, then those whom they before had overcome, in the Plaine of MARATHON. For said they, they have the same Bowes, the same rich imbroidered Gownes, the same golden Chaines and Carcanets of womanish persons, hanging on their cowardly bodies and faint hearts: where we have also the same Weapons and bodies we had, and our hearts more lively and courageous then before, through the sundry Victories we have since gotten of them. Further, we have this advantage more, that we do not fight as our other Confederates the GRECIANS do, for our City and Countrey onely, but also to continue the Fame and Renowne of our former noble service, which we wanne at the Journeys of MARATHON and of SELEMINA: to the end, the World should not thinke that the Glory of these Triumphs and Victories was due unto Aristides onely, or unto Fortune, but unto the courage and worthinesse of the ATHENIANS.

Thus

The Treason
of the Thebans

Thus were the GRECIANS throughly occupied to change the order of their Battell in haste. The THEBANS on the other side that tooke part with Mardonius, receiving intelligence of the altering of their Battell, by Traytors that ranne betwene both Campes, they straight told Mardonius of it. He thereupon did suddenly also change the order of his Battell, and placed the right Wing of the PERSIANS against the left Wing of his Enemies: either because he was afraid of the ATHENIANS, or else for greater glory, that he had a desire to fight with the LACEDÆMONIANS, and commanded the GRECIANS that tooke his part, that they should fight against the ATHENIANS. This alteration was so openly done, that every man might see it: whereupon Pausanias removed the LACEDÆMONIANS againe, and set them in the right Wing. Mardonius seeing that, removed the PERSIANS againe from the right Wing, and brought them to the left Wing (where they were before) against the LACEDÆMONIANS: and thus they consumed all that day in changing their men to and fro. So the Captaines of the GRECIANS fate in Councell at night, and there they agreed, that they must needs remove their Campe, and lodge in some other place where they might have water at commandement: because their Enemies did continually trouble and spoile that water they had about them, with their Horses. Now when night came, the Captaines would have marched away with their men, to go to the lodging they had appointed: but the People went very ill willing, and they had much ado to keepe them together. For they were no sooner out of the Trenches and Fortifications of their Campe, but the most part of them ranne to the City of PLATEES, and were marvellously out of order, dispersing themselves here and there, and set up their Tents where they thought good, before the places were appointed for them: and there were none that tarried behinde, but the LACEDÆMONIANS onely, and that was against their wills: for one of their Captaines called Amompharetus, a marvellous hardy man, that feared no danger, and longed sore for Battell, he was in such a rage with these trifling delays, that he cried it out in the Campe, that this removing was a goodly running away, and sware he would not from thence, but would there tarry Mardonius coming with his Company. Pausanias went to him, and told him he must do that the other GRECIANS had consented to in Councell, by most voyces. But Amompharetus tooke a great stone in his hands, and threw it downe at Pausanias feete, and told him, There is the signe I give to conclude Battell, and I passe not for all your cowardly conclusions. Amompharetus stubbornnesse did so amaze Pausanias, that he was at his wits end. So he went unto the ATHENIANS that were onwards on their way, to pray them to tarry for him, that they might go together, and therewithall made the rest of his men to march towards the City of PLATEES, supposing thereby to have drawne Amompharetus to have followed him, or else to let him remaine alone behinde. But in trifling thus, the day brake: and Mardonius understanding that the GRECIANS did forsake their first lodging, he made his Army presently march in Battell ray to set upon the LACEDÆMONIANS. So the barbarous People made great shouts and cries, not thinking to go fight, but to sacke and spoile the GRECIANS flying away, as indeede they did little better. For, Pausanias seeing the countenance of his Enemies, made his Ensignes to stay, and commanded every man to prepare to fight: but he forgot to give the GRECIANS the signal of the Battell, either for the anger he tooke against Amompharetus, or for the sudden onser of the Enemies, which made them that they came not in fraight, nor all together to the Battell after it was begun, but stragling in small Companies, some here, and some there. In the meane time, Pausanias was busie in sacrificing to the gods, and seeing that the first Sacrifices were not acceptable unto them, by the Soothsayers observations they made, he commanded the SPARTANS to throw their Targets at their feete, and not to stir out of their places, but onely to do as he bade them, without resisting their Enemies. When he had given this straight order, he went againe and did Sacrifice, when the Horsemen of the Enemies were at hand, and that their Arrows flew amongst the thickest of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and did hurt divers of them, and specially poore Callicrates among the rest, that was one of the goodliest men in all the GRECIANS Host and Army. He having his deaths wound with an Arrow, before he gave up the ghost, said, His death did not grieve him, because he came out of his Countrey to die for the defence of GREECE: but it grieved him to die so cowardly, having given the Enemy never a blow. His death was marvellous lamentable, and the constancy of the SPARTANS wonderfull: for they never stirred out of their places, nor made any countenance to defend themselves against their Enemies that came upon them, but suffered themselves to be thrust through with Arrows, and slaine in the Field, looking for the houre the gods would appoint them, and that their Captaines would command them to fight. Some write also, that as Pausanias was at his Prayers, and doing Sacrifice unto the gods a little behinde the Battell, certaine of the LYDIANS came upon him, and overthrow and tooke away all his Sacrifice: and that Pausanias, and those that were about him (having no other Weapons in their hands) drave them away with force of Staves and Whips. In memory whereof, they say there is a solemne Procession kept at SPARTA on that day, which they call the LYDIANS Procession, where they whip and beate young Boyes about the Altar. Then was Pausanias in great distresse, to see the Priests offer Sacrifice upon Sacrifice, and that not one of them pleased the gods: at the last he turned his eyes to the Temple of Juno, and wept, and holding up his hands, besought Juno Citharon, and all the other gods (Patrons and Protectors of the Countrey of the PLATEIANS) that if it were not the will of the gods the GRECIANS should have the victory, yet that the Conquerors at the least should buy their deaths dearly, and that they should finde they fought against valiant men, and worthy Souldiers. Pausanias had no sooner ended his Prayer, but the Sacrifices fell out very favourable, infirmuch as the Priests and Soothsayers came to promise him victory. Thereupon, he straight gave commandment to march toward the Enemy, which flew from man to man incontinently that they should march. So as he that had scene the Squadron of the LACEDÆMONIANS, would have said it had beene like the body of a fierce Beast raising up the bristles, preparing to fight. Then the barbarous People saw they should have hot Battell, and that they should meete with men that would fight it out to the death: wherefore they covered their bodies with great Targets after the PERSIAN fashion, and bestowed their Arrows lustily upon the LACEDÆMONIANS, but they keeping close together, and covering themselves with their Shields, marched on still upon them, untill they came to joyne with the Enemy so lustily, that they made their Targets flie out of their hands with the terrible thrusts and blowes of the Pikes and Spears upon their breasts, and overthrow their faces, that they slew many of them, and laid them on the ground. For all that, they did not cowardly, but tooke the LACEDÆMONIANS Pikes and Spears in their bare hands, and brake them in two by strength of their armes: and then they quickly pluckt out their Cimeters and Axes, and lustily laid about them, and wrung the LACEDÆMONIANS Shields out of their hands by force, and fought it out with them a great while hand to hand. Now whilst the LACEDÆMONIANS were busily fighting with the barbarous People, the ATHENIANS stood still imbatell'd far off, and kept their ground. But when they saw the LACEDÆMONIANS tarry so long, and that they came not, and heard a marvellous noise of men as though they were fighting, and besides that there came a speedy Messenger unto them sent from Pananius, to let them understand they were fighting: then they marched with all speede they could to helpe them. But as they were coming on a great pace over the Plaine, unto that part where they heard the noise, the GRECIANS that were on Mardonius side came against them. Aristides seeing them coming towards them, went a good way before his Company, and cried out as loud as he could for life, and conjured the GRECIANS in the name of the gods, the Protectors of GREECE, to leave off these Warres, and not to trouble the ATHENIANS that were going to helpe them that ventured their lives, to defend the Common-wealth and safety of all GREECE. But when he saw they would needs fight for any request and conjuration he could use, and that they came still upon them, bending themselves to give Charge: then he stayed his going to relieve the LACEDÆMONIANS, and was compelled to make head against those that set upon him and his Company, they being about fifty thousand men; of the which, the most part notwithstanding went their waies, and left the Army, specially when they understood the PERSIANS were overthrowne and fled. The fury of the Battell and cruellest Fight (as they say) was where the THEBANS were: because the Nobility and chiefeest men of the Countrey fought very earnestly for the PERSIANS, but the People refused, being led by a small number of the Nobility that commanded them. So they fought that day in two places, the LACEDÆMONIANS being the first that overthrow the PERSIANS, and made them flie: and they flew Mardonius the Kings Lieutenant, with a blow of a stone one Arimnestus a SPARTAN gave him upon his head, rightly as the Oracle of Amphiarus had prophesied before unto him. For Mardonius before the Battell had sent thither a LYDIAN, and a CARIAN unto the Oracle of Throponius, of the which the Prophet made answer unto the CARIAN, in the CARIAN Tongue: and the man of LYDIA lay within the Sanctuary of Amphiarus, where he thought in his dreame that one of the Priests of the Temple willed him to go out of the place he was in, and he denying it, the Priest tooke a great stone and threw it at his head, and so thought he was slaine with the blow. And thus it is written. And furthermore, the LACEDÆMONIANS did chase the PERSIANS flying into their Fortifications they had in a Wood: and the ATHENIANS also shortly after overthrow the THEBANS, whereof they slew in the Field three hundred of the noblest and chiefeest of them. Foreven as the THEBANS began to turne taile, news came unto the ATHENIANS, that the PERSIANS had intrenched themselves within their Fort and strength in the Wood, where the LACEDÆMONIANS did besiege them. The ATHENIANS suffered the GRECIANS that fled to save themselves, and they went to helpe the LACEDÆMONIANS, to take the Fort of the barbarous People: who went before but slenderly about it, because they had no experience to make an assault, nor force upon a wall. But so soon as the ATHENIANS came in to them, they straight took it by assault, and made great slaughter of the PERSIANS and barbarous People. For of three hundred thousand fighting men that Mardonius had in his Campe, there were saved only but forty thousand, led under Artabazus: and of the GRECIANS side there were not slaine above thirteene hundred and threescore in all; amongst which also there were two and fifty ATHENIANS, all of the Tribe of Eantides, the which had done more valiantly that day then any other Tribe, as Clidemus writeth. And this is the cause why the Eantides made a solemne Sacrifice unto the Nymphs Sphragitides, at the common charge, according to the order given them by the Oracle of Apollo, to give them thanks for this Victory. Of the LACEDÆMONIANS there died fourscore and eleven: and of the THEBATES sixteene. But I marvell, Herodorus saith, that none but these People onely fought in that Journey against the barbarous Nation, and no other GRECIANS besides: for the number of the dead bodies, and their graves also do shew that it was a generall Victory and Exploit of all the GRECIANS together. And moreover, if there had beene but these three People onely that had fought against them, and that all the rest had stood and looked on, and done nothing: sure there had been no such Epigram as this engraven upon the Altar or Tombe that was set up in the place of the Battell:

When the victorious Greekes, had driven out of their Land
The Persians by force of Armes, Which long did them withstand,

They

They built to mighty Jove, this holy Altar here,
And made it common for all Greece, as plainly may appeare,
In guerdon of the good, which he did them restore,
In guerdon of their liberty, which lik'd them evermore.

This Battell was fought the fourth day of the Month which the ATHENIANS call Bædromion, that is, about the Month of July: or after the BOEOTIANS account, the fix and twentieth of the Month they call Paumemus, on which day there is kept a common Assembly of the Estates of GREECE, in the City of PLATAEAE, where the PLATAEANS make a solemne Sacrifice unto Jupiter, Protector of their Liberty, to give him thanks alwaies for this Victory. It is no marvell that there was such difference then betwixt the moneths and daies; considering that even now when Astronomy is more perfectly understood then it was then, some do yet begin and end their Moneths at one day, and some at another. After this great Battell and Overthrow of the barbarous People, there arose a great strife betwixt the ATHENIANS and the LACEDÆMONIANS, touching the reward and honour of the Victory. For the ATHENIANS would not give place unto the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor suffer them to set up any Tokens or Signes of Triumph. Whereupon the GRECIANS running to Armes in mutiny together, by this occasion they had almost spoiled one another: had not Aristides through his wisdom and wise persuasions, stayed and quiered the other Captaines his Companions, and specially one Leocrates and Myrmitides, whom he wanne with such discrete and gentle words, that they were contented to refer it wholly unto the Arbitrement and Judgement of the other People of GREECE. So the GRECIANS met in the same place together, purposely to decide their Controversies. In this Councell holden there, Theogiton a Captaine of the MEGARIANS, said for his opinion, that to avoid the civill Warre might grow betwixt the GRECIANS upon this quarrell: he thought it more requisite, to appoint over the reward and honour of this Victory unto some other City, then to any of the two that fell out about it. After him rose up Cleocritus CORINTHIAN, seeming to every man there that he would have requested this honour for the City of CORINTH, being indeede the third City in estimation of all GREECE, next unto SPARTA and ATHENS: howbeit he made an Oration in commendation of the PLATAEANS, which was marvellously liked, and well thought of by every man: for his opinion went flatly with the PLATAEANS, that to end this strife, they should give the honour of this Victory unto the City of PLATAEAE, and so would neither of both parties be angry that they should be honoured. Upon his words Aristides first agreed on the ATHENIANS behalfe, and then Pananius for the LACEDÆMONIANS. That the PLATAEANS should have the Reward. Now they both being agreed, before the spoile was divided betwixt them, they set aside fourescore Talents that were given to the PLATAEANS, with they which they built a Temple unto Minerva, and gave her an Image, and set out all her Temple with Pictures that remaine whole until this day: and the LACEDÆMONIANS notwithstanding, did set up their tokens of Victorie by themselves, and the ATHENIANS theirs also by themselves. So the sending unto the Oracle of Apollo in the City of DELPHES, to know unto what gods, and how they should do sacrifice: Apollo answered them, that they should build up an Altar unto Jupiter, Protector of their liberty; howbeit that they should put no sacrifice upon it, untill they had first put out all the fire through the whole Countrey, because it had been polluted and defiled by the Barbarous People: and then, that they should fetch pure and cleane fire at the common Altar, whereon they do sacrifice unto Apollo Pythias, in the City of DELPHES. This answer being delivered, The great Lords and Officers of GREECE went through all the Countrey to put out the fire every where. And there was a man of the same City of PLATAEAE at that time called Euchidas, that came and offered himselfe, and promised he would bring them fire from the Temple of Apollo Pythias, with all possible speed that might be. So when he came to the City of DELPHES, after he had sprinkled and purified his body with cleane Water, he put a Crowne of Laurell upon his Head, and went in that manner to take fire from the Altar of Apollo. When he had done, he bled him againe as fast he could runne for life, unto the City of PLATAEAE, and came thither before the Sunne was set, having come and gone that day a thousand furlongs. But after he had saluted his Citizens, and delivered them the fire he brought, he fell down dead at their feet, and gave up the Ghost. The PLATAEANS lift him up starke dead, and buried him in the Temple of Diana Euclia, to say, of good renowne: and caused afterwards this Epitaph following to be graven upon his Tombe.

Engraved here doth lye, Euchidas speedy man,
Who in one day both too and fro, to Delphes lightly ranne:
Even from this self same place, which thou dost here behold, Such haste, post haste, he swiftly made; thereof thou maist be bold.

Many thinke that this goddesse Euclia is Diana, and so they call her. But other hold opinion she was the Daughter of Hercules, and Myro the Nymph Menatius Daughter, and Patroclus siter, that died a Virgin, and was honoured afterwards as a goddesse of the BOEOTIANS, and of the LOCRIANS. For in all their Cities and Towns in open places, they finde an Altar and Image dedicated unto her: and all that are married, do sacrifice to her upon that Altar. Afterwards there was a Generall councill holden by all the GRECIANS, in the which Aristides made a motion that all the Cities of GREECE should yearely send their deputies at a certaine day appointed unto the City of PLATAEAE, there to make their prayers and sacrifices unto the gods: and that from five years, to five years, they should celebrate common Games, that should be called the Games of Liberty: and that they should also leave through all the Provinces of Greece, for maintenance of the Warres against the Persians and barbarous People, ten thousand Footmen, a thousand Horsemen, and a Fleete of an hundred Saile. Also that the Platæians thenceforth should be taken for devout and holy men, and that no man should be so hardy as to hurt or offend them; and that they should onely tend the Sacrifices unto the gods, for the health and prosperitie of Greece. All which Articles were enacted in forme and manner aforesaid, and the Platæians bound themselves yearly to keepe solemne Sacrifices and Aniverfaries for the Soules of the Grecians that were slain in their Territories, fighting for defence of the liberty of the Grecians. And this they observe yet unto this day in this sort. The sixteenth day of the Moneth of Memalierion (which the Boeotians call Alalcomenies, and is about the Moneth of January) they go a Procession, and before the Procession goeth a Trumpeter that soundeth the Alarum: Then there follow certaine Chariots loaden with branches of Firre-tree, and with Nesegayes and Garlands of Triumph: then a blacke Bull, and certaine young Gentlemen noble mens Sonnes, that carry great Cawdrons with two eares full of Wine and Milke, such as they use to poure upon the Graves of dead men for propitiatory Oblations; and other young Boyes free borne, that carry Oyles, Perfumes, and other sweete Odours in Viall Glasses: for no Servant or Bondman may lawfully be admitted to have any Office about this Mystery, for that those whose Memory they honour, died all fighting for defence of the Liberty of Greece. After all this shew, followeth the Provost of the Platæians for that time being, last of all: who may not all the rest of the yeare besides, so much as touch any Iron, nor weare any other coloured Gowne but white. Howbeit then he weareth on a Purple-coloured Coate, and holdeth a Funerall Pot in one of his hands, which he taketh in the Towne-House, and a naked Sword in the other hand, and so goeth through the City in this sort after all the Pompe aforesaid, unto the Church-yard where all their Graves be that were slain at that Battell. So when he cometh thither, he draweth Water out of a Well that is there, and with the same he washeth the fouresquare Pillars and Images that stand upon those Tombes, and then anointeth them with Oyles and sweete Savours: afterwards, he sacrificeth a Bull, and layeth him upon a heape of Woode hard by him, as they do when they burne the bodies of dead men; and making certaine Prayers and Petitions unto Jupiter and Mercury, gods of the Earth, he doth solemnly invite the Soules of those valiant men that died fighting for the liberty of Greece, unto the Feast of the Funerall Sacrifice. Then he taking a Cup full of Wine in his hand, and spilling it all upon their Tombes, he speaketh these words aloud: I drinke to the worthy and valiant men, that died sometime in defence of the Liberty of Greece. This solemne Ceremoney and Aniverfary, the Platæians do duly observe unto this present day. Now when the Athenians were returned to Athens, Aristides perceiving the People were bent to establish a Popular State, where the People might beare the whole Rule and Authority, judging them well worthy to be considered of, in respect of their noble Service and valiant courage they had shewed in this Warre: and considering also that they would hardly be brought to like of any other Government, being yet in Armes, and very stout, by reason of the famous Victories they had obtained: he caused a Law to be made, that all Authority of Government should runne in equality among the Citizens, and that thenceforth all Burgeses (as well poore as rich) should be chosen by voyces of the People, and promoted to Offices within the City. And moreover, when Themistocles told in open Assembly, that he had a thing in his head, would be grealy to the profit and commodity of the State, but yet it was not to be spoken openly for divers respects: the People willed him to tell it unto Aristides onely, and to take his advice in it, to know whether it was meete to be done, or not. Then Themistocles told him secretly between them, that he thought to set the Arcenall on fire, where all the Grecians Ships lay: alleading, that by this means the Athenians should be the greatest men of Power in all Greece. Aristides hearing that, without any more, came presently to the People againe, and told the whole Councell openly, that nothing could be more profitable indeede for the whole Common-wealth, and which more wicked and unjust, then that Themistocles thought good to do. When the People heard Aristides Answer, they willed Themistocles to let his device alone whatsoever it were: so great Justicers were the Athenians, and so much did they trust Aristides wisdom and equity besides. So they made Aristides afterwards Generall of the Army of the Athenians together with Cimon, and sent them to make Warre against the barbarous People. Aristides at his coming thither, seeing Pausanias, and the other Captaines that were Generals over the whole Army, dealing hardly and churlishly with the People their Confederates, he on the contrary side, spake gently unto them, and shewed himselfe as courteous and familiar to them as he could possible, making his companion also familiar to all, and just to every body, not oppressing some to ease other, in defraying the charges of the Warres. Aristides taking this course, it was not noted how by little and little he cut off the Rule and Authority of the Lacedæmonians in Greece, not by force of Armes, nor by Ships, nor by numbers of Horses, but onely by his grave and wise Government. For if the Justice and Vertue of Aristides, and the mildnesse and courtesie of Cimon, made the Government of the Athenians to be liked of and accepted of all the other People of Greece: the covetousnesse, pride and fiercenesse of Pausanias, made it much more to be disliked. For Pausanias never spake unto the other Captaines of the People, Allies, and Confederates, but it was ever in choler, and he was too sharpe with them: and for the poore private Souldiers, he would cause them to be cruelly whipped for every small offence, or else make them stand a whole day day together on their feete, laying a heave iron Anker upon their shoulders. No man durst go forrage, neither for Straw, nor Reeds to make them Couches of, nor durst water their Horse before the Spartans: for he had set Scouts for them to whip them home, that went out before them. And one day when Aristides thought to have spoken to him, and to have told him something, he frowned upon him: and said he had no leisure to speake with him now, and so would not heare him: whereupon the Captaines of the other Grecians, and specially those of Chio, of Samos, and of Lesbos, did afterwards follow Aristides, and perswaded him to take upon him the charge and Authority to command the other People of Greece, and to take into his protection the Allies and Confederates of the same, who long fithence wished to revolt from the Government of the Lacedæmonians, and onely to submit themselves unto the Athenians. Aristides answered them thus: that they had not onely reason to do that they said, but that they were also constrained to do it. Notwithstanding, because the Athenians might have good ground and assurance of their undoubted fidelity and good service, they should deliver them manifest testimony and assurance thereof, by some famous act attempted against the Lacedæmonians, whereby their People hereafter durst never fall from the League of the Athenians. Uliades SAMIAN, and Antagoras of Chio hearing him say so, both Captaines of Gallies confedered together: they went one day to set upon the Admirall Galley of Pausanias, hard by Bizantium, the one of the one side of her, and the other on the other side, as she was rowing before all the Fleete. Pausanias seeing them, stood up straight in a marvellous rage against them, and threatened them that before it were long he would make them know, they had beene better to have assaulted their owne naturall Countrey, then to have set upon him as they had done. But they answered him, and bade him get him away quickly if he were wise, and let him thanke Fortune hardly, that granted the Grecians victory at the Battell of Platæa under his leading: and that it was nothing else but the onely reverence and respect of the same, that had made the Grecians hold their hands till now, from giving him that just punishment his pride and arrogancy had deserved. So the end was, they left the Lacedæmonians, and stucke unto the Athenians: wherein was easily discerned the great courage and wonderfull magnanimity of the Lacedæmonians. For when they saw their Captaines were marred and corrupted, through the over-great Authority and liberty they had, they willingly gave up their commandment over the other Grecians, and did no more send their Captaines to be Generals of the whole Army of Greece: thinking it better for their Citizens, that they should be obedient, and in every point observe the Discipline and Law of their Countrey, then if they had beene otherwise the onely Rulers and Lords over the whole Countrey. Now at what time the Lacedæmonians did command all Greece, as Lords, the Cities and People of Greece did pay a certaine summe of Money, towards defraying of the charges of the Warres against the barbarous People. But after that their Seigniority and Rule was taken from them, the Grecians were contented a Taxe should be levied, and that every City should be reasonably fessed, according to their wealth and ability: because every City might know what they should pay. And for this purpose, they prayed the Athenians they would appoint Aristides to take order for it, unto whom they gave full Power and Authority to taxe and fesse every City indifferently, considering the greatnesse of the Territory, and the Revenues of the same, as every one was reasonably able to beare it. But if Aristides were poore when he entred into that great charge and Office of Authority, wherein all Greece in manner did refer themselves unto his discretion: he came out of that Office more poore, and had made his Assessment and Taxation not only justly and truly, but also so indifferently according unto every mans ability, that there was no man could finde fault with his doings. And like as the ancient men in old time did celebrate and sing out the blessednesse of those that lived under the Reigne of Saturne, which they called the Golden Age: even so did the People and Confederates of the Athenians afterwards honour the Assessment made by Aristides, calling it the fortunate and blessed time of Greece, and specially, when shortly after it did double, and treble on the sudden. For the Taxe Aristides made, came to about foure hundred and threescore Talents: and Pericles raised it almost unto a third part. For Thucydides writeth, that at the beginning of the Wars of PELOPONNESUS, the Athenians levied six hundred Talents yearly upon their Confederates. And after the death of Pericles, the Orators and Counsellors for matters of State, did raise it up higher by little and little, untill it mounted to the summe of thirteene hundred Talents. And this was not because the Wars did rise to so great a charge, by reason of the length of the same, and of the losses the Athenians had received: but for that they did accustom the People to make distributions of Money by hand unto every Citizen, to make them set up Games, and make goodly Images, and to build up sumptuous Temples. Thus was Aristides therefore justly honoured, praised and esteemed above all others, for his just imposition of Taxes, saving onely of Themistocles: who went up and downe fleeing at the matter, saying it was no meete praife for an honest man, but rather for a Coffer well barred with Iron, where a man might safely lay up his Gold and Silver. This he spake to be even with Aristides, which was nothing like the sharpe gird Aristides gave him openly, when Themistocles talking with him, told him it was an excellent thing for a Captaine to be able to know, and to prevent the counsels and doings of the Enemies: And so it is, said Aristides againe, not onely a needfull, but an honest thing, and meete for a worthy Generall of an Army, to be cleane fingered, without Bribery or corruption. So Aristides made all the other People of Greece to sweare, that they would truly keepe the Articles of the Alliance, and he himselfe as Generall of the Athenians, did take their Oaths in the name of the Athenians: and so pronouncing execrations and curses against against them that should breake the League and Oath taken, he threw Iron Wedges red hot into the Sea, and prayed the gods to destroy them even so, that did violate their vowed faith. Notwithstanding, afterwards in my opinion, when there fell out great alteration in the State, and that the ATHENIANS were forced to rule more straightly then before: Aristides then willed the ATHENIANS to let him beare the danger and burden of perjury and execration, and that they should not lett for feare thereof to do any thing whatsoever they thought meete or necessary. To conclude, Theophrastus writeth, that Aristides was not onely a perfect, an honest, and just man, in private matters betwixt party and party: but in matters of State, and concerning the Common-weale, he did many things oftentimes according to the necessity of the time, and troubles of the City, wherein violence and injustice was to be used. As when the question was asked in open Councell, to know whether they might take away the Gold and Silver, that was left in the Isle of DELOS safely laid up in the Temple of Apollo, to beare out the charges of the Warres against the barbarous People, and to bring it from thence unto ATHENS, upon the motion of the SAMIANS, although it was directly against the Articles of the Alliance, made and sworn among all the GREECIANS; Aristides opinion being asked in the same, he answered: it was not just, but yet profitable. Now, notwithstanding Aristides had brought his City to rule and command many thousands of People, yet was he still poore for all that, and till his dying day he gloried rather to be praised for his poverty, then for all the famous Victories and Battels he had wonne: and that plainly appeared thus. Callias Ceres Torch-bearer, was his neare Kinsman, who through Enemies came to be accused, and stood in hazard of life: so when the day came that his matter was to be heard before the Judges, his Accusers very faintly, and to little purpose, uttered the offences whereof they accused him, and running into other by-matters, left the chiefe matter, and spake thus to the Judges: My Lords, you all know Aristides the Sonne of Lyfimachus, and you are not ignorant also that his Vertue hath made him more esteemed, then any man else is, or can be, in all GREECE. How thinke ye, doth he live at home, when you see him abroad up and downe the City, in a threeed-bare Gowne all to be tattered? Is it not likely, trow ye, that he is ready to starve at home for lacke of meat and reliefe, whom we all feare quake for very cold, being so ill arrayed and clothed? And yet M. Callias here his Cousin-germaine the richest Citizen in all ATHENS, is so miserable, that notwithstanding Aristides hath done much for him, by reason of his great Credit and Authority among you, he suffered him and his poore Wife and Children ready to beg and starve for any helpe he giveth them. Callias perceiving the Judges more angry with him for that, then for any matter else he was accused of: he prayed Aristides might be sent for, and willed him to tell truly, whether he had not offered him good round summes of Money, many a time and oft, and intreated him to take it; which he ever refused, and answered him alwaies, That he could better boast of his Poverty, then himselfe could of his Riches: (which he said many did use ill, and few could use them well) and that it was a hard thing to finde one man of a noble minde, that could away with Poverty, and that such onely might be asham'd of Poverty, as were poore against their wills. So Aristides confirmed all he spake to be true: and every man that was at the hearing of this matter, went wholly away with this opinion, that he had rather be poore as Aristides, then rich as Callias. This tale is written thus by Æschines the Socratic Philosopher: and Plato reporteth of him also, that notwithstanding there were many other famous and noble men of ATHENS, yet he gave Aristides praise above them all. For others, said he, (as Themistocles, Cimon, and Pericles) have beautified the City with stately Porches, and sumptuous Buildings of Gold and Silver, and with store of other fine superfluous devices: but Aristides was onely he, that vertuously disposed himselfe and all his doings, to the furtherance of the State and Common-weale. His Justice and good nature appeared plainly in his doings, and behaviour towards Themistocles. For though Themistocles was ever against Aristides in all things, and a continuall Enemy of his, and that by his meanes and practice he was banished from ATHENS: yet when Themistocles was accused of Treason to the State, having divers sharpe Enemies against him, as Cimon, Alcmaon, with divers other, Aristides sought not revenge, when he had him at his advantage. For he neither spake nor did any thing against him at that time to hurt him: neither did he rejoyce to see his Enemy in misery, no more then if he had never envied him in his prosperity. And touching Aristides death, some write that he died in the Realme of PONTUS, being sent thither about matters of the State: and other thinke he died an old man in the City of ATHENS, greatly honoured and beloved of all the Citizens. But Craterus the MACEDONIAN writeth of his death in this sort: After that Themistocles (saith he) was fled, the People of ATHENS became very stubborn and insolent: whereupon, many lewd men grew to be common appeachers and accusers of the Noblemen and chiefe Citizens, and to stir up the malice and ill will of the common People against them, who were waxen proud by reason of their Prosperity, and Dominion that was enlarged. Among the rest, Aristides was condemned for Extortion and ill behaviour in the Common-wealth, upon one Diophantes accusation, of the Village of AMPHITROPE: who burdened him, that he rooke Money of the IONIANS, to make the annuall Tribute Cesse which they payed unto ATHENS: and so Craterus saith, that because Aristides was not able to pay the Fine they set upon his head (which was five Minas) he was driven to forsake ATHENS, and to get him into IONIA, where he died. Yet doth not Craterus bring forth any probable matter to prove this true he writeth: as his pleading, his Sentence and condemnation, or any Decree passed against him, although he used great diligence else in collecting all such matters, and vouching his Authours. Furthermore, all other Writers that have specially noted the faults and offences committed by the People of ATHENS in former times against their their Captaines and Governours: they do declare Themistocles exile, Miltiades captivity that died in Prison, Pericles Fine wherein he was condemned, and Paches death that slew himselfe in the Pulpit for Orations, when he saw he was condemned: and tell divers such Stories, adding too also Aristides banishment: but yet they make no matter of mention of the condemnation which Craterus speaketh of. Moreover, Aristides Tombe is to be seene at this day upon the Haven of PHALERUS, which was set up for him at the charge of the Common-wealth, as it is reported, because he died so poore a man, as they found nothing in his house to bury him with. Other go further, and say that his Daughters were married by Decree of the People, at the charge of the Common-wealth, and that the City gave every one of them three thousand Drachmas: and his Sonne Lyfimachus, a hundred Minas of Silver, and a hundred Jugera; and at Alcibiades request, who was the Authour of the Decree, they gave him foure Drachmas a day besides, of ordinary allowance. Furthermore, when this Lyfimachus died, he left alive one onely Daughter called Polycrite, whom the People appointed, as Calisthenes writeth, as much Provision to live withall, as they gave to any that wanne the Olympian Games. And fithence, Demetrius PHALERIAN, Hieronymus RHODIAN, Aristoxenus the Musitian, and Aristotle the Philosopher, at least if the Booke intituled of Nobility be any of Aristotles Workes: all these agree together, that one Myrto, Aristides Daughters Daughter, was married to the wife Socrates, who tooke her to his Wife (having a Wife already) because she was a poore Widow, and could not be married for her Poverty, having much ado to live. Yet Panetius doth write against him, in his Booke of Socrates Life. But Demetrius PHALERIAN writeth in his Booke he intituled Socrates, that he could remember very well he had seene one Lyfimachus, Aristides Sonnes Sonne, or his Daughters Sonne, that was very poore, and lived of that he could get to interpret Dreames, by certaine Tables, wherein was written the Art to interpret the signification of Dreames: and that he kept commonly about the Temple of Bacchus called Iacchion, unto whom, together with his Mother and his Sister, he said he had caused the People to give them a Triobulum apiece, every day towards their living: It is very true, that the self-same Demetrius PHALERIAN, when he reformed the State of ATHENS, ordained that his Mother and Sister should have each of them a Drachnor strange thing, that the People of ATHENS were so carefull to helpe and to relieve the Women that dwelt in their City: considering that in times past, Aristogiton having a little Daughter in the Isle of LEBMONOS, in very hard and poore estate, and that could not be bestowed in marriage for her Poverty, they caused her to be brought to ATHENS, and married her in one of the Noblest Houses of the City, and made her a Joynter besides in the Village of PONTAMOS. Which great courtesie and humanity of theirs, hath ever deserved great fame and commendation, and yet continueth even until this day, in that noble City of ATHENS, in the mouth of every man there.

THE LIFE OF MARCUS CATO the Censor.

Ann. Mund.

Ant. Christ.

Marcus Cato and his Ancestors, were (as they say) of the City of THUSCULUM: but before he went unto the Warres, and dealt in matters of the Common-wealth, he dwelt and lived in the Countrey of the SABYNS, upon certaine Land his Father left him. And though to many his Ancestors were knowne to have bene obscure: yet he himselfe did highly commend his Father Marcus, by bearing his name, and saying he was a Souldier, and had served valiantly in the Field. And he telleth also of another Cato that was his great Grandfather, who for his valiant service had been oft rewarded of the Generals, with such honourable gifts, as the ROMANES did use to give unto them that had done some famous act in any Battell: and how that he having lost five Horses of service in the Warres, the value of the same was restored to him againe in Money of the common Treasure, because he had shewed himselfe trusty and valiant for the Common-wealth. And where they had a common speech at ROME, to call them upstarts that were no Gentlemen borne, but did rise by vertue: it fortun'd Cato to be called one of them. And for his part he did confesse it, that he was the first of his House that ever had honour, and Office of State: but by reason of the noble acts and good service of his Ancestors, he maintained he was very ancient. He was called at the beginning after his third name, Priscus: but after wards by reason of his great wisdom and experience, he was surnamed Cato, because the ROMANES call a wife man, and him that hath seene much, Cato. He was somewhat given to be red-faced, and had a paire of staring eyes in his head, as this man telleth us, that for ill will wrote these Verbes of him after his death:

*Pluto (the god) which rules the Furies infernall, Will not receive the damned ghost, of Porcius in his hall.
His sawcy coppered nose, and fierce staring eyes,
His common slanderous tales, which he did in this world devise,
Made Pluto stand in dread, that he would bridle in Hell, Although his bones were dry and dead; on Earth he was so fell,*

Furthermore, touching the disposition of his body; he was marvellous strong and lusty, and all because he did use to labour and toile even from his youth, and live sparingly, as one that was ever brought up in the Warres from his youth: so that he was of a very good constitution, both for strength of body, and for health. As for utterance, he esteemed it as a second body, and most necessary gift, not onely to make men honest, but also as a thing very requisite for a man that should beare sway and Authority in the Common-wealth. He practised to speake well in little Villages near home, whither he went many times to pleade mens Causes in Courts judicall, that would retaine him of Counsell: so as in short time he became a perfect Pleader, and had tongue at will, and in proesse of time became an excellent Orator. After he was thus well knowne, they that were familiar with him, began to perceive a grave manner and behaviour in his life, and a certaine noble minde in him, him, worthy to be employed in matters of State and great importance, and to be called into the Common-wealth. For he did not openly refuse to take Fees for his pleading, and followed the Caufes he maintained: but furthermore, made no reckoning of the estimation he wanne by that manner and practise, as though that was not the onely Marke he shot at. But his desire reached further, rather to winne himselfe Fame by Service in the Warres, and by valiant fighting with his Enemy, then with such a quiet and pleasing manner of life. Infomuch as when he was but a young stripling in manner, he had many cuts upon his breast, which he had received in divers Battels and Encounters against the Enemies. For he himselfe writeth, that he was but seventene yeares old, when he went first unto the Warres, which was about the time of Hannibals chiefe prosperity, when he spoiled and destroyed all Italy. So when he came to fight he would strike lustily, and never stir foote nor give backe; and would looke cruelly upon his Enemy, and threaten him with a fearfull and terrible voyce, which he used himselfe, and wisely taught other also to use the like: for such countenances, said he, many times do feare the Enemies more then the Sword ye offer them. When he went any Journey, he ever marched on foote, and carried his Armour upon his backe, and had a man waiting on him, that carried his Victuals with him, with whom he was never angry (as they say) for any thing he had prepared for his Dinner or Supper, but did helpe to dresse it himselfe for the most part, if he had any leisure, when he had done the duty of a private Souldier in fortifying the Campe, or such other needfull businesse. All the while he was abroad in Service in the Wars, he never dranke other then cleane Water, unless it were when he found he was not well, and then he would take a little Vineger: but if he saw he were weake, he would then drinke a little Wine. Now it fortun'd that Manius Curius the ROMANE, who had triumphed thrice, had a pretty Houfe and Land hard by Cato, where he kept in times past, which Cato for a while would visit oft. And he considering how little Land he had to his Houfe, and what a little Houfe he had withall, and how poorly it was built, wondered with himselfe what manner of man Curius had bene, that having bene the greatest man of ROME in his time, and having subdued the mightiest Nations and People of all ITALY, and driven King Pyrus also out of the same: yet himselfe with his owne hands did manure that little patch of ground, and dwell in so poore and small a Farme. Whither notwithstanding, after his three Triumphs, the SAMNITES sent their Ambassadors to visit him, who found him by the fires side seething of Parfeneys, and presented him a marvellous deale of Gold, from their State and Commonalty. But Curius returned them againe with their Gold, and told them, that such as were contented with that Supper, had no neede of Gold nor Silver: and that for his part, he thought it greater honour to command them that had Gold, then to have it himselfe. Cato remembering these things to himselfe, went home againe, and began to thinke upon his Houfe, of his Living, of his Family and Servants, and also of his Expences, and to cut off all superfluous charges, and fell himselfe to labour with his owne hands, more then ever he had done before. Furthermore, when Fabius Maximus tooke the City of TARENTUM againe, Cato served under him being very young, where he fell into familiar acquaintance with Nearchus the PYTHAGORIAN Philosopher, in whom he tooke marvellous delight to heare him talke of Philosophy. Which Nearchus held the same opinion of pleasure, that Plato did, by calling him the sweete Poyson, and chiefe Baite to allure men to ill: and saying that the Body was the first plague unto the Soule, and that her onely Health, Remedy, and Purgation, stood upon rules of Reason, good Examples and Contemplations, that drive sinfull thoughts and carnall pleasures of the body, far off from her. Cato moreover gave himselfe much to sobriety and temperance, and fram'd himselfe to be content with little. They say he fell in his very old age to the study of the Greeke Tongue, and to reade Greeke Bookes, and that he profited somewhat by Thucydides, but much more by Demosthenes, to frame his Matter, and also to be eloquent: which plainly appeareth in all his Bookes and Writings, full of Authorities, Examples, and Stories taken out of the Greeke Authours: and many of his Sentences and Morals, his Adages and quick Answers, are translated out of the same word for word. Now there was a Nobleman of ROME at that time, one of great Authority, and a deepe wise man besides, who could easily discern buds of Vertue sprouting out of any towardy youth, who was of a good and honourable disposition to helpe forward, and to advance such: his name was Valerius Flaccus, a neare neighbour unto Cato, who was informed by his Servants of Catoes strange life, how he would be doing in his Ground with his owne hands: and how he would be gone every day betimes in the morning to little Villages thereabouts, to pleade mens Causes that prayed his counsell, and that when he had done, he would come home againe: and if it were in Winter, that he would but cast a little Coate on his shoulders, and being Some he would go out bare-necked to the waste, to worke in his ground among his Servants and other Workmen: and would besides, sit and eate with them together at one Boord, and drinke as they did. Moreover, they told him also a world of such manners and fashions he used, that shewed him to be a marvellous plaine man, without pride, and of a good nature. Then they told him what notable wise Sayings and grave Sentences they heard him speake. Valerius Flaccus hearing this report of him, willed his men one day to pray him to come to Supper to him. Who falling in acquaintance with Cato, and perceiving he was of a very good Nature, and well given, and that he was a good Graffe to be set in a better Ground, he perswaded him to come to ROME, and to practise there in the Assembly of the People, in the common Causes and Affaires of the Common-wealth. Cato followed his counsell, who having bene no long Practiser among them, did grow straight into great estimation, and wanne him many friends, by reason of the Causes he tooke in hand to defend: and was the better preferred and taken also, by meanes of the speciall favour and countenance Valerius lerius Flaccus gave him. For first of all, by voice of the People he was chosen Tribune of the Souldiers (to say, Colonell of a thousand Footmen) and afterwards was made treasurer: and so went forwards, and grew to so great credite and authority, as he became Valerius Flaccus Companion in the chiefe Offices of State, being chosen Consull with him, and then Censor. But to begin withall, Cato made choise of Quintus Fabius Maximus, above all the Senators of ROME, and gave himselfe to follow him altogether: and not so much for the credit and estimation Fabius Maximus was of (who therein excelled all the ROMANES of that time) as for the modesty and discreet government he saw in him, whom he determined to follow, as a worthy mirrour and example. At which time Cato passed not for the malice and evill will of Scipio the Great, who did strive at that present being but a young man, with the authority and greatness of Fabius Maximus, as one that seemed to envy his rising and greatness. For Cato being sent treasurer with Scipio, when he undertook the journey into AFRICKE, and perceiving Scipio's bountifull nature, and disposition to large gifts without meane to the Souldiers: he told him plainly one day, that he did not so much hurt the Commonwealth in waisting their treasure, as he did great harme in changing the ancient manner of their auncelours: who used their Souldiers to be contented with little, but he taught them to spend their superfluous money (all necessities provided for) in vaine toies and trifles to serve their pleasure. Scipio made him answer, he would have no treasurer should controule him in this sort, nor that should looke so narrowly to his expences: for his intent was to go to the Warres, with full failes as it were, and that he would (and did also determine) to make the state privy to all his doings, but not to the money he spent. Cato hearing this answer, returned with speed out of SICILE into ROME, crying out with Fabius Maximus in open Senate, that Scipio spent infinitely, and that he tended Playes, Comedies, and Wrestlings, as if he had not been sent to make Warres, invasions, and attempts upon their Enemies. Upon this complaint the Senate appointed certaine Tribunes of the People, to go and see if their informations were true: and finding them so, that they should bring him back againe to ROME. But Scipio shewed farre otherwise to the Commissioners that came thither, and made them see apparent Victory, through the necessary preparation and provision he had made for the Warres: and he confessed also, that when he had dispatched his great businesse, and was at any leasure, he would be privately merry with his Friends: and though he was liberrall to his Souldiers, yet that made him not negligent of his duty and charge in any matter of importance. So Scipio tooke shipping, and sailed towards AFRICKE, whether he was sent to make Warre. Now to returne to Cato. He daily increased still in authority and credit by meanes of his eloquence, so that divers called him the Demagogue of ROME: howbeit the manner of his life was in more estimation then his eloquence. For all the youth of ROME did seeke to attaine to his eloquence and commendation of words, and one envied another which of them should come nearest: but few of them would file their hands with any labour as their Forefathers did, and made a light Supper and Dinner without fire or provision, or would be content with a meane gown, and a poore lodging, and finally would thinke it more honourable to defie Fancies and Pleasures, then to have and enjoy them. Because the State was waxen now of such Power and Wealth, as it could no more retain the ancient discipline, and former austerity, and straightnesse of life it used: but by reason of the largenesse of their Dominion and seigniority, and the numbers of People and Nations that were become their subjects, it was even forced to receive a medley of sundry Countrey fashions, examples, and manners. This was a cause, why in reason men did so greatly wonder at Cato's Vertue, when they saw other straight wearied with paines and labour tenderly brought up like pulers: and Cato one the other side never overcome, either with the one or with the other, no not in his youth, when he most coveted honour, nor in his age also when he was gray Headed and bald after his Consulship and triumph: but like a conquerour that had gotten the mastery, he would never give over labour even unto his dying day. For he writeth himselfe, that there never came Gowne one his backe that cost him above 100 pence, and that his hinds and workemen alwaies drunke no worse Wine, when he was Consul and Generall of the Army, then he did himself: and that his Cater never bestowed in Meat for his Supper, above thirty Asles of ROMANE money; and yet he said it was, because he might be the stronger, and apter to doe service in the Warres for his Country and the Commonwealth. He said furthermore, that being heire to one of his Friends that died, he had a peece of tapestry by him with a deepe border, which they called then the BABYLONIAN border, and he caused it straight to be sold: and that of all his Houses he had abroad in the Countrey, he had not one Wall plastered, nor rough cast. Moreover he would say, he never bought Bondman or slave dearer, then a thousand five hundred Pence, as one that fought not for fine made men and goodly personages, but strong fellows that could away with paines, as Carters, Horfe-keepers, Neat-herds, and such like: and againe he would tell them when they were old, because he would not keepe them when they could do no service. To conclude, he was of opinion, that a man bought any thing deare, that was for little purpose: yea, though he gave but a farthing for it, he thought it too much to bestow so little, for that which needed not. He would have men purchase Houses, that had more store of arable Land and Pasture, then of fine Hortyards or Gardens. Some say, he did thus for very misery and covetousnesse: other thinke, and tooke it that he lived so sparingly, to move others by his example to cut off all superfluity and waste. Nevertheless, to sell slaves in that sort, or to turne them out of doores when you have had the service of all their youth, and that they are grown old, as you use brute Beastes that have served whilest they may for age: me thinkes that must needs proceed of too severe and greedy a nature, that hath no longer regard or consideration of humanity, then whilest one one is able to do another good. For we see, gentleness goeth further then justice. For Nature teacheth us to use justice onely to them, but gentleness sometimes is shewed unto brute Beasts: and that cometh from the very Fountaine and Spring of all courtesie and humanity, which should never dry up in any man living. For to say truly, to keepe cast Horfes spoiled in our service, and Dogs also, not onely when they are Whelps, but when they be old, be even tokens of love and kindnesse. As the ATHENIANS made a Law, when they builded their Temple called Hecatompodon: that they should suffer the Moyles and Mules that did service in their carriages about the building of the same, to graze every where, without lett or trouble of any man. And they say there was one of their Moyles thus turned at liberty, that came her selfe to the place to labour, going before all the other draught Beasts that drew up Carts loaden towards the Castle, and kept them company, as though she seemed to encourage the rest to draw: which the People liked so well in the poore Beast, that they appointed she should be kept whilest she lived, at the charge of the Towne. And yet at this present are the graves of Cimons Mares to be seene, that wanne him thrice together the Prize of the Horserace at the Games Olympian, and they are hard by the grave of Cimon himselfe. We heare of divers also that had buried their Dogs they brought up in their house, or that waited on them: as among other, old Xanthippus buried his Dog in the top of a cliffe, which is called the Dogs pit till this day. For when the People of ATHENS did forsake their City at the coming downe of the King Xerxes, this Dog followed his Master, swimming in the Sea by his Gallies side, from the firme Land unto the Ile of SALAMINA. And there is no reason, to use living and sensible things, as we would use an old shoore or a ragge, to cast it out upon the Dunghill when we have worne it, and can serve us no longer. For if it were for no respect else, but to use us alwaies to humanity, we must ever shew our selves kinde and gentle, even in such small points of pity. And as for me, I could never finde in my heart to sell my draught Oxe that had ploughed my Land a long time, because he could plough no longer for age: and much lesse my Slave, to sell him for a little Money, out of the Countrey where he had dwelt a long time, to plucke him from his old trade of life, wherewith he was best acquainted, and then specially, when he shall be as unprofitable for the buyer, as also for the seller. But Cato on the other side gloried, that he left his Horfe in SPAINES he had served on in the Wars during his Consulship, because he would not put the Commonwealth to the charge of bringing him home by Sea into ITALY. Now a question might be made of this, and probable reason of either side, whether this was noblesse or a niggardinesse in him: but otherwise to say truly, he was a man of a wonderful abstinence. For when he was Generall of the Army, he never tooke allowance but after three bushells of Wheate a Moneth of the Commonwealth, for himselfe and his whole Family: and but a bushell and a halfe of Barley a day, to keepe his Horfe and other Beasts for his carriage. On a time when he was Prætor, the government of the Ile of SARDINIA fell to his lot: and where the other Prætors before him had put the Countrey to exceeding great charge, to furnish them with Tents, Bedding, and Clothes, and such like stufte, and burthened them also with a marvellous Train of Servants and their Friends that waited on them, putting them to great expence in feasting and banquetting of them: Cato in contrary manner brought downe all that excesse and superfluity, unto a marvellous neare and incredible saving. For when he went to visit the Cities, he came on foote to them, and did not put them to a peny charge for himselfe: and had onely one Officer or Bayliffe of the State that waited on him, and carried his Gowne and a Cup with him, to offer up Wine to the gods in his Sacrifices. But though he came thus simply to the Subjects, and eased them of their former charges, yet he shewed himselfe severe and bitter to them in matters concerning Justice: and spared no man, in any commandement of service for the State and Commonwealth: for he was therein so precise, that he would not beare with any little fault. So by this meanes, he brought the SARDINIANS under his government, both to love and feare the Empire of ROME, more then ever they had before: as appeareth plainly by the manner both of his speaking and writing: because it was pleasant and yet grave: sweete and fearfull: merry and severe: sententious and yet familiar, such as is meete to be spoken. And he was to be compared unto Socrates: who (as Plato saith) at the first sight was a plaine simple man to them that knew him but outwardly, or else a pleasant Taunter or Mocker: but when they did looke into him, and found him thoroughly, they saw he was full of grave Sentences, goodly Examples, and wise Perfwasions, that he could make men water their Plants that heard him, and leade them as he would by the eare. Therefore I cannot see any reason that moves men to say, Cato had Lyfias grace and utterance. Notwithstanding, let us refer it to their judgements that make profession to discern Oratours graces and titles: for my part, I shall content my selfe to write at this present, onely certaine of his notable Sayings and Sentences, perfwading my selfe that mens manners are better discerned by their words, then by their lookes, and so do many thinke. On a time seeking to dissuade the People of ROME, which would needs make a thankfull distribution of Corne unto every Citizen, to no purpose, he began to make an Oration with this Preface. It is a hard thing (my Lords of ROME) to bring the belly by perfwasions to reason, that hath no eares. And another time, reproving the ill Government of the City of ROME, he said: it was a hard thing to keepe up that State, where a little Fish was sold dearer then an Oxe. He said also, that the ROMANES were like a flock of Sheepe: for faith he, as every Weather when he is alone, doth not obey the Shepherd, but when they are all together they one follow another for love of the foremost: even so are you; for when you are together, you are all contented to be led by the noses by such, whose counsell not a man alone of you would use in any private Cause of your owne. And talking another time of the Authority the Women of ROME had over their Husbands, he said other men commanded their Wives, and we command men, and our Wives command us. But this last of all he borrowed of Themistocles pleasant sayings. For his Sonne making him do many things by means of his Mother: he told his Wife one day: The ATHENIANS command all GREECE, I command the ATHENIANS, you command me, and your Sonne ruleth you. I pray you therefore bid him use the liberty he hath with some better discretion, soole and affe as he is, thence he can do more by that Power and Authority, then all the GRECIANS besides. He said also that the People of ROME did not onely delight in divers sorts of Purple, but likewise in divers sorts of Exercises. For said he, as divers commonly die that colour they see best esteemed, and is most pleasant to the eye: even so the lusty Youths of ROME do frame themselves to such Exercise, as they see your selves most like and best esteeme. He continually advised the ROMANES, that if their Power and Greatnesse came by their Vertue and Temperance, they should take heed they became no changelings, nor waxe worse: and if they came to that Greatnesse by Vice and Violence, that then they should change to better, for by that meanes he knew very well they had attained to great Honour and Dignity. Again he told them, that such as sued ambitiously to beare Office in the Common-wealth, and were common Suters for them, did seeme to be afraid to lose their way, and therefore would be sure to have Uffers and Serjeants before them, to shew them the way, lest they should lose themselves in the City. He did reprove them also, that often chose one man to continue one Office still: For it seemeth, saith he, either that you passe not much for your Officers, or that you have not many choice men you thinke worthy for the Office. There was an Enemy of his that led a marvellous wicked and an abominable life, of whom he was wont to say, that when his Mother prayed unto the gods that she might leave her Sonne behinde her, she did not think to pray, but to curse: meaning to have him live for a plague to the World. And to another also that had unthrifely sold his Lands which his Father had left him, lying upon the Sea side, he pointed unto them with his finger, and made as though he wondred how he came to be so great a man, that he was stronger then the Sea: for that which the Sea hardly consumeth and eateth out by little and little a long time, he had consumed it all at a clap. Another time, when King Eumenes was come to ROME, the Senate entertained him marvellous honourably, and the noblest Citizens did strive, envying one another, who should welcome him best. But Cato in contrary manner shewed plainly, that he did suspect all this feasting and entertainment, and would not come at it. When one of his familiar friends told him, I marvel why you flee from King Eumenes company, that is so good a Prince, and loves the ROMANES so well: Yea, said he, let it be so, but for all that, a King is no better then a ravening Beast that lives of the prey: neither was there ever any King so happy, that deserved to be compared to Epaminondas, to Pericles, to Themistocles, nor to Manius Curius, or to Hamylcar, surnamed Barca. They say his Enemies did malice him, because he used commonly to rise before day, and did forget his owne businesse to follow matters of State. And he affirmed that he had rather lose the reward of his well-doing, then not to be punished for doing of evil: and that he would beare with all other offending ignorantly, but not with himselfe. The ROMANES having chosen on a time three Ambassadors to send into the Realme of BYTHINIA, one of them having the gout in his feete, the other his head full of cuts and great gashes, and the third being but a foole: Cato laughing, said, the ROMANES sent an Ambassade that had neither feete, head nor heart. Scipio sued once to Cato at Polybius request, about those that were banished from ACHIA. The matter was argued afterwards in the Senate, and there fell out divers opinions about it. Some would have had them restored to their Countrey and Goods againe: other were wholly against it. So Cato rising up at the last, said unto them: It seemes we have little else to do, when we stand beating of our braines all day, disputing about these old GRECIANS, whether the ROMANES or the ACHAIANS shall bury them: In the end, the Senate tooke order they should be restored unto their Countrey againe. Whereupon Polybius thought to make petition againe unto the Senate, that the banished men whom they had restored by their order, might enjoy their former Estates and Honours in ACHIA, they had at the time of their banishment: but before he would move the Suite unto the Senate, he would seele Catoes opinion first, what he thought of it. Who answered him, smiling: Methinks Polybius thou art like Ulysses, that when he had scaped out of Cyclops Cave the Giant, he would needs go thither againe, to fetch his Hat and Girdle he had left behinde him there. He saith also, that wise men did learne and profit more by fooles, then fooles did by wise men. For wise men, saith he, do see the faults fooles commit, and can wisely avoid them: but fooles never studie to follow the example of wise mens doings. He said also, that he ever liked young men better that blushed, then those that ever looked whitely: and that he would not have him for a Souldier, that wags his hand as he goeth, removes his feete when he fighteth, and rowteth and snorteth lowder in his sleepe, then when he crieth out to his Enemy. Another time when he would raunt a marvellous fat man: See, saith he, what good can such a body do to the Common-wealth, that from his chin to his codpiece is nothing but belly? And to another man that was given to pleasure, and desired to be great with him: My friend, said Cato, as refusing his acquaintance: I cannot live with him that hath better judgement in the palate of his mouth, then in his heart. This was also his saying, That the Soule of a Lover lived in anothers Body. And that in all his life time he repented him of three things. The first was, if that he ever told secret to any woman: the second, that ever he went by Water, when he might have gone by Land: the third, that he had beene idle a whole day, and had done nothing. Also when he saw a vicious old man, he would say to reprove him: O gray beard, age bringeth many deformities with it, helpe helpe it not besides with your Vice. And to a seditious Tribune of the People that was suspected to be a paysoner, and would needs passe some wicked Law by voice of the People, he would say: O young man, I know not which of these two be worse, to drinke the Drugges thou givest, or to receive the Lawes thou offerest. Another time, being reviled by one that led a lewd and naughty Life: Go thy way, said he, I am no man to scold with thee: for thou art so used to revile, and to be reviled, that it is not dainty to thee: but for my selfe, I never use to hear scolding, and much lesse delight to scold. These be his wife sayings we finde written of him, whereby we may the callier conjecture his manners and nature. Now when he was chosen Consull with his friend Valerius Flaccus, the Government of SPAINNE fell to his Lot, that is on this side of the River of BÆTIS. So Cato having subdued many People by force of Armes, and won others also by friendly meanes: suddenly there came a marvellous great Army of the Barbarous People, against him; and had environed him so, as he was in marvellous danger, either shamefully to be taken Prisoner, or to be slain in the Field. Wherefore he sent presently unto the CELTIBERIANS, to pray aide of them, who were next neighbours unto the marches were he was. These CELTIBERIANS did aske him two hundred Talents to come and helpe him: but the ROMANES that were about him, could not abide to hire the Barbarous People to defend them. Then Cato told them straight, there was no hurt in it, nor any dishonour unto them. For said he, if the Field be ours, then we shall pay their wages, we promised, with the spoile and Money of our Enemies: and if we lose it, then our selves and they lie by it, being left neither man to pay, nor yet any to aske it. In the end he won the Battell, after a fore conflict, and after that time he had marvellous good Fortune. For Polybius writeth, that all the Walls of the Cities that were on this side the River of BÆTIS, were by his commandement razed in one day, which were many and full of good Souldiers. Himselfe writeth, that he tooke moe Cities in SPAINNE, then he remained there daies: and it is no vaine boast, if it be true that is written, that there were foure hundred Cities of them. Now, though the Souldiers under him had gotten well in this journey, and were rich, yet he caused a Pound weight of Silver to be given to every Souldier besides: saying he liked it better that many should returne home with Silver in their Purfes, then a few of them with Gold onely. But for himselfe he affirmed: that of all the spoile gotten of the Enemies, he never had any thing, saving that which he tooke in Meate and Drinke. And yet said he, I speake it not to reprove them that grow rich by such spoiles: but because I would contend in vertue rather with the best, then in Money with the richest, or in covetousnesse with the most avaritious. For not onely he himselfe was cleare from bribes and extortion, but his Officers also under him kept the same course. In this Spainish journey, he had five of his servants with him, whereof one of them called Paccus, brought three young Boyes that were taken in the Warres, when the spoile was sold to them that would give most. So Cato knew it. But Paccus being afraid to come neare his Master, hanged himselfe: and then Cato sold the Boyes againe, and put the Money made of them into the Treasure Chests of saving at ROME. Now while Cato was in SPAINNE, Scipio the Great that was his Enemy, and sought to hinder the course of his prosperity, and to have the Honour of conquering all the rest of SPAINNE, he made all the friends he could to the People, to be chosen in Catoes place. He was no sooner entred into his charge, but he made all the possible speede he could to be gone, that he might make Catoes Authority cease the sooner. Cato hearing of his hasty coming, tooke onely five Ensignes of Footmen, and five hundred Horsemen to attend upon him home: with the which, in his journey homeward, he overcame a People in SPAINNE called the LACETANIANS, and tooke six hundred Traitours also that were fled from the ROMANES Campe to their Enemies, and did put to death every Mothers Childe of them. Scipio storming at that, said Cato did him wrong. But Cato to mocke him finely, said: It was the right way to bring ROME to flourish, when Noble borne Citizens would not suffer meane borne men, and upstarts as himselfe was, to goe before them in Honour: and on the other side when meane borne men would contend in Vertue, with those that were of Noblest race, and farre above them in calling. For all that, when Cato came to ROME, the Senate commanded that nothing should be changed nor altered otherwise, then Cato had appointed it, whilest he was in his Office. So that the Government for which Scipio made such earnest sute in SPAINNE, was a greater disgrace unto him, then it was unto Cato: because he passed all his time and Office in peace, having no occasion offered him to doe any notable service worthy memory. Furthermore, Cato after he had beene Consull, and had granted to him the Honour to Triumph, did not as many others doe, that seeke not after Vertue, but onely for worldly Honour and dignity: who, when they have beene called to the highest Offices of State, as to be Consuls, and have also granted them the Honour to Triumph, doe then leave to deale any more in matters of State, and dispose themselves to live merrily and quietly at home, and not to trouble themselves any more. Now Cato farre otherwise behaved himselfe: for he would never leave to exercise Vertue, but began afresh, as if he had beene a young Novice in the world, and as one greedy of Honour and reputation, and to take as much paines and more then he did before. For, to pleasure his friends or any other Citizen, he would come to the Market-place, and pleade their causes for them that required his counsell, and goe with his friends also into the Warres: as he went with Tiberius Sempromius the Consull, and was one of the Lieutenants at the conquest of the Countrey of THRACE, and unto the Provinces adjoining to the River of DANUBY upon those marches. After that, he was in GREECE also, Colonnell of a thousand Footmen, under Manius Aquilius, against King Antiochus surnamed the Great,

Great, who made the ROMANES so much afraid of him, as ever they were of Enemy, but Hannibal. For when he had Conquered all the Regions and Provinces of ASIA, which Selenus Nicator enjoyed before, and had subdued many Barbarous and Warlike Nations: he was so proud hearted, as he would needs have Warres with the ROMANES, whom he knew to be the onely worthy men, and best able to fight with him. So he made some honest shew and pretence of Warres, saying it was to set the GRECIANS at liberty, who had no cause thereof, considering they lived after their owne Lawes, and were but lately delivered from the bondage of King Philip, and of the MACEDONIANS, through the goodnesse of the ROMANES. Notwithstanding, he came out of ASIA into GREECE with a marvellous great Army, and all GREECE was straight in Armes and in wonderfull danger, because of the great promises and large hopes the Governours of divers Cities (whom the King had wonne and corrupted with Money) did make unto him. Whereupon Manius dispatched Ambassadors unto the City, and sent Titus Quintus Flaminus among others, who kept the greatest part of the People from rebelling (that were easily drawn to give eare to this innovation) as we have exprest more amply in his Life: And Cato being sent Ambassadour also, perswaded the CORINTHIANS, those of PATRAS, and the AEGIANS, and made them stick full to the ROMANES, and continued a long time at ATHENS. Some say they finde an Oration of his written in the Greeke tongue, which he made before the ATHENIANS, in commendation of their Ancestors: wherein he said, he tooke great pleasure to see ATHENS, for the beauty and Stateliness of the City. But this is false: for he spake unto the ATHENIANS by an Interpreter, though he could have uttered his Oration in the Greeke tongue if he had beene disposed: but he did like the Lawes and customes of his owne Countrey, and the ROMANE tongue so well, that he laughed at them that would praise and commend the Greeke tongue. As he did once mocke Posthumus Albinus, who wrote an History in the Greeke tongue, praying the readers in his Preface to beare with him, if they found any imperfection in the Tongue: Marry said Cato, he had deserved pardon indeede, if he had beene forced to have written his Story in the Greeke tongue, by the order of the States of GREECE, called the Councell of the Amphictyons. They say the ATHENIANS wondered to heare his ready tongue. For what he had uttered quickly in few words unto the Interpreter, the Interpreter was driven to deliver them againe with great circumstances and many words. So that he left them of this opinion, that the GRECIANS words lay all in their lipps, and the ROMANES words in their heades. Now King Antiochus kept all the straights and narrow passages of the Mountaines called THERMOPYLES (being the ordinary way and entrie into GREECE) and had fortified them awell with an Army that Camped at the foote of the Mountaine, as also with Walls and Trenches he had made by hand, besides the naturall strength and fortification of the Mount it selfe in sundry places: and so he determined to remaine there, trusting to his owne strength and fortifications aforesaid, and to turne the force of the Warres some other way. The ROMANES also they dispaired utterly they should be able any way to charge him before. But Cato remembering with himselfe the compasse the PERSIANS had fetched about before time likewise to enter into GREECE, he departed one night from the Campe with part of the Army: to prove if he could finde the very compasse about the Barbarous People had made before. But as they climed up the Mountaine, their guide that was one of the Prisoners taken in the Countrey, lost his way, and made them wander up and downe in marvellous steepe Rockes and crooked waies, that the poor Souldiers were in marvellous ill taking. Cato seeing the danger they were brought unto by this lewd guide, commanded all his Souldiers not to stirre a foote from thence, and to tarry him there: and in the meane time he went himselfe alone, and Lucius Manlius with him, (a lusty man, and nimble to clime upon the Rockes) and so went forward at adventure, taking extreme and uncredible paines, and in much danger of his Life, grabbing all night in the darke without Moone light, through wilde Olive Trees, and high Rockes (that let them they could not see before them, neither could tell whether they went) untill they stumbled at the length upon a little path way, which went as they thought directly to the foote of the Mountaine, where the Campe of the Enemies lay. So they set up certaine markes and tokens, upon the highest toppes of the Rockes they could choofe, by view of eye to be discerned furthest off upon the Mountaine called Callidromus. And when they had done that, they returned backe againe to fetch the Souldiers, whom they led towards the Markes they had set up: untill at they length they found their path-way againe, where they put their Souldiers in order to march. Now they went not farre in this path they found, but the way failed them straight and brought them to a bogge: but then they were in worse case then before, and in greater feare, not knowing they were so neare their Enemies, as indeed they were. The day beganne to breake a little, and one of them that marched foremost, thought he heard a noise, and that he saw the GREKES Campe at the foote of the Rockes, and certaine Souldiers that kept watch there. Whereupon Cato made them stay, and willed onely they FIRMANTIANs to come unto him, and none but them, because he had found them faithfull before, and very ready to obey his commandement. They were with him at a trice, to know his pleasure: so Cato said unto them: My fellows, I must have some of our Enemies taken Prisoners, that I may know of them who they be that keepe that passage, what number they be, what order they keepe, how they are Camped and Armed, and after what fort they determine to fight with us. The way to worke this feate standeth upon swiftnesse and hardinesse to runne upon them sodainely, as Lyons doe, which being naked fare not to runne into the middelt of any heard of fearefull Beasts. He had

no sooner spoken these words, but the FIRMANTIAN Souldiers began to ruine downe the Mountaines as they were, upon those that kept the Watch: and so setting upon them, they being out of order, made them fly, and tooke an Armed man prisoner. When they had him, they straight brought him unto Cato, who by Oath of the prisoner, was advertised how that the strength of their Enemies Army was lodged about the person of the King, within the straight and valley of the said Mountaine: and that the Souldiers they saw, were six hundred ETOLIANS, all brave Souldiers, whom they had chosen and appointed to keepe the toppe of the Rockes over King Antiochus Campe. When Cato had heard him, making small account of the matter, as well for their small number, as also for the ill order they kept: he made the Trumpets sound straight, and his Souldiers to march in battell with great cryes, himselfe being the foremost man of all his Troupe, with a Sword drawne in his hand. But when the ETOLIANS saw them coming downe the Rockes towards them, they began to fly for life unto their great Campe, which they filled full of feare, trouble, and all disorder. Now Manius at the same present also, gave an assault unto the Walles and fortification the King had made overthwart the vallies and straights of the Mountaines: at which assault King Antiochus selfe had a blow on the face with a stone, that strake some of his Teeth out of his mouth, so that for very paine and anguish he felt, he turned his Horse back, and got him behinde the presse. And then there were none of his Army that made any more resistance, or that could abide the fiercenesse of the ROMANES. But notwithstanding that the places were very ill for flying, because it was unpossible for them to scatter and straggle, being holden in with high Rockes on the one side of them, and with bogges and deepe marishes on the other side, which they must needs fall into if their Fee te slipped, or were thrust forward by any: yet they fell one upon another in the straights, and ran so in heapes together that they cast themselves away, for feare of the ROMANES Swords that lighted upon them in every corner. And there Marcus Cato, that never made Ceremony or tincnesse to praise himselfe openly, nor reckoned it any shame to doe it, did take a present occasion for it, as falleth out upon all Victory and famous exploits: and so did set it out with all the ostentation and brave words he could give. For he wrote with his owne hands; and such as saw him chafe and lay upon his flying Enemies that day, were driven to say, that Cato was not bound to the ROMANES, but the ROMANES bound unto Cato. And then Manius the Consull selfe, being in a great heate with the fury of the Battell, embraced Cato a great while, that was also hot with chafing of the Enemy, and spake aloud with great joy before them all, that neither he, nor the People of ROME could recompence Cato, for his valiant service that day. After this Battell, the Consull Manius sent Cato to ROME, to be the messenger himselfe to report the News of the Victory. So he embarked incontinently, and had such a faire winde, that he passed over the Seas to BRINDIS without any danger, and went from thence unto TARENTUM in one day, and from TARENTUM in foure daies more to ROME. And so he came to ROME in five daies after his landing in ITALY, and made such speed that himselfe was indeed the first messenger that brought News of the Victory. Whereupon he filled all ROME with joy and Sacrifices, and made the ROMANES so proude, that ever after, they thought themselves able men to conquer the world both by Sea and Land. And these be all the martiall deedes and Noble Acts Cato did. But for his doings in civill policy and State, he seemed to be of his opinion: that to accuse and pursue the wicked, he thought it was the best thing an honest man and good governour of the Common-wealth could employ himselfe unto: for he accused many, and subscribed many other accusations which they preferred. And to be short, he did alwaies stirre up some accuser, as he did Petilius against Scipio. But Scipio, by reason of his Nobility, the greatnesse of his Houle, and the magnanimity of his minde, passed not for any accusation they could lay against him: being out of all feare, they should be able to condemne him: and so let fall the accusation he had against him. Notwithstanding, he joynd with other that accused Lucius Scipio, his owne Brother, and followed the matter to fore against him, that he caused him to be condemned in a great summe of Money to the Common-wealth: who being unable to pay the fine, had gone to prison, and hardly scaped it, had not the Tribunes of the People revoked his condemnation. It is said that Cato coming through the Market-place one day, and meeting with a young man by the way that had overthrowne his adversary in suite, and put one of his late Fathers greatest Enemies to open shame and foile before the People, he embraced him with a good countenance, and said unto him: Oh my Sonne, Sacrifices that good Children should offer to their Fathers soule, be not Lambes nor Kiddes, but the Teares and condemnations of their Enemies. But as he vexed other, so he scaped not free himselfe from danger, in administration of the Common-wealth. For if they could catch the least vantage in the world of him, his Enemies straight accused him: so as they say he was accused almost fifty times, and at the last time of his accusation, he was about the age of fourescore yeares. And then he spake a thing openly that was noted: That it was a harder thing to give up an account of his life before men in any other world, then in this amongst whom he lived. And yet was not this the last time he followed: for foure yeares after, when he was fourescore and Ten yeares of age, he accused Servius Galba. And thus he lived as Nestor, in manner three ages of man, alwaies in continuall suite and action. For when he wrestled with the first Scipio the AFRICAN about matters of State and Common-wealth, he went on unto the time of the second, that was adopted by the first *Scipio*es Sonne, the naturall Sonne of Paulus Emilius, who overcame Perseus, King of MACEDON. Furthermore, Marcus Cato Ten yeares after his Consulship, sued to be Censor, which was in ROME the greatest Office of dignity that any Citizen of ROME could attaine unto : and as a man may say, the ROME of all glory and Honour of their Common-wealth. For among other authori- ties, the Censor had power to examine mens lives and manners, and to punish every offender. For the ROMANS were of that minde, that they would not have men marry, beget Children, live privately by themselves, and make Feasts and banquets at their pleasure, but that they should stand in feare to be reprovred and enquired of by the Magistrate : and that it was not good to give every body liberty, to doe what they would, following his owne lust and fancy. And they judging that mens naturall dispositions do appeare more in such things, then in all other things that are openly done at Noone daies, and in the sight of the world, used to choose two Censors, that were two Surveyors of manners, to see that every man behaved himselfe virtuously, and gave not them- selves to pleasure, nor to breake the Laws and customes of the Common-wealth. These Officers were called in their tongue, Censores, and alwaies of custome, one of them was a PATRICIAN, and the other a Commoner. These two had power and authority to disgrace a Knight, by taking a- way his Horse, and to put any off the Senate, whom they saw live dissolutely and disorderly. It was their Office also, to fesse and rate every Citizen according to the estimation of their goods ; to note the age, genealogie, and degrees of every man, and to keep Books of them, besides many o- ther prerogatives they had belonging to their Office. Therefore when Cato came to sue for this Of- fice among other, the chiefeest Senators were all bent against him. Some of them for very envy, thinking it shame and dishonour to the Nobility, to suffer men that were meanelly borne, and up- starts (the first of their House and Name, that ever came to beare Office in the State) to be called and preferred unto their highest Offices of State in all their Common-wealth. Other also that were ill livers, and knowing that they had offended the Lawes of their Country, they feared his cruelty too much, imagining he would spare no man, nor pardon any offence, having the Law in his owne hands. So when they had consulted together about it, they did set up seven Competitors against him, who flattered the People with many faire words and promises, as though they had need of Magistrates to use them gently, and to doe things for to please them. But Cato contrariwise, shew- ing, no countenance that he would use them gently, in the Office, but openly in the Pulpit for O- rations, threatening those that had lived naughtily and wickedly, he cried out : that they must re- forme their City, and perfwade the People not to choose the gentlest, but the sharpest Phisiti- ons : and that himselfe was such a one as they needed, and among the PATRICIANS Valerius Flaccus another, in whose company he hoped (they two being chosen Censors) to doe great good unto the Common-wealth, by burning and cutting off (like Hydraes Heads) all vanity and volup- tuous pleasures, that were crept in amongst them : and that he saw well enough, how all the other suters sought the Office by dishonest meanes, fearing such Officers as they knew would deale ju- stly and uprightly. Then did the People of ROME shew themselves Nobly minded, and worthy of Noble governours. For they refused not the sowrenesse or severity of Cato, but rejected these Meale-mouthed men, that seemed ready to please the People in all things : and thereupon chose Marcus Cato Censor, and Valerius Flaccus to be his fellow, and they did obey him, as if he had bene present Officer, and no suter for the Office, being in themselves to give it to whom they thought good. The first thing he did after he was staled in his Censorship, was that he named Lucius Valerius Flaccus his friend and fellow Censor with him, Prince of the Senate : and among many other also whom he thrust out of the Senate ; he put Lucius Quintius Flaminius off the Se- nate, that had bene Consull seven yeares before, and was Brother also unto Titus Quintius Fla- minius that overcame Philip King of MACE DON in Battell, which was greater glory to him, then that he had bene Consull. But the cause why he put him off the Senate, was this : This Lu- cius Quintius carried ever with him a young Boy to the Warres, whom he gave as good counte- nance and credit unto, as to any of his best familiar friends he had about him. It fortuned one time whilest Lucius Quintius was Consull and Governor of a Province, that he made a Feast, and this Boy being set at his Table, hard by him, as his manner was, he began to flatter him, know- ing how to handle him when he was pretily merry : and soothing him, told him he loved him so dearly, that upon his departing from ROME, when the Sword-players were ready to fight for life and death with unbated Swords. To shew the People pastime, he came his way, and left the sight of that he never saw, that was very desirous to have seen a man killed. Then this Lucius Quintius, to make him see the like, said : care not for the sight thou hast lost, Boy, for I will let thee see as much. And when he had spoken these words, he commanded a Prisoner condemned to die, to be fetched and brought into his Hall before him, and the Hang-man with his Axe : which was forthwith done accord- ing to his commandement. Then asked he the Boy, if he would straight see the man killed : Yea sir said the Boy : and with that he bade the Hang-man strike off his head. Most writers report this matter thus : And Cicero to confirme it also, wrote in his Booke de Senectute, that the same was written in an Oration Cato made before the People of ROME. Now Lucius Quintius being thus shamefully put off the Senate by Cato, his Brother Titus being offended withall, could not tell what to doe, but besought the People that they would command Cato to declare the cause, why he brought such shame unto his House. Whereupon Cato openly before the People made recital of all this Feast. And when Lucius denied it, affirming it was not so : Cato would have him sworne before them all, that it was not true they had burdened him withall. But Lucius prayed them to pardon him, who said he would not sweare : whereupon the People judged straight that he deserved well that shame. So not long af- ter, certain Games being shewed in the Theater, Lucius came thither, and passing beyond the ordinary ordinary place that was appointed for those that had bene Consuls, he went to sit aloofe off a- mongst the multitude. The People tooke pity on him, and made such ado about him, as they forced him to rise, and to go sit among the other Senators that had bene Consuls : salving the best they could, the shame and dishonour happened unto so Noble a House. Cato put out of the Senate also, one Manlius, who was in great towardlinesse to have bene made Consull : the next yeare following, onely because he kissed his Wife too lovingly in the day time, and before his Daughter : and reprooving him for it, he told him, his Wife never kissed him, but when it thun- dered. So when he was disposed to be merry, he would say it was happy with him when Jupiter thundered. He tooke away Lucius Scipios Horse from him, that had triumphed for the Victories he had wonne of the great King Antiochus : which wanne him much ill will, because it appeared to the world he did it of purpose, for the malice he did bear Scipio the AFRICAN, that was dead. But the thing that most grieved the People, of all other extremities he used, was his putting downe of all Feasts and vaine expences. For a man to take it cleane away, and to be openly seene in it, it was impossible, because it was so common a thing, and every man was given so to it. Therefore Cato to fetch it about indirectly, did praise every Citizens goods, and rated their Apparell, their Coaches, their Litters, their Wives Chaines, and Jewels, and all other moveables and Household- stuffe, that had cost above a thousand five hundred Drachmes a peece, at ten times as much as they were worth : to the end that such as had bestowed their money in those curious trifles, should pay so much more subsidie to the maintenance of the Common-wealth, as their goods were overvalued at. Moreover he ordained for every thousand Asles that those trifling things were praised at, the own- ers thereof should pay three thousand Asles to the common treasure : to the end that they who were grieved with this Tax, and saw other pay lesse subsidie (that were as much worth as themselves, by living without such Toyes) might call home themselves againe : and lay aside such foolish bravery and finensse. Notwithstanding, Cato was envied every way. First, of them that were con- tented to pay the Tax imposed, rather then they would leave their vanity : and next, of them also, that would rather reforme themselves, then pay the Tax. And some thinke that this Law was de- vised rather to take away their goods, then to let them to make any shew of them : and they have a fond opinion besides, that their riches are better seene in superfluous things, then in neces- sary. Whereat they say Aristotle the Philosopher did wonder more, then at any other thing : how men could thinke them more rich and happy, that had many curious and superfluous things, then those that had necessary and profitable things. And Scopas the THESSALIAN, when one of his familiar Friends asked him I know not what tri- fling thing, and to make him grant it the sooner, told him it was a thing he might well spare, and did him no good : Marry said he, as the goods I have, are in such Toyes as do me no good. So this covetous desire we have to be rich, cometh of no necessary desire in nature, but is bread in us by a false opinion from the Common sort. Now Cato caring least of all for the exclamations they made against him, grew to be more straight and severe. For he cut off the pipes and quils private men had made to convey Water into their Houses and Gardens, robbing the City of the Water that came from their common Conduit heads, and did pluck downe also mens Porches that were made before their Doores into the Streer, and brought downe the prizes of common workes in the City, and moreover raised the common Farmes and customes of the City, as high as he could, all which things together made him greatly hated and envied of most men. Wherefore Titus Flaminius, and certaine other being bent against him in open Senate, caused all Catoes covenants and bargaines made with the Master Work-man, for repairing and mending of the common buildings and Holy places, to be made voide, as things greatly prejudiciall to the Common-wealth. And they did also stirre up the boldest and rashest of the Tribunes of the People against him, be- cause they should accuse him unto the People, and make request he might be condemned in the summe of two Talents. They did marvellously hinder also the building of the Pallace he built at the charge of the Common-wealth, looking into the Marker-place under the Senate-house : which Pallace was finished notwithstanding, and called after his Name, Basilica Porcia : as who would say, the Pallace Porcia the Censor built. Howbeit it seemed the People of ROME did greatly like and commend his government in the Censorship : for they set up a Statue of him in the Temple of the goddesse of Health, whereunder they wrote not his Victories nor triumph, but onely ingra- ved this inscription word for word, to this effect by translation : For the honour of Marcus Cato the Censor : because he reformed the discipline of the Common-wealth of ROME (that was farre out of order, and given to licentious life) by his wife precepts, good manners, and Holy instituti- ons. Indeed, before this Image was set up for him, he was wont to mocke at them that delighted, and were desirous of such things : saying, they did not consider how they bragged in Founders, Painters, and Image-makers, but nothing of their Vertues : and that for himselfe, the People did al- waies carry lively Images of him in their hearts, meaning the memory of his life and doings. When some wondered why divers meane men and unknowne persons had Images set up of them, and there were none of him, he gave them this answer : I had rather men should aske why Cato had no Image set up for him, then why he had any. In the end, he would have no honest man abide to be praised, unlesse his praise turned to the benefit of the Common-wealth : and yet was he one of them that would most praise himselfe. So that if any had done a fault, or stept awrie, and that men had gone about to reprove them, he would say they were not to be blamed, for they were no Catoes that did offend. came short of his manner, he called them left handed Catoes. He would say that in most dangerous times the Senate used to cast their eyes upon him, as passengers on the Sea do look upon the Master of the Ship in a storme: and that many times when he was absent, the Senate would put over matters of importance, untill he might come among them. And this is confirmed to be true as well by other as by himself. His Authority was great in matters of State, for his wisdom, his eloquence, and great experience. Besides this commendation, they praised him for a good Father to his Children, a good Husband to his Wife, and a good favor for his profit: for he was never careless of them, as things to be lightly passed on. And therefore he thinks I must needs tell you by the way some part of his well doing, to follow our declaration of him. First of all he married a Gentlewoman more Noble then rich, knowing that either of both would make her proud and stout enough: but yet he thought the Nobler born, would be the more ashamed of dishonesty, then the meaner born: and therefore they would be more obedient to their Husbands, in all honest manner and reasonable things. Furthermore, he said: that he that beate his Wife or his Child, did commit as great a sacrilege, as if he polluted or spoiled the holiest things of the world: and he thought it a greater praise for a man to be a good Husband then a good Senatour. And therefore he thought nothing more commendable in the life of old Socrates, then his patience, in using his Wife well, that was such a threw, and his Children that were so hare-brained. After Cato's Wife had brought him a Sonne, he could not have so earnest businesse in hand, if it had not touched the Common-wealth, but he would let all alone, to go home to his Houfe, about the time his Wife did unfwaddle the young Boy to wash and shift him: for she gave it sucke with her own Breasts, and many times would let the slaves Children sucke of her also, because they might have a naturall love towards her Sonne, having suckt one milke, and been brought up together. When his Sonne was come to age of discretion, and that he was able to learne any thing, Cato himself did teach him, notwithstanding he had a slave in his Houfe called Chilo (a very honest man, and a good Grammarian) who did also teach many other: but as he said himself, he did not like a slave should rebuke his Sonne, nor pull him by the eares, when peradventure he was not apt to take very fodainly that was taught him: neither would he have his Sonne bound to a slave for so great a matter as that, as to have his learning of him. Wherefore he himself taught him his Grammer, the Law, and to exercise his Body, not onely to throw a Dart, to play at the Sword, to vault, to ride a Horse, and to handle all sorts of weapons, but also to fight with fists, to abide cold and heate, and to swim over a swift running River. He said moreover, that he wrote goodly Histories in great letters with his owne hand, because his Son might learne in his Fathers Houfe the Vertues of good men in times past, that he taking example by their doings, should frame his life to excell them. He said also that he tooke as great heed of speaking any foule or uncomely words before his Sonne, as he would have done if he had been before the Vestall Nunnes. He never was in the hot Houfe with his Sonne: for it was a common use with the ROMANES at that time, that the Sonnes in Law did not bathe themselves with their Fathers in Law, but were ashamed to see one another naked. But afterwards they having learned of the GREEKES to wash themselves naked with men, it taught them also to be naked in the bathe even with their Wives. There lacked no towardsness, nor good disposition in Cato's Sonne, to frame himselfe Vertuous: for he was of so good a nature, that he shewed himselfe willing to follow whatsoever his Father had taught him. Howbeit he was such a weakeling, that he could not away with much hardnesse, and therefore his Father was contented not to binde him to that straight and painefull life, which himselfe had kept. Yet he became valiant in the Warres. For he fought marvellous stoutly in the Battell, in which Perseus King of MACEDON was overthrowne by Paulus Emilius: where his sword being striken out of his hand, with a great blow that lighted on it, and by reason his hand was somewhat swayed besides, he fell into a great fury, and prayed some of his friends to helpe him to recover it. So they all together ranne upon the Enemies in that place where his sword fell out of his hand, and came in so fiercely on them, that they made a lane through them; and clearing the place, found it in the end, but with much ado, being under such a heape of dead Bodies and other weapons as well ROMANES as MACEDONIAS, one lying on another. Paulus Emilius the Generall hearing of this Act of his, did highly commend the young man. And at this day their is a Letter extant from Cato to his Son, in the which he praiseth this worthy Fact and toile of his, for the recovering of his sword againe. Afterwards, this Cato the younger married Teritia, one of Paulus Emilius Daughters, and Sister unto Scipio the second, and so was matched in this Noble Houfe, not only for his owne Vertues sake, but for respect of his Fathers dignity and authority: whereby the great care, pains and study that Cato the Father tooke in bringing up his Sonne, in Vertue and Learning, was honourably rewarded in the happy bestowing of his Sonne. He ever had a great number of young little slaves which he bought, when any would sell their Prisoners in the Warres. He did chuse them thus young, because they were apt yet to learne any thing he would traine them unto, and that a man might breake them like young Colts, or little Whelps. But none of them all, how many soever he had, did ever goe to any mans house, but when himselfe or his Wife did send them. If any man askt them what Cato did: they answered, they could not tell. And when they were within, either they must needs be occupied about somewhat, or else they must sleepe: for he loved them well that were sleepey, holding opinion that slaves that loved sleepe were more tractable and willing to do any thing a man would set them to, then those that were waking. And

And because he thought that nothing did more provoke slaves to mischief and naughtinesse, then lust and desire of Women: he was contented his slaves might comany with his bondwomen in his Houfe, for a piece of money he appointed them to pay, but with straight commandment besides; that none of them should deal with any other woman abroad. At the first when he gave himselfe to follow the Warres, and was not greatly rich, he never was angry for any fault his Servants did about his person: saying that it was a foule thing for a Gentleman or Nobleman, to fall out with his Servants for his belly. Afterwards as he rose to better state, and grew to be wealthier, if he had made a Dinner or Supper for any of his Friends and familiars, they were no sooner gone, but he would scourge them with whips and leather thongs, that had not waited as they should have done at the board, or had forgotten any thing he would have had done. He would ever craftily make one of them fall out with another: for he could not abide they should be friends, being ever jealous of that. If any of them had done a fault that deserved death, he would declare his offence before them all: and then if they condemned him to die, he would put him to death before them all: Howbeit in his latter time he grew greedy, and gave up his tillage, saying that it was more pleasant then profitable. Therefore because he would lay out his money freely, and bring a certaine revenue to his Purse, he bestowed it upon Ponds, and naturall hot bathes, and places fit for fullers craft; upon Medows and Pastures, upon copises and young wood: and of all these he made a great and a more quiet revenue yearly, which he would say, Jupiter himselfe could not diminish. Furthermore he was a great usurer, both by Land and by Sea: and the usury he took by Sea, was most extreme of all others, for he used it in this sort. He would have them to whom he lent his money unto, that trafficked by Sea, to have many partners, to the number of fifty: and that they should have so many Ships. Then he would venture among them for a part onely, whereof Quintius his slave whom he had manumitted, was made his factor, and used to saile and trafficke with the Merchants, to whom he had lent his money out to usury. And thus he did not venture all the money he lent, but a little peece onely for his part, and got marvellous riches by his usury. Moreover he lent money to any of his slaves, that would therewith buy other young slaves, whom they taught and brought up to do service; at Cato's charge and cost: and then they sold them againe at the yeares end, and some of them Cato kept for his owne service, and gave his slaves as much for them as any other offered. Therefore to allure his Sonne in like manner to make profit of his money, he told him it was no wise mans part to diminish his Substance, but rather the part of a Widow. Yet this was a token of a most greedy covetous minde, that he durst affirme him to be divine, and worthy immortall praise, that increased his Wealth and patrimony more then his Father left him. Furthermore when Cato was grown very old Carneades the ACADEMICK, and Diogenes the STOICK, were sent from ATHENS as Ambassadors to ROME, to sue for a release of a fine of five hundred Talents which they had imposed on the ATHENIANS upon a condemnation passed against them for a contempt of appearance, by the sentence of the SEYTHONIANS, at the suite of the OROPIANS. Immediately when these two Philosophers were arrived in the City of ROME, the young Gentlemen that were given to their Books, did visit and welcome them, and gave great reverence to them after they had heard them speake, and specially to Carneades: whole grace in speaking, and force of perswading was no lesse then the same ranne of him, and specially when he was to speake in so great an audience, and before such a State, as would not suppress his praise. ROME straight was full, as if a winde had blown this rumour into every mans eare: that there was a GREEK arrived, a famous Learned man, who with his eloquence would leade a man as he list. There was no other talke a while through the whole City, he had so inflamed the young Gentlemens minds with love and desire to be learned: that all other pleasures and delights were set aside, and they disposed themselves to no other exercise, but to the study of Philosophie, as if some secret and divine inspiration from above had procured them to it. Whereof the Lords and Senators of ROME were glad; and rejoiced much to see their youth so well given to knowledge, and to the study of the Greeke tongue, and to delight in the companie of these two great and excellent learned men. But Marcus Cato, even from the beginning that young men began to study the Greeke tongue, and that it grew in estimation in ROME, did dislike of it: fearing lest the youth of ROME that were desirous of learning and eloquence, would utterly give over the honour and glory of Armes. Furthermore, when he saw the estimation and fame of these two personages did increase more and more, and in such sort that Caius Aquilius, one of the chieft of the Senate made sute to be their interpreter: he determined then to convey them out of the City by some honest meane and colour. So he openly found fault one day in the Senate, that the Ambassadors were long there, and had not dispatch: considering also they were cunning men, and could easily perswade what they would. And if there were no other respect, this onely might perswade them to determine some answer for them, and so to send them home againe to their Schooles, to teach their Children of GREECE, and to let alone the Children of ROME, that they might learne to obey the Laws and the Senate, as they had done before. Now he spake thus to the Senate, not of any private ill will or malice he bare to Carneades, as some men thought: but because he generally hated Philosophie, and of ambition despised the Muses and knowledge of the Greeke tongue. Which was the more suspected, because he had said, the ancient Socrates was but a busie man, and a stirrer up of sedition, and sought by all meanes possible to usurp Tyranny and rule in his Countrey: but perverting and changing the manners and customes of the same, and alluring the subjects thereof to a disliking of their Laws and ancient customes.

And he laughed at Socrates Schoole, that taught the art of Eloquence: saying his Schollers waxed old, and were still so long in learning, that they meant to use their Eloquence and pleade Causes in another world before Minos, when they were dead. Therefore to plucke his Sonne from the study of the Greeke tongue, he said to him with a strained voice, and in a bigger sound then he was wont to do: (as if he had spoken to him by way of prophetic or inspiration) that so long as the ROMANES dipoted themselves to study the Greeke tongue, so long would they marre and bring all to nought. And yet time hath proved his vaine words false and untrue. For the City of ROME did never flourish so much, nor the ROMANE Empire was ever so great, as at that time, when Learning and the Greeke tongue most flourished. Howbeit Cato did not only hate the Philosophers of GREECE, but did dislike them also that professed Physicke in ROME. For he had either heard or read the answer Hippocrates made, when the King of PERSIA sent for him, and offered him a great summe of Gold and Silver, if he would come and serve him: who sware he would never serve the barbarous People that were naturall Enemies to the GREGIANS. So Cato affirmed it was an Oath that all other Physicians sware ever after: wherefore he commanded his Sonne to flee from them all alike, and said he had Written a little Booke of Physicke, with the which he did heale those of his House when they were sicke, and did keepe them in Health, when they were whole. He never forbade them to eate, but did alwaies bring them up with Herbs, and certaine light Meates, as Mallard, Ring-doves and Hares: for such meates, said he, are good for the sick, and light digestion, saving that they make them dreame and Snort that eate them. He boasted also how with this manner of Physicke, he did alwaies keepe himselfe in Health, and his family from sicknesse. Yet for all that, I take it, he did not all that he bragged of: for he buried both his Wife and his Sonne also. But he himselfe was of a strong nature, and a lusty body, full of Strength and Health, and lived long without sicknesse: so that when he was a very old man and past marriage, he loved Women well, and married a young Maiden for that cause only. After his first Wife was dead, he married his Sonne unto Paulus Amylius Daughter, the Sister of Scipio, the second AFRICAN. Cato himselfe being a widower, tooke paines with a pretty young Maide that waited in his House, and came by stealth to his Chamber: howbeit his haunt could not long continue secret in his House, and specially where there was a young Gentlewoman married, but needs must be spied. So one day when the young Maide went somewhat boldly by the Chamber of young Cato, to go to his Father, the young man said never a word at it: yet his Father perceived that he was somewhat ashamed, and gave the Maide no good countenance. Wherefore finding that his Sonne and Daughter in Law were angry with the matter, saying nothing to them of it, nor shewing them any ill countenance: he went one morning to the Market place (as his manner was with a traine that followed him, amongst whom was one Salonius that had bene his Clarke, and waited upon him as the rest did. Cato calling him out aloud by his Name, asked him if he had not yet bestowed his Daughter. Salonius answered him, he had not yet bestowed her, nor would not before he made him privy to it. Then Cato told him againe: I have found out a Husband for her, and a Sonne in law for thee, and it will be no ill match for her unlesse she mislike the age of the Man; for indeed he is very old, but otherwise there is no fault in him. Salonius told him againe as for that matter he referred all to him, and his Daughter also, praying him even to make what match he thought good for her: for she was his humble Servant, and relied wholly upon him, standing in need of his favour and furtherance. Then Cato began to discover, and told him plainley he would willingly marry her himself. Salonius therewith was abashed, because he thought Cato was too old to marry then, and himselfe was no fit man to match in any honourable House, specially with a Confull, and one that had triumphed: howbeit in the end, when he saw Cato meant good earnest, he was very glad of the match, and so with this talke they went on together to the Market place, and agreed then upon the marriage. Now while they went about this matter, Cato the Sonne taking some of his kinne and friends with him, went unto his Father, to aske him if he had offended him in any thing, that for spite he should bring him a Steppemother into his House. Then his Father cried out, and said: O my Sonne, I pray thee say not so, I like well all thou doest, and I find no cause to complaine of thee: but I doe it, because I desire to have many Children, and to leave many such like Citizens as thou art, in the Common-wealth. Some say that Pisistratus the Tyrant of ATHENS, such a like answer made unto the Children of his first Wife, which were men growne when he married his second Wife Timonassa, of the Towne of ARGO, of whom he had (as it is reported) Iophon, and Thestalus. But to returne againe to Cato, he had a Sonne by his second Wife, whom he named after her Name, Cato SALONIAN: and his Eldest Sonne died in his Office being Prætor, of whom he often speaketh in divers of his Bookes commending him for a very honest man. And they say, he tooke the death of him very patiently, and like a grave wife man, not leaving therefore to doe any service or business for the State, otherwise then he did before. And therein he did not as, Lucius Lucullus, and Metellus surnamed Pius, did afterwards: who gave up meddling any more with matters of government and State, after they were waxen old. For he thought it a charge and duty, whereunto every honest man whilest he lived was bound in all piety. Nor as Scipio AFRICAN had done before him, who perceiving that the glory and fame of his doings did but purchase him the ill will of his Citizens, he changed the rest of his life into quietnesse, and forsooke the City and all dealings in Common-wealth, and went and dwelt in the Countrey. But as their was one that told Dionysius the Tyrant SYRACUSA, as it is written, that he could not die more honourably, then to be buried in the Tyranny: even so did Cato thinke, that he could not

not waxe more honestly old, then in serving of the Common-wealth unto his dying day. So at vacant times, when Cato was desirous a little to recreate and refresh himselfe, he passed his time away in making of Bookes, and looking upon his Husbandry in the Countrey. This is the cause why he wrote so many kinds of Bookes, and Stories. But his tillage and Husbandry in the Countrey, he did tend and follow in his youth, for his profit. For he said he had but two sorts of revenue, Tillage and sparing: but in age whatsoever he did in the Countrey, it was all for pleasure. and to learne something ever of nature. For he hath written a Booke of the Countrey life, and of Tillage, in the which he sheweth how to make Tartes and Cakes, and how to keepe fruits: he would needs shew such singularity and skill in all things. When he was in his House in the Countrey, he fared a little better then he did in other places, and would oftentimes bid his neighbours, and such as had Land lying about him, to come and Suppe with him, and he would be merry with them: so that his company was not onely pleasant and liking to old folkes as himselfe, but also to the younger fort. For he had seen much, and had experience in many things, and used much pleasant talke profitable for the hearers. He thought the boord one of the chiefest meanes to breed love amongst men, and at his owne Table would alwaies praise good men and virtuous Citizens, but would suffer no talke of evil men, neither in their praise nor dispraise. Now it is thought the last notable act and service he did in the Common-wealth, was the overthrow of CARTHAGE: for indeed he that wan it and razed it utterly, was Scipio the second, but it was chiefly through Catoes counsell and advice, that the last Warre was taken in hand against the CARTHAGINIANS, and chanced upon this occasion. Cato was sent into AFRICKE to understand the cause and controversie that was betwene the CARTHAGINIANS and Massinissa, King of NUMIDIA, which were at great Warres together. And he was sent thither because King Massinissa had ever bene a friend unto the ROMANES, and for that the CARTHAGINIANS were become their confederates since the last Warres, in the which they were overthrown by Scipio the first, who tooke for a fine of them a great part of their Empire, and imposed upon them besides, a great yearly tribute. Now when he was come into that Countrey, he found not the City of CARTHAGE in misery, beggery, and out of heart, as the ROMANES supposed: but full of lusty youths, very rich and wealthy, and great store of Armour and munition in it for the Warres, so that by reason of the wealth thereof, CARTHAGE carried a high saile, and stooped not for a little. Wherefore he thought that it was more then time for the ROMANES to leave to understand the controversies betwixt the CARTHAGINIANS and Massinissa, and rather to provide betimes to destroy CARTHAGE, that hath ever bene an ancient Enemy to the ROMANES, and ever fought to be revenged of that they had suffered at their hands before, and that they were now growne to that greatness and courage in so short time, as in manner it was incredible: so as it was likely they would fall into as great enmity with the ROMANES, as ever they did before. Therefore so soone as he returned to ROME, he plainely told the Senate, that the losses and harmes the CARTHAGINIANS had received by the last Warres they had with them, had not so much diminished their Power and Strength, as the same had shewed their owne folly and lacke of wisdom: for it was to be feared much, lest their late troubles had made them more skillfull, then weakened them for the Warres. And that they made Warres now with the NUMIDIANS, to exercise them onely, meaning afterwards to Warre with themselves: and that the peace they had made with them, was but an intermission and stay of Warres, onely expecting time and opportunity to breake with them againe. They say moreover, that besides the persuasions he used, he brought with him of purpose AFRICKE Figgs in his long sleeves, which he shooke out amongst them in the Senate: and when the Senators marvelled to see so goodly faire Greene Figges, he said: the Countrey that beareth them, is not above three dayes sailing from ROME. But yet this is more strange which they report of him besides: that he never declared his opinion in any matter in the Senate after that, but this was ever the one end of his tale: Me thinketh still CARTHAGE would be utterly destroyed. Publius Scipio Nafica, used ever in like manner the contrary speech: that he thought it meete CARTHAGE should stand. This Publius Scipio saw, in my opinion, that the ROMANES through their pride and insolency were full of absurdities, and carried themselves very high by reason of their happy successe and Victories, and were so lofty minded, that the Senate could hardly rule them: and that by reason of their great authority, they imagined they might bring their City to what height they would. Therefore he spake it that the feare of CARTHAGE might alwaies continue as a Bridle, to raine in the insolency of the People of ROME, who knew well enough, that the CARTHAGINIANS were of no sufficient power to make Warres with the ROMANES, nor yet to overcome them: and even so were they not wholly to be despised, and not to be feared at all. Cato still replied to the contrary, that therein consisted the greatest danger of all: that a City which was ever of great force and Power, and had been punished for former Warres and misery, would alwaies have an eye of revenge to their Enemies, and be much like a Horse that had broken his Haltar, that being unbridled, would runne upon his rider. And therefore he thought it no good nor sound advice, so to suffer the CARTHAGINIANS to recover their strength, but rather they ought altogether to take away all outward danger, and the feare they stood in to lose their conquest: and specially, when they left meanes within the City selfe to fall still againe to their former rebellion. And this is the cause why they suppose Cato was the occasion of the third and last War the ROMANES had against the CARTHAGINIANS. But now when the Warre was begun, Cato died, and before his death he prophesied, as man would say, who it should be that should end those Warres. And it was Scipio the second, who being a young man at that time, had charge onely ly as a Colonel over a thousand Footmen : but in all Battels, and whereſoever there was Warres, he ſhewed himſelfe ever valiant and wife. Inſomuch as Newes being brought thereof continually unto ROME, and Cato hearing them, ſpeake (as they ſay) theſe two Verſes of Homer :

This onely man right wife reputed is to be,

All other ſeeme but ſhadowes, ſet by ſuch wife men as he.

Which Prophecy Scipio ſoone after confirmed true by his doings. Moreover, the iſſue Cato left behind him, was a Sonne he had by his ſecond Wife : who was called (as we ſaid before) Cato SALONIAN, by reaſon of his Mother, and a little Boy of this Eldeſt Son that died before him. This Cato SALONIAN died being Prætor, but he left a Sonne behind him that came to be Conſull, and was Grandfather unto Cato the Philoſopher, one of the moſt vertuous men of his time.

THE COMPARISON OF ARISTIDES with MARCUS CATO.

Aristides and Catoes acceſſe to the Common-wealth.

OW that we have ſet downe in writing, theſe notable and worthy things of memory : if we will conſerre the Life of the one, with the Life of the other, perhaps the difference betweene the one and the other will not eaſily be diſcerned, ſeeing their be ſo many ſimilitudes and reſemblances one of another. But if we come to compare them in every particularity, as we would do Poets Workes, or Pictures drawne in Tables : firſt, in this we ſhall finde them much alike, that having had nothing elſe to perſerre and commend them, but their onely Vertue and wiſdome, they have beene both Governours in their Common-wealth, and have thereby atchieved to great honour and eſtimation. But me thinks when Aristides came to deale in matters of State, the Common-wealth and Seigniority of ATHENS being then of no great Power, it was eaſie for him to advance himſelfe, becauſe the other Governours and Captaines of his time, and that were Competitors with him, were not very rich, nor of great Authority. For the Tax of the richeſt Perſons then at ATHENS in revenue, was but at five Hundred buſhels of Corne and upwards, and therefore were ſuch called Pentacoſiomedimi. The ſecond Tax was but at three hundred buſhels, and they were called Knights. The third and laſt was at two hundred buſhels, and they called them Zeugitæ. Where Marcus Cato coming out of a little Village from a rude Countrey life, went at the firſt daſh (as it were) to plunge himſelf into a bottomleſſe Sea, of Government in the Common-wealth of ROME : which was not ruled then by ſuch Governours and Captaines, as Curius Fabricius, and Oſtilius were in old time. For the People of ROME did no more beſtow their Offices upon ſuch meane labouring men, as came but lately from the Plough and the Mattocke : but they would looke now upon the Nobility of their Houſes, and upon their riches that gave them moſt Money, or ſued earneſtly to them for the Office. And by reaſon of their great Power and Authority, they would be waited upon and ſued unto, by thoſe that fought to beare the honourable Offices of the State and Common-wealth. And it was no like match nor compariſon, to have Themistocles an advaſary and Competitor, being neither of Noble Houſe, nor greatly rich (for they ſay that all the goods his Father left him, were not worth above foure or five hundred Talents, when he began to deale in State) in reſpect as to contend for the chiefeſt place of Honour and Authority againſt Scipio AFRICAN, Servilius Galba, or Quintus Flaminius, having no other maintenance, nor helpe to truſt unto, but

but a tongue ſpeaking boldly with reaſon and all uprightneſſe. Moreover, Aristides at the Battels of MARATHON, and of PLATÆS, was but one of the Ten Captaines of the ATHENIANS : where Cato was choſen one of the two Conſuls among many other Noble and great Competitors, and one of the two Cenſors, before ſeven other that made ſuite for it, which were all men of great reputation in the City; and yet was Cato preferred before them all. Furthermore, Aristides was never the chiefeſt in any Victory. For at the Battell of MARATHON, Miltiades was the General : and at the Battell of SALAMINA, Themistocles : and at the journey of PLATÆS, King Panſanias as Herodotus ſaith, who writeth that he had a marvellous Victory there. And there were that ſtrived with Aristides for the ſecond place, as Sophanes, Amyntas, Callimachus, and Cynegirus, every one of the which did notable valiant ſervice at thoſe Battels. Now Cato was General himſelfe, and chiefe of all his Army in worthineſſe and Counſell, during the Warre he made in SPAIN while he was Conſull. Afterwards alſo in the journey where King Antiochus was overthrowne in the Countrey of THERMOPILES, Cato being but a Colonel of a thouſand Footmen, and ſerving under another that was Conſull, wanne the Honour of the Victory, when he did ſuddenly ſet upon Antiochus behind, whereas he looked onely to defend himſelfe before. And that Victory without all doubt was one of the chiefeſt Acts that ever Cato did, who drave ASIA out of GREECE, and opened the way unto Lucius Scipio to paſſe afterwards into ASIA. So then for the Warres, neither the one nor the other of them was ever overcome in Battell : but in peace and civill Government, Aristides was ſupplanted by Themistocles, who by practice got him to be baniſhed ATHENS for a time. Whereas Cato had in manner all the greateſt and Nobleſt men of ROME that were in his time, ſworne Enemies unto him, and having alwaies contended with them even to his laſt houre, he ever kept himſelfe on ſound ground, like a ſtout Champion, and never tooke fall nor foile. For he having accuſed many before the People, and many alſo accuſing him, himſelfe was never once condemned, but alwaies his tongue was the Buckler and defence of his Life and innocency. Which was to him ſo neceſſary a weapon, and with it he could helpe himſelfe in ſo great matters, that (in my opinion it was the onely cauſe why he never received diſhonour, nor was unjuſtly condemned : rather then for any thing elſe he was beholding to Fortune, or to any other that did protect him. And truly, Eloquence is a ſingular gift, as Antipater witneſſeth, in that he wrote of Aristotle the Philoſopher after his death : ſaying that amongst many other ſingular graces and perfections in him, he had this rare gift, that he could perſwade what he liſted. Now there is a rule conſeſſed of all the world, that no man can attaine any greater vertue or knowledge, then to know how to governe a multitude of men, or a City : a part whereof is Oeconomia, commonly called Houſe-rule, conſidering that a City is no other, then an aſſembly of many houſholds and Houſes together; and then is the City commonly ſtrong and of Power, whereas the Townes-men and Citizens are wiſe and wealthy. Therefore Lycurgus that baniſhed Gold and Silver from LACEDÆMON, and coynded them Money of Iron, that would be marred with fire and Vinegar when it was hot, did not forbid his Citizens to be good Huſbands : but like a good Law-maker, exceeding all other that ever went before him, he did not onely cut off all ſuperfluous expences that commonly waite upon riches, but did alſo provide that his People ſhould lacke nothing neceſſary to live withall, fearing more to ſee a begger and needy perſon dwelling in his City, and enjoy the priviledges of the ſame, then a proude man by reaſon of his riches. So me thinks, Cato was as good a Father to his houſhold, as he was a good Governour to the Common-wealth : for he did honeſtly increaſe his goods, and did teach other alſo to doe the ſame, by ſaving, and knowledge of good Huſbandry, whereof in his Booke he wrote ſundry good rules and Precepts : Aristides contrariwiſe, made juſtice odious and ſlandrous by his poverty, and as a thing that made men poore, and was more profitable to other, then to a mans ſelfe that uſed juſtice. And yet Hesiodus the Poet, that commendeth juſtice ſo much, doth wiſh us withall to be good Huſbands, reproving ſloth and idleneſſe, as the roote and originall of all iniuſtice. And therefore me thinks Homer ſpake wiſely when he ſaid :

In times paſt, neither did I Labour, carke nor care

For buſineſſe, for family, for food, nor yet for ſare :

But rather did delight, with ſhips the Seas to ſaile.

To draw a bow, to ſling a Dart in Warres, and to prevail.

As giving us to underſtand, that juſtice and Huſbandry are two relatives, and neceſſarily linked one to the other : and that a man who hath no care of his owne things nor Houſe, doth live unjuſtly, and taketh from other men. For juſtice is not like Oyle, which Phyſicians ſay is very whoſome for mans Body, if it be applied outwardly : and in contrary manner very ill, if a man drinke it : neither ought a juſt man to profit ſtrangers, and in the end not to care for himſelfe nor his. Therefore me thinks this governing Vertue of Aristides had a fault in this reſpect, if it be true that moſt Authors write of him : that he had no care nor forecaſt with him to leave ſo much, as to marry his Daughters withall, nor wherewith to bury himſelfe. Where thoſe of the Houſe of Cato, continued Prætors and Conſuls of ROME even unto the fourth deſcent. For his Sons Sons, and yet lower, his Sons Sons Sons came to the greateſt Offices of dignity in ROME. And Aristides, who was in his time the chiefeſt man of GREECE, left his poſterity, in ſo great poverty, that ſome were compelled to become Soothſayers (that Interpreter Dreames, and tell mens Fortune) to get their living, and other to aſke Almes : and left no meane to any of them to doe any great thing worthy him. But to contrary this, it might be ſaid, poverty of it ſelfe is neither ill nor diſhoneſt : but but where it groweth by idleness, carelesse life, vanity and folly, it is to be reprov'd. For when it lighteth upon any man that is honest, and liveth well, that taketh paines, is very diligent, Just, Valiant, Wife, and Governeth a Common-wealth well: then it is a great signe of a Noble minde: for it is impossible that man should doe any great things, that had such a base minde as to thinke alwaies upon trifles: and that he should relieve the Poor greatly, that lacketh himselfe reliefe in many things. And sure, riches are not so necessary for an honest man that will deale truly in the Common-wealth, and Government, as is sufficiency: which being a contentation in it selfe, and desirous of no superfluous thing, it never withdraweth a man from following his businesse in the Common-wealth, that enjoyeth the same. For God his he alone, who simply and absolutely hath no neede of anything at all: wherefore the chiefest Vertue that can be in man, that cometh nearest unto God, ought to be esteemed that, which maketh man to have need of least things. For like as a lusty Body, and well complexioned, hath no need of superfluous fare and curious Apparell: even so a cleane Life, and sound Houfe, is kept with a little charge: and so should the goods also be proportioned, according to use and necessity. For he that gathereth much, and spendeth little, hath never enough. But admit he hath no desire to spend much, then he is a Foole to travell to get more then he needeth: and if he doe desire it, and dare not for niggardinesse spend part of that he laboureth for, then he is miserable. Now would I aske Cato with a good will, if riches be made but to use them, why doe you boast then you have gotten much together, when a little doth suffice you? And if it be a commendable thing (as in truth it is) to be contented with the bread you finde, to drinke of the same Tappe Work-men and Labourers doe, not to care for Purple died Gowns, nor for Houses with plastered Walles: it followeth then, that neither Aristides, nor Epaminondas, nor Alcibiades, nor Caius Fabricius, have forgotten any part of their duties, when they cared not for getting of that which they would not use nor occupy. For it was to no purpose for a man that esteemed Rootes and Parfenips to be one of the best dishes in the world, and that did feed them himselfe in his chimney, whilst his Wife did bake his Bread, to talke so much of an Asse, and to take paines to write, by what Art and industry a man might quickly enrich himselfe. For it is true, that sufficiency and to be contented with a little, is a good and commendable thing: but it is because it taketh from us all desire of unnecessary things, and maketh us not to paffe for them. And therefore we finde that Aristides said, when rich Callias came was pleaded, that such as were poore against their wills, might well be ashamed of their poverty: but such as were willingly poore, had good cause and might justly rejoyce at it. For it were a mad part to thinke that Aristides poverty proceeded of a base minde and slothfullnesse, since he might quickly have made himselfe rich without any dishonesty at all, by taking onely the spoile of some one of the Barbarous People whom he had overcome, or any one of their Tents. But enough for this matter. Furthermore, touching the Victories and Battels Cato had won, they did in manner little helpe to increase the Empire of Rome: for it was already so great, as it could almost be no greater. But Aristides Victories are the greatest Conquest and Noblest Acts that the GRECIANS ever did in any Warres: as the journey of MARATHON; the Battell of SALAMINA, and the Battell of PLATÆES. And yet there is no reason to compare King Antiochus with King Xerxes, nor the Walles of the City of SPAIN which Cato overthrew and razed, unto so many thousands of Barbarous People, which were then overthrown and put to the Sword by the GRECIANS, aswell by Land as by Sea. In all which services, Aristides was the chiefest before all other, as touching his valiantnesse in fighting: notwithstanding he gave other the glory of it, that desired it more then himselfe, as he did easily leave the Gold and Silver unto those that had more need of it then himselfe. Wherein he shewed himselfe of a Nobler minde then all they did. Furthermore, for my part, I will not reprove Catoes manner, to commend and extoll himselfe so highly above all other, since he himselfe saith in an Oration he made, that to praise himselfe is as much folly, as also to dispraise himselfe: but this I thinke, his Vertue is more perfect that desireth other should not praise him, then he that commonly doth use to praise himselfe. For not to be ambitious, is a great shew of humanity, and necessary for him that will live amongst men of Government: and even so, ambition is hatefull, and procureth great envy unto him that is infected withall. Of the which Aristides was cleare, and Cato farre gone in it. For Aristides did helpe Themistocles his chiefest Enemy, in all his Noblest Acts, and did serve him (as a man would say) like a private Souldier that guarded his Person, when Themistocles was General, being the onely Instrument and meane of his glory: which was indeede the onely cause that the City of ATHENS was saved, and restored againe to her former good State. Cato contrariwise, crossing Scipio in all his enterprises, thought to hinder his voyage and journey unto CARTHAGE, in the which he overcame Hannibal, who untill that time was ever invincible: and so in the end, continuing him still in jealousy with the State and ever accusing of him, he never left him till he had driven him out of the City, and caused his Brother Lucius Scipio to be shamefully condemned for theft, and ill behaviour in his charge. Furthermore, for temperancy and modesty which Cato did ever commend so highly, Aristides truly kept them most sincerely. But Catoes second Wife, who married a Maid (that was neither fit for his dignity and calling, nor agreeable for his age) made him to be thought a lecherous man, and not without manifest cause. For he cannot be excused with honesty, that being a man past marriage, brought his Sonne that was married, and his faire Daughter in Law, a Steppe-mother into his Houfe, and but a Clerks Daughter, whose Father did write for Money, for any man that would hire him. Take it Cato married her to satisfie his lust, or else for spite to be revenged of his Son, because his Son could not abide his young filth he had before:

Whether Aristides is better or Cato did most bene fit their Country.

As Aristides is better than Cato in the Common-wealth.

As Aristides is better than Cato in his second Wife.

before: ither of these turneth still to his shame, as well the Effect as also the Cause. Againe, the excuse he made to his Sonne why he married, was a lye. For if he had grounded his desire indeede, to have gotten other children, as he said, that might be as honest men as his eldest Sonne: then surely he had done well after the death of his first Wife, if he had fought him another Wife soone after, that had bene of an honest Houfe; and not to have lye with a young Harlotry filth, till his Sonne had spied him: and then when he saw it was knowne, to go and marry her; and to make alliance with them, not because it was honourable for him to do it, but easiest to be obtained.

THE LIFE OF PHILOPOEMEN.

IN the City of MANTINEA, there was a Citizen in old time called Cassander, one that was as nobly borne and of as great authority in Government there, as any man of his time whatsoever. Notwithstanding, fortune frowned on him in the end, inasmuch as he was driven out of his Countrey, and went to lie in the City of MEGALIPOLIS, onely for the love he bare unto Cranis, Philopomenes Father, a rare man, and nobly given in all things, and one that loved him also very well. Now so long as Cranis lived, Cassander was so well used at his hands, that he could lacke nothing: and when he was departed this world, Cassander, to requite the love Cranis bare him in his life time, tooke his Sonne into his charge, being an Orphan, and taught him, as Homer said Achilles was brought up by the old Phanix. So this childe Philopomen grew to have noble conditions, and increased alwaies from good to better. Afterwards, when he came to grow to mans state, Ecdemus and Demophanes, both MEGALIPOLITANS, tooke him into their government. They were two Philosopher that had bene hearers of Arcefilas, in the Schoole of Academia, and afterwards employed all the Philofophy they had learned, upon their governing of the Common-wealth, and dealing in matters of State, as much or more, then any other men of their time. For they delivered their City from the tyranny of Aristodemus, who kept it in subjection, by corrupting among them; they went unto CYRENA, where they did reforme the state of the Common-wealth, and stablished good Lawes for them. But for themselves, they reckoned the education and bringing up of Philopomen, the chiefest act that ever they did: judging that they had procured an universall good unto all GREECE, to bring up a man of so noble a nature, in the Rules and Precepts of the Philofophy. And to say truly, GREECE did love him passingly well, as the last valiant man she brought forth in her age, after so many great and famous ancient Captaines: and did alwaies increase his Power and Authority, as his Glory did also rise. Whereupon there was a ROMANE, who who to praise him the more, called him the last of the GRECIANS: meaning that after him, GRECE never brought forth any worthy person, deserving the name of a GRECIAN. And now concerning his person, he had no ill face, as many suppose he had: for his whole Image is yet to be seene in the City of DELPHES, excellently well done, as if he were alive. And for that they report of his Hostesse in the City of MEGARA, who tooke him for a Servingman: that was by reason of his courtesie, not standing upon his reputation, and because he went plainly besides. For the understanding that the Generall of the ACHAÏANS came to Inne there all night, the bestirred her, and was very busie preparing for his supper, her husband peradventure being from home at that time: and in the meane season came Philopamen into the Inne, with a poore cloake on his backe. The simple woman seeing him no better apparelled, tooke him for one of his men that came before to provide his lodging, and so prayed him to lend her his hand in the Kitchen. He straight cast off his cloake, and began to fall to hew woode. So as Philopamen was busie about it, in cometh her Husband, and finding him riving of woode: Ha ha ha, said he, my Lord Philopamen, why what meanest this? Truly nothing else, said he in his DORICAN Tongue, but that I am punished, because I am neither faire boy, nor goodly man. It is true that Titus Quintus Flaminus said one day unto him, seeming to mocke him for his personage: O Philopamen, thou hast faire hands and good legs, but thou hast no belly; for he was fine in the waste, and small bodied. Notwithstanding, I take it this jesting tended rather to the proportion of his Army, then of his body, because he had both good Horsemen and Footmen, but he was often without Money to pay them. These jests, Scholars have taken up in Schooles, of Philopamen. But now to descend to his nature and conditions: it seemed that the ambition and desire he had to winne honour in his doings, was not without some heate and wilfulness. For, because he would altogether follow Epaminondas steps, he shewed his hardinesse to enterprize any thing, his wisdom to execute all great matters, and his integrity also, in that no money could corrupt him: but in Civill matters and controversies, he could hardly otherwhiles keepe himselfe within the bounds of modesty, patience, and courtesie, but would often burst out into choler, and wilfulness. Wherefore it seemeth, that he was a better Captaine for Warres, then a wise Governour for peace. And indeede, even from his youth he ever loved Souldiers and Armes, and delighted marvellously in all Martiall Exercises: as in handling of his Weapon well, riding of Horses gallantly, and in vaulting nimble. And because he seemed to have a naturall gift in wrestling, certaine of his friends, and such as were carefull of him, did with him to give himselfe most unto that exercise. Then he asked them, if their life that made such profession, would be no hindrance to their Martiall Exercises. Answer was made him againe. That the disposition of the person, and manner of life that Wrestlers used, and such as followed like Exercises, was altogether contrary to the life and discipline of a Souldier, and specially touching life and limbe. For wrestlers studied altogether to keepe themselves in good plight, by much sleeping, eating, and drinking; by labouring, and taking their ease at certaine houres, by not missing a jot of their Exercises: and besides, were in hazard to lose the force and strength of their body, if they did surfeit never so little, or passed their ordinary course and rule of diet: where Souldiers contrariwise are used to all change and diversity of life; and specially be taught from their youth, to away with all hardnesse and scarcity, and to watch in the night without sleepe. Philopamen hearing this, did not onely forsake those Exercises, and scorned them, but afterwards being Generall of an Army, he fought by all infamous meanes he could to put downe all wrestling and such kinde of exercise, which made mens bodies unmeet to take paines, and to become Souldiers to fight in defence of their Countrey, that otherwise would have beene very able and handsome for the same. When he first left his Booke and Schoolemasters, and began to weare Armour in Invasions the MANTINEANS used to make upon the LACEDÆMONIANS, to get some spoile on a sudden, or to destroy a part of their Countrey: Philopamen then would ever be the foremost to go out, and the hindermost to come in. When he had leisure, he used much hunting in time of peace, all to acquaint his body with toyle and travell, or else he would be digging of his Grounds. For he had a faire May nor, not passing twenty furlongs out of the City, whither he would walke commonly after dinner or supper: and then when night came that it was bed time, he would lie upon some ill favoured matresse, as the meanest labourer he had, and in the morning by breake of the day, he went out with his Vine-men to labour in his Vineyard, or else with his Plough-men to follow the Plough, and sometimes returned againe to the City, and followed matters of the Common-wealth, with his friends and other Officers of the same. Whatsoever he could spare and get in the Warres, he spent it in buying of goodly Horses, in making of faire Armours, or paying his poore Countreymens-ransome, that were taken Prisoners in the Warres: but for his Goods and Revenue, he sought onely to increase them by the profit of tillage, which he esteemed the justest and best way of getting of Goods. For he did not trifle therein, but employed his whole care and study upon it, as one that thought it fit for every Nobleman and Gentleman so to travell, governe, and increase his own, that he should have no occasion to covet or usurpe another mans. He tooke no pleasure to heare all kinde of matters, nor to reade all sorts of Bookes of Philosophy: but those onely that would teach him most to become vertuous. Neither did he much care to reade Homers Workes, saving those places onely that stirred up mens hearts most unto valiantnesse. But of all other Stories, he specially delighted to reade Evangelus Bookes, which treated of the discipline of Warres, how to set Battels, and declared the acts and jests of Alexander the Great, saying, that men should ever bring words unto deeds, unlesse they would take them for vaine stories, and things spoken, but not to profit by. For in his Bookes of the feates of Warre, and how Battels should be ordered, he was not onely contented

to see them drawne and set out in Charts and Maps, but would also put them in execution, in the places themselves as they were set out. And therefore when the Army marched in order of Battell in the Field, he would consider and study with himselfe, the sudden events and reproaches of the Enemies, that might light upon them, when they coming downe to the Valley, or going out of a Plaine, were to passe a River or a Ditch, or through some straight: also when he should spreade out his Army, or else gather it narrow: and this he did not onely forecast by himselfe, but would also argue the same with the Captaines that were about him. For Philopamen doublelesse was one of the odd men of the World, that most esteemed the Discipline of Warre (and sometime peradventure more then he needed, as the most large Field and most fruitfull Ground, that valiantnesse could be exercised in: so that he despised and contemned all that were no Souldiers, as men good for nothing. When he was come now to thirty yeares of age, Cleomenes King of LACEDÆMON, came one night upon the sudden, and gave an assault to the City of MEGALIPOLIS, so lustily that he drave back the Watch and got into the Market-place, and wan it. Philopamen hearing of it, ran immediately to the rescue. Neverthelesse, though he fought very valiantly, and did like a noble Souldier, yet he could not repulse the Enemies, nor drive them out of the City: but by this meanes he got the Citizens leisure, and some time to get them out of the Towne to save themselves, slaying those that followed them: and made Cleomenes still waite upon him, so that in the end he had much ado to save himselfe, being the last man and very sore hurt, and his Horse also slaine under him. Shortly after, Cleomenes being advertised that the MEGALIPOLITANS were gotten into the City of MESSINA, he sent unto them to let them understand, that he was ready to deliver them their City, Lands, and Goods againe. But Philopamen seeing his Countreymen very glad of these news, and that every man prepared to returne againe in haste, he said them with these persuasions, shewing them that Cleomenes device was not to deliver them their City, but rather to take them together with their City: foreseeing well enough, that he could not continue long there, to keepe naked walls and empty houses, and that himselfe in the end should be compelled to go his way. This perswasion staid the MEGALIPOLITANS, but withall it gave Cleomenes occasion to burne and plucke downe a great part of the City, and carried away a great summe of Money and a great Spoile. Afterwards when King Antigonus was come to aide the ACHAÏANS against Cleomenes, and that Cleomenes kept on the top of the Mountaines of SELASTIA, and kept all the passages, and waies unto them out of all those quarters: King Antigonus set his Army in battell hard by him, determining to set upon him, and to drive him thence if he could possibly. Philopamen was at that time amongst the Horsemen with his Citizens, who had the ILLYRIANS on the side of them, being a great number of Footmen and excellent good Souldiers, which did thrust in the tail of all the Army. So they were commanded to stand still, and to keepe their place, untill such time as they did shew them a red Coate of Armes on the top of a Pike, from the other Wing of the Battell, where the King himselfe stood in person. Notwithstanding this straight commandement, the Captaines of the ILLYRIANS would abide no longer, but went to see if they could force the LACEDÆMONIANS that kept on the top of the Mountaines. The ACHAÏANS contrariwise, kept their place and order, as they were commanded. Endidas, Cleomenes Brother, perceiving how their Enemies Footmen were severd from their Horsemen, suddenly sent the lightest armed Souldiers and lustiest fellows he had in his Bands, to give a Charge upon the ILLYRIANS behinde, to prove if they could make them turne their faces on them, because they had no Horsemen for their guard. This was done, and these light armed men did marvellously trouble and disorder the ILLYRIANS. Philopamen perceiving that, and considering how these light armed men would be easily broken and driven backe, since occasion selfe enforced them to it: he went to tell the Kings Captaines of it, that led his men of Armes. But when he saw he could not make them understand it, and that they made no reckoning of his reasons, but tooke him of no skill, because he had not yet attained any credit or estimation to be judged a man that could invent or execute any stratagem of Warre, he went thither himselfe, and tooke his Citizens with him: and at his first coming, he so troubled these light armed men, that he made them flie, and slew a number of them. Moreover, to encourage the better King Antigonus men, and to make them give a lusty Charge upon the Enemies, whilst they were thus troubled and out of order, he left his Horse and marched on foote up hill and downe hill, in rough and stony waies, full of springs and quavemires, being heavily armed at all pieces as a man at Armes, and fighting in this sort very painfully and uneasily, he had both his thighs past through with a Dart, having a leather thong on the middle of it. And though the blow did not take much hold of the flesh, yet was it a strong blow; for it pierced both thighs through and through, that the iron was seene on the other side. Then was he so cumberd with this blow as if he had beene shackled with irons on his feete, and knew not what to do: for the leather fastened in the middle of the Dart, did grieve him marvellously, when they thought to have pulled the Dart out of the place where it entred in, so as never a man about him durst set his hands to it. Philopamen on the other side, seeing the Fight terrible on either side, and would soone be ended: it spited him to the guts, he would so faine have beene among them. So at the length he made such struggling, putting backe one thigh, and setting forward another, that he knapped the staffe of the Dart asunder, and made them pull out the two truncheons, the one on this side, and the other on the other side. Then when he saw he was at liberty againe, he tooke his Sword in his hand, and ranne through the midst of them that fought, unto the foremost ranks, to meete with the Enemy: so that he gave his men a new courage, and did set them on fire with envie, to follow his valiantnesse. After the Battell was wonne, Antigonus asked the MACHEDONIAN Captaines, to prove them : who moved the Horsemen to divide themselves, and give the Charge, before the signe that was commanded. They answered him, that they were forced to do it against their wills, because a young MEGALIPOLITAN Gentleman gave a Charge with his Company, before the signe was given. Then Antigonus laughing, told them the young Gentleman played the part of a wife and valiant Captaine. This exploit, together with Antigonus testimony, gave great reputation unto Philopemen, as we may easily imagine. So King Antigonus marvellously intreated him he would serve with him, and offered him a Band of men at Armes, and great entertainment, if he would go with him. But Philopemen refused his offer, and chiefly because he knew his owne nature, that he could hardly abide to be commanded by any. Notwithstanding, because he could not be idle, he tooke Sea, and went into CRETA, where he knew there was Warres, onely to continue himselfe in exercise thereof. So when he had served a long time with the CRETANS, which were valiant Souldiers, and very expert in all policies and feates of Warre, and moreover were men of a moderate and spare diet : he returned home againe to ACHAIA, with so great credit and reputation of every one, that he was presently chosen Generall of all the Horsemen. So when he entred into his charge, he found many Horsemen very ill horied, upon little Jades, such as might be gotten cheapest, and that they used not to go themselves in person to the Warres, but did send other in their stead : and to be short, that they neither had hearts, nor experience of the Warres, and all because the Generalls and Captaines of the People of the ACHAIANS that served before him, did take no heede to those matters, as fearing to offend any, because they had the greatest authority in their hands, to punish or reward whom they thought good. Philopemen fearing none of all these things, would leave no part of his charge and duty undone, but went himselfe in person to all the Cities, to perswade and encourage the young Gentlemen, to be well horied, and well armed, that they might winne honour in the Field, be able to defend themselves, and overthrow their Enemies. And where perswasion could do no good, there he would set fines upon their heads that so refused, and did use to muster them oft, and did acquaint them with tilting, turning, and barriers, and one to fight with another, and at such times and places specially, as he knew there would be multitudes of People to give them the looking on : that in short space he made them very forward, proper, and ready Horsemen, whose chieft property is, to keepe their order and ranks in the Battell. So as when necessity served for the whole Company of Horsemen to turne together, halfe turne, or whole turne, or else every man by himselfe : they were so thoroughly trained in it, that all the whole Troope set in Battell ray, did seeme as it were to be but one body, they removed so together, and withall so easily, and at all times, and so oft, as they should turne, on the one side, or on the other. Now in a great Battell the ACHAIANS had with the ETOLIANS, and the ELIANS, by the River of Larissus, Demophantus Generall of the Horsemen of the ETOLIANS, came from his Company to fight with Philopemen, who also made towards him, and gave him first such a blow with his Speare, that he strake him starke dead. When Demophantus fell to the ground, his Souldiers fled by and by upon it. This wanne Philopemen great honour, who gave no place to the youngest men in fighting most valiantly with his owne hands : nor to the oldest men in wildome, for the wise leading of his Army. Indeepe the first man that made the People of ACHAIA grow in power and greatnesse, was Aratus : for before his time ACHAIA was of small reckoning, because the Cities of the same floode divided betweene themselves, and Aratus was the first man that made them joyne together, and stablished among them an honest civill government. Whereby it happened, that as we see in Brookes and Rivers where any little thing stoppeth and falleth to the bottome, which the course of the water bringeth downe the streame, there the rest that followeth doth use to stay, and go no further : even so in the Cities of GREECE that were in hard state, and fore weakened, by faction one against another, the ACHAIANS were the first that staid themselves, and grew in amity one with the other, and afterwards drew on the rest of the Cities into league with them, as good Neighbours and Confederates. Some by helping and delivering them from the oppression of Tyrants, and winning other also by their peaceable Government and good concord : they had a meaning in this wise to bring all the Countrey of PELOPONNESUS into one body and league. Nevertheless, while Aratus lived, they depended most upon the strength and power of the MACEDONIANS : first with sticking unto King Ptolomy, and then unto Antigonus, and last to Philip, who ruled in manner all the State of GREECE. But when Philopemen came to governe, and to be the chieft man, the ACHAIANS being strong enough to resist the strongest, would march then no more under any other bodies Ensigne, nor would suffer any more strange Governours or Captaines over them. For Aratus (as it seemed) was somewhat too soft and cold for the Wars, and therefore the most things he did, were by gentle intreaties, by intelligences, and by the Kings friendships with whom he was great, as we have at large declared in his life. But Philopemen being a man of execution, hardy and valiant of person, and of very good fortune, in the first Battell that ever he made, did marvellously increase the courage and hearts of the ACHAIANS : because under his charge they ever foiled their Enemies, and alwaies had the upper hand of them. The first thing Philopemen began withall at his coming, he changed the manner of setting of their Tables, and their fashion of arming themselves : for before they carried little light Targets, which because they were thin and narrow, did not cover half their bodies, and used Spears far shorter then Pikes, by reason whereof they were very light, and good to skirmish and fight afar off : but when they came to joyne Battell, their Enemies then had great vantage of them. As for the order of their Battels, they knew not what it meant, nor to cast themselves into a snail or ring, but onely used the square Battell, nor yet gave it any such front where the Pikes of many ranks might push together, and where the Souldiers might stand so close, that their their Targets should touch one another, as they do in the Squadron of the Battell of the MACEDONIANS : by reason whereof, they were soone broken and overthrowne. Philopemen reformed all this, perswading them to use the Pike and Shield, instead of the little Target, Speare, or Bore-staffe, and to put good Morians or Burganets on their heads, Corselets on their bodies, and good Taffes and Greaves to cover their thighs and legs, that they might fight it out manfully, not giving a foote of ground, as light armed men run to and fro in a Skirmish. And thus having perswaded and taught the young men to arme themselves thoroughly, first he made them the bolder and more courageous to fight, as if they had beene men that could not have beene overcome : then he turned all their vaine superfluous charge, into necessary and honest expences. But he could not possibly bring them altogether from their vaine and rich Apparell they had of long time taken up, the one to exceed another : nor from their sumptuous furniture of houses, as in beds, hangings, curious service at the Table, and delicate kinde of dishes. But to begin to withdraw this desire in them, which they had to be fine and delicate, in all superfluous and unnecessary things, and to like of things necessary and profitable : he wished them to looke more nearely to their ordinary charge about themselves; taking order as well for their Apparell, as also for their Diet, and to spare in them, to come honourably armed to the Field, for defence of their Countrey. Thereupon, if you had looked into the Goldsmiths Shops, ye should have seene nothing else in their hands, but breaking and battering of Pots of Gold and Silver, to be cast and molten downe againe, and the gilding of Armour and Targets, and silvering of bits. In the Shew-places for the running of Horses, there was managing and breaking of young Horses, and young men exercising Armes. Womens hands also were full of Morians and Head-pieces, whereto they tied goodly brave plumes of Feathers of sundry colours, and were also full of imbroidered arming Coates and Cassocks, with curious and very rich Workes. The sight of which bravery did heave up their hearts, and made them gallant and lively : so as envie bred straight in them who should do best service, and no way spare for the Warres. Indeepe, sumptuousnesse and bravery in others fights, doth secretly carry mens mindes away; and allure them to seeke after vanities, which makes them tender bodied, and womanish persons : because this sweet tickling and inticing of the outward sense, that is delighted therewith, doth straight melt and soften the strength and courage of the minde. But againe, the sumptuous cost bestowed upon warlike Furniture, doth incourage and make great a noble heart. Even as Homer saith it did Achilles, when his Mother brought him new Armour and Weapons she had caused Vulcan to make for him, and layed them at his feete : who seeing them, could not tarry, but was straight set on fire with desire to occupie them. So when Philopemen had brought the Youth of ACHAIA to this good passe, to come thus bravely armed and furnished into the Field, he began then to exercise them continually in Armes : wherein they did not onely shew themselves obedient to him, but did moreover strive one to excell another, and to do better then their fellows. For they liked marvellous well the ordering of the Battell he had taught them, because that standing so close together as they did, they thought surely they could hardly be overthrowne. Thus by continuance of time, being much used to weare their Armour, they found them a great deale easier and lighter then before, beside the pleasure they tooke to see their Armour so brave, and so rich : in somuch as they longed for some occasion to try them straight upon their Enemies. Now the ACHAIANS at that time were at Warres with Machanidas, the Tyrant of LACEDEMON, who fought by all device he could with a great Army, to become chiefe Lord of all the PELOPONNESIANS. When newes was brought that Machanidas was come into the Countrey of the MANTINEANS, Philopemen straight marched towards him with his Army : so they met both not far from the City of MANTINEA, where by and by they put themselves in order of Battell. They both had entertained in pay a great number of strangers to serve them, besides the whole force of their Countrey : and when they came to joyne Battell, Machanidas with his strangers gave such a lusty Charge upon certaine Slingers and Archers, being the Forlorne-hope whom Philopemen had put before the Battell of the ACHAIANS to begin the Skirmish, that he overthrowed them, and made them flie withall. But where he should have gone on directly against the ACHAIANS that were ranged in Battell ray, to have proved if he could have broken them, he was very busie and earnest still, to follow the chafe of them that first fled, and so came hard by the ACHAIANS that stoode still in their Battell, and kept their Ranks. This great overthrow fortuning at the beginning, many men thought the ACHAIANS were but cast away. But Philopemen made as though it had beene nothing, and that he set light by it ; and spying the great fault his Enemies made, following the Forlorne-hope on the spurre, whom they had overthrowne, and staying so far from the Battell of their Footmen, whom they had left naked, and the Field open upon them : he did not make towards them to stay them, nor did strive to stop them that they should not follow those that fled, but suffered them to take their course. And when he saw that they were gone a good way from their Footmen, he made his men march upon the LACEDEMONIANS, whose sides were naked, having no Horsemen to guard them : and so did set upon them on the one side, and ranne so hastily on them to winne one of their Flankes, that he made them flie, and slew withall a great number of them. For it is said, there were foure thousand LACEDEMONIANS slaine in the Field, because they had no man to leade them. And moreover, they say they did not looke to fight, but supposed rather they had wonne the Field, when they saw Machanidas chasing still those upon the spurre, whom he had overthrowne. After this Philopemen retired to meete Machanidas, who came backe from the chafe with the strangers. But by chance there was a great broad ditch betweene them, so as both of them rode upon the bankes side of the same, a great while together, one against another of them: the one side seeking some convenient place to get over and flee, and the other side seeking meanes to keepe them from starting away. So to see the one before the other in this fort, it appeared as they had bene wilde Beasts brought to an extremity, to defend themselves by force, from so fierce a hunter as Philopamen was. But while they were striving thus, the Tyrants Horfe that was lusty and courageous, and felt the force of his Masters spurres pricking in his sides, that the blood followed after, did venture to leape the ditch, coming to the bankes side, stoode upon his hindmost legs, and advanced forward with his foremost feet, to reach to the other side. Then Simias and Polyanus, who were about Philopamen when he fought, ranne thither straight to keepe him in with their borestaves that he should not leape the ditch. But Philopamen who was there before them, perceiving that the Tyrants Horfe, by lifting up his head so high, did cover all his Masters body: forsooke by and by his Horfe, and tooke his Speare in both his hands, and thrust at the Tyrant with so good a will, that he slew him in the ditch. In memory whereof, the ACHAÏANS that did highly esteeme this valiant act of his, and his wisdom also in leading of the Battell, did set up his Image in brasse in the Temple of Apollo in DELPHES, in the forme he slew the Tyrant. They say, that at the Assembly of the common Games called Nemes (which they solemnize in honour of Hercules, not far from the City of ARGOS) and not long after he had wonne this Battell of MANTINEA, being made Generall the second time of the Tribe of the ACHAÏANS, and being at good leisure also by reason of the Feast; he first shewed all the GRECIANS that were come thither to see the Games and Pastimes, his Army ranged in order of Battell, and made them see how easily they removed their places every way, as necessity and occasion of Fight required, without troubling or confounding their Rankes, and that with a marvellous force and readinesse. When he had done this, he went into the Theater to heare the Musicians play and sing to their Instruments, who should winne the best Game, being accompanied with lusty young Gentlemen apparelled in Purple Cloakes, and in Scarlet Coats and Cassocks they wore upon their Armour, being all in the flower of their youth, and well given and disposed: who did greatly honour and reverence their Capitaine, and besides that shewed themselves inwardly of noble hearts, being encouraged by many notable Battels they had fought, in which they had ever attained the Victory, and gotten the upper hand of their Enemies. And by chance, as they were entred into the Theater, Pylades the Musitian, singing certaine Poems of Timotheus, called the Perfes, fell into these Verses:

O Greekes, it is even he, Which your prosperity Hath given to you: and there withall a noble liberty.

When he had sweetly sung out aloud these noble Verses, passingly well made, the whole Assembly of the GRECIANS in the Theater, that were gathered thither to see the Games, cast all their eyes straight upon Philopamen, and clapped their hands one to another for joy, because of the great hope they had in him, that through him they should soone recover their ancient reputation: and so imagined they possessed already the noble and worthy mindes of their Ancestors. And as young Horses that do alwaies looke to be ridden by their ordinary Riders, if any stranger get upon their backs, do straight waxe strange to be handled, and make great ado: even so when the ACHAÏANS came to any dangerous Battell, their hearts were even done, if they had any other Generall or Leader then Philopamen, on whom still they depended and looked. And when they saw him, ever the whole Army rejoiced, and desired straight to be at it, they had such confidence in his valiantnesse and good fortune: and truly not without cause. For of all men, their Enemies did feare him most, and durst not stand before him: because they were afraid to heare his name onely, as it seemed by their doings. For Philip King of MACEDON (imagining that if he should finde meanes to dispatch Philopamen out of the way, howsoever it were, the ACHAÏANS would straight take part againe with him) sent men secretly into the City of ARGOS, to kill him by Treason: howbeit the practice was discovered, and the King ever after was mortally hated of all the GRECIANS generally, and taken for a wicked and cowardly Prince. It fortuned one day when the BOEOTIANS layed siege to the City of MEGARA, and thought certainly to have wonne it at the first assault, there rose a rumour suddenly amongst them, that Philopamen came to aide the City, and was not far from it with his Army. But it was a false report. Notwithstanding, the BOEOTIANS were so scared, that for feare they left their scaling-Ladders behinde them, which they had set against the Walls, to have scaled the Towne, and fled straight to save themselves. Another time, when Nabis the Tyrant of LACEDÆMON, that succeeded Maehanidas, had taken the City of MESSINA upon a sudden: Philopamen being then a private man, and having no charge of Souldiers, went unto Lysippus Generall of the ACHAÏANS that yeare, to perswade him that he would send present aide unto them of MESSINA. Lysippus told him, it was too late now to go thither, and that it was but a lost Towne, not to be holpen; considering the Enemies were in it already. Philopamen perceiving he could not procure him to go, went thither himselfe with the force of MESSINA onely, not staying for the assembly of the MEGALIPOLITANS, that were in counsell about it, to give them Commission by voyces of the People to take him with him: but they all willingly followed him, as if he had bene their continuall Generall, and the man that by nature was worthiest of all other to command them. Now when he came neere unto MESSINA, Nabis hearing of his coming, durst not tarry him, though he had his Army within the City, but stole out at another Gate, and marched away in all the haste he could, thinking himselfe a happy man if he could so scape his hands, and retire with safety, as indeed he did. And thus was MESSINA by his means delivered from captivity. All

All that we have written hitherto concerning Philopamen, falleth out doublelesse to his great honour and glory: but afterwards he was greatly dispraised for a journey he made into Creta, at the request of the GORTYNIANS, who sent to pray him to be their Capitaine, being sore troubled with Warres at that time. Because Philopamen went then to serve the GORTYNIANS, when the Tyrant Nabis had greatest Warres with the MEGALIPOLITANS in their owne Countrey, they laid it to his charge, either that he did it to fly the Warres, or else that he sought honour out of seafon with forraigne Nations, when his poore Citizens the MEGALIPOLITANS were in such distresse, and that their Countrey being lost and destroyed, they were driven to keepe them within their City, and to sow all their void Grounds and Streets in the same with Corne, to sustaine them withall, when their Enemies were incamped almost hard at their owne Gates. And the rather, because himselfe making Warres with the CRETANS, and serving strangers beyond the Sea in the meane time, gave his Enemies occasion to slander him that he fled, that he would not tarry to fight for defence of his owne Countrey. Againe, there were that said, because the ACHAÏANS did chuse other for their Generall, that he being a private man and without charge, was the rather contented to be Generall of the GORTYNIANS, who had marvellously intreated him to take the charge: for he was a man that could not abide to live idely, and that desired specially above all things to serve continually in the Warres, and to put in practise his skill and discipline in the leading of an Army. The words he spake one day of King Prolemis doe witnesse as much: for when there were some that praised King Prolemis highly, saying that he trayned his Army well, and that he still continued his person in exercise of Armes: It is not commendable for a King (said he) of his yeares, to delight in training his men to exercise Armes, but to doe some Act himselfe in person. Well, in the end, the MEGALIPOLITANS tooke his absence in such evil part, that they thought it a piece of treason, and would needs have banished him, and put him from the freedome of the City: had not the ACHAÏANS sent their Generall Aristanctus unto them, who would not suffer the sentence of banishment to passe against him, although otherwise there was ever contention betweene them about matters of the Common-wealth. Afterwards Philopamen perceiving his Countrey men made no more account of him, to spite them withall, he made divers small Villages and Cities rebell against them, and taught them to say, and to give it out, that they were not their subiects, neither paid them tribute from the beginning: and he made them stand to it openly, and maintaine their sedition against the City of MEGALIPOLIS, before the Councill of the ACHAÏANS. These things hapned shortly after. But whilest he made Warres in Creta for the GORTYNIANS, he shewed not himselfe a PELOPONNESIAN, nor like a man born in ARCADIA, to make plain and open Warres: but he had learned the manner of the CRETANS, to use their own polices, fine devices, and ambushes against themselves. And made them know also, that all their crafts were but childish sports as it were, in respect of those that were devised, and put in execution, by a wife experienced Capitaine, and skillfull to fight a Battell. So Philopamen, having wonne great fame by his acts done in Creta, returned againe to PELOPONNESUS, where he found that Philip King of MACEDON had bene overcome in Battell, by T. Q. Flaminius: and that the ACHAÏANS joyning with the ROMANS, did make Warre against the Tyrant Nabis, against whom he was made Generall immediately upon his returne, and gave him Battell by Sea. In the which it seemed he fell into like misfortune, as Epaminondas did: the event of this Battell falling out much worse with him then was looked for, in respect of his former courage and valiantnesse. But as for Epaminondas, some say he returned willingly out of ASIA, and the Isles, without any Exploit done, because he would not have his Countrey men fleshed with spoile by Sea, as feareing lest of valiant Souldiers by Land, they would by little and little (as Plato said) become dissolute Mariners by Sea. But Philopamen contrariwise, presuming on the skill he had to set the Battell in good order by Land, would needs take upon him to do the same by Sea. But he was taught to his cost, to know what exercise and experience meant, and how strong it maketh them that are practised in things. For he lost not onely the Battell by Sea, being unskilfull of that service: but he committed besides a fouler error. For he caused an old Ship to be rigged, which had bene very good of service before, but not occupied in forty yeares together, and embarked his Countrey men into the same, which were all likely to perish, because the Ship had divers leaks, by fault of good calking. This overthrow made his Enemies despise him utterly, perswading themselves he was fled for altogether, and had given them Sea-roome: whereupon they laid siege to the City of GYTHIUM. Philopamen being advertised thereof, imbarqued his men suddenly, and set upon his Enemies ere they wist it, or had any thought of his coming: and found them stragling up and downe, without Watch or Guard, by reason of the Victory they had lately wonne. So he landed his men closely by night, and went and set fire upon his Enemies Campe, and burnt it every whit: and in this feare and hurly-burly, slew a great number of them. Shortly after this stealing upon them, the Tyrant Nabis also stole upon him againe unawares, as he was to go through a marvellous ill and dangerous way: which made the ACHAÏANS amazed at the first, thinking it impossible for them that they could ever scape that danger, considering their Enemies kept all the waies thereabouts. But Philopamen bethinking himselfe, and considering the nature and situation of the place: after he had viewed it well, he shewed them plainly then, that the chiefe point of a good Souldier and man of Warre, was to know how to put an Army in Battell, according to the time and situation of the place. For he did but alter the forme of his Battell a little, and forced it according to the situation of the place, wherein he was compassed: and by doing this without trouble or businesse, he tooke away all feare of danger, and gave a charge upon his Enemies in such fierce wise, that in a short time he put them all to flight. And when he perceived that they did not flee all in Troupes together towards the City, but scattering wife, abroad in the Fields in every place, he caused the Trumpet to sound the Retreat. Then he commanded the chafe to be followed no further, for that all the Countrey thereabout was full of thick Woods and Groves, very ill for Horsemen: and also because there were many Brookes, Valleys and Quavemires, which they should passe over, he encamped himselfe presently, being yet broad day. And so, fearing lest his Enemies would in the night time draw unto the City, one after another, and by couples: he sent a great number of ACHAÏANS, and laid them in ambush amongst the Brookes and Hills neare about it, which made great slaughter of Nabis Souldiers, because they came not all together in Troupes, but scatteringly one after another as they fled, one here another there, and so fell into their Enemies hands, as Birds into the Fowlers Net. These acts made Philopomen singularly beloved of the GRECIANS, and they did him great honour in all their Theaters and common Assemblies. Whereat T. Q. Flaminius, of nature very ambitious and covetous of honour, did much repine, and was envious at the matter, thinking that a Consul of ROME should have place and honour among the ACHAÏANS before a meane Gentleman of ARCADIA. And he imagined he had deserved better of all GRECE, then Philopomen had: considering how by the onely Proclamation of an Herald, he had restored GRECE againe to her ancient liberty, which before his coming was subject to King Philip, and unto the MACEDONIANS. Afterwards, T. Quintus made peace with the Tyrant Nabis, who was shortly after very trayterously slaine by the ACHAÏANS. Whereupon the City of SPARTA grew to a tumult, and Philopomen straight taking the occasion, went thither with his Army, and handled the matter so wisely, that partly for love, and partly by force, he wan the City, and joyned it unto the Tribe of the ACHAÏANS. So was he marvellously commended and esteemed of the ACHAÏANS for this notable Victory, to have won their Tribe and Commonalty so famous a City, and so great estimation. For the City of SPARTA was no small increase of their Power, being joyned as a member of ACHAÏA. Moreover he wan by this means the love and good will of all the honest men of LACEDÆMON, for the hope they had to finde him a Protector and defender of their Liberty. Wherefore, when the Tyrant Nabis house and goods were sold, as forfeited to the State: they resolved in their Councell to make him a Present of the Money thereof, which amounted to the summe of fixscore Talents, and sent Ambassadours purposely unto him, to offer it him. Then Philopomen shewed himselfe plainly to be no counterfeited honest man, but a good man indeed. For first of all, there was not one of all the LACEDÆMONIANS that durst presume to offer him this Money, but every man was afraid to tell him of it: and every body that was appointed to do it, made some excuse or other for themselves. Notwithstanding, in the end they made one Timolau to take the matter upon him, who was his familiar friend and also his Host. And yet the same Timolau when he came unto MEGALIPOLIS, and was lodged and entertained in Philopomen's house, did so much reverence him for his wise talke and conversation, for his moderate diet, and just dealing with all men: that he saw there was no likely possibility to corrupt him with Money, so as he durst not once open his mouth to speak to him of the Present he had brought him, but found some other occasion to excuse the cause of his coming unto him. And being sent unto him againe the second time, he did even as much as at the first time. And making a third proofe, he ventured at the last to open the matter unto him, and told him the good will the City of SPARTA did beare him. Philopomen became a glad man to hear it: and when he had heard all he had to say to him, he went himselfe unto the City of SPARTA. There he declared unto the Councell, that it was not honest men and their good friends, they should seeke to winne and corrupt with Money, considering they might command their vertue upon any occasion, without cost unto them: but that they should seeke to bribe naughty men with money, and such as by feditious Orations in Councell did mutiny, and put a whole City in uprore: to the end that having their mouths stopped with gifts, they should trouble them the lesse in the Common-wealth. For, said he, it is more necessary to stop your Enemies mouths, and to sow up their lips from liberty of speaking, then it is to keepe your friends from it. So noble a man was Philopomen against all covetousnesse of Money. Shortly after, the LACEDÆMONIANS beginning to stir againe, Diophanes (who was then Generall of the ACHAÏANS) being advertised of it, began to prepare to punish them. The LACEDÆMONIANS on the other side preparing for the Wars, did set all the Countrey of PELOPONNESUS in Armes. Hereupon Philopomen fought to pacifie Diophanes anger, declaring unto him, that King Antiochus, and the ROMANES, being at wars together at that present time, and they both having puissant Armies one against another in the midst of GRECE, it was meete for a good Generall and wise Governour, to have an eye to their doings, to be carefull of the same, and to beware that he did not trouble or alter any thing within his Countrey at that instant, but then rather to dissemble it, and not to seeme to heare any fault whatsoever they did. Diophanes would not be perswaded, but entred the Territories of LACEDÆMON with a great Army, and T. Quintus Flaminius with him: and they together marched directly towards the City of SPARTA. Philopomen was so mad with their doings, that he tooke upon him an enterprize not very lawful, nor altogether just: nevertheless his attempt proceeded of a noble minde and great courage. For he got into the City of SPARTA, and being but a private person, kept out the Generall of the ACHAÏANS, and the Consul of the ROMANES for entering the City: and when he had pacified all troubles and seditions in the same, he delivered it up again as it was before, into the hands of the Commonalty of the ACHAÏANS. Neverthelesse himselfe being afterwards Generall of the ACHAÏANS, did compell the LACEDÆMONIANS to receive those home againe whom they had banished for certaine faults, and did put eighty naturall borne Citizens of SPARTA unto death, as Polybius writeth: or three hundred and fifty, as Aristocrates another Historiographer riographer reciteth. Then he pulled downe the Walls of the City, and razed them to the ground, and tooke away the most part of their Territories, and gave them to the MEGALIPOLITANS. All those whom the Tyrants had made free Denizons of SPARTA, he compelled them to depart the Countrey of LACEDÆMON, and forced them to dwell in ACHAÏA, three thousand onely excepted, who would not obey his commandement: all those he sold for Slaves, and with the Money he made of them (to spight them the more) he built a goodly faire walke within the City of MEGALIPOLIS. Yet furthermore, to do the LACEDÆMONIANS all the mischief he could, and as it were, to treade them under the feete in their most grievous misery, he did a most cruell and unjust act toward them. For he compelled them to leave the discipline and manner of education of their Children, which Lycurgus had of old time instituted: and made them to follow the manner the ACHAÏANS used, in lieu of their old grounded Countrey custome, because he saw they would never be humble minded, so long as they kept Lycurgus order and institution. Thus were they driven to put their heads in the collar, by the miserable mishap that befell them: and in all despite, to suffer Philopomen in this manner to cut asunder (as it were) the finewes of their Common-wealth. But afterwards they made sute to the ROMANES, that they might be suffered to enjoy their ancient discipline againe, which being granted them, they straight left the manner of the ACHAÏANS, and did set up againe as much as was possible (after so great misery and corruption of their manners) their old ancient customes and orders of their Countrey. Now about the time the Warres began in GRECE betweene the ROMANES and King Antiochus, Philopomen was then a private man, and without any Authority. He seeing that King Antiochus lay still in the City of CHALCIS, and did nothing but feast and love, and had married a young Maide far unmeet for his yeares: and perceiving that his SYRIAN Souldiers wandred up and downe the Townes in great disorder, playing many lewd parts without guide of Captaines, he was very sorry he was not at that time Generall of the ACHAÏANS, and told the ROMANES, that he envied their Victory, having Warres with Enemies that were so easily to be overcome. For (said he) if Fortune favoured me that I were Generall of the ACHAÏANS at this present, I would have killed them every man in the Cellars and tipping Houses. Now when the ROMANES had overcome Antiochus, they began to have furer foot-ting in GRECE, and to compass in the ACHAÏANS on all sides, and specially, by reason the Heads and Governours of the Cities about them did yeeld to the ROMANES, to winne their favour. And now their greatnesse grew in haste, by the favour of the gods, so as they were become the Monarch of the whole World, who brought them now to the end that Fortune had determined. Philopomen in the meane time did like a good Pilot, resisting against the billowes and roughnesse of the waves. And though for the time he was forced to give place, and to let things passe, yet for all that he was against the ROMANES, and did withstand them in the most part of their proceedings, by seeking ever to defend the liberty of those, who by their eloquence and well doing carried great Authority among the ACHAÏANS. And when Aristanetus MEGALIPOLITAN, (a man of great authority among the ACHAÏANS, and one that ever bare great devotion to the ROMANES) said in open Senate among the ACHAÏANS, that they should deny the ROMANES nothing, nor shew themselves unthankfull to them: Philopomen hearing what he said, held his peace a while, and suffered him to speake (though it boyled in his heart, he was so angry with him) and in the end, breacking all patience, and as one overcome with choler, he said: Aristanetus, why have you such haste to see the unfortunate end of GRECE? Another time when Manius Consul of ROME (after he had conquered King Antiochus) did make request to the Councell of the ACHAÏANS, that such as were banished from LACEDÆMON, might returne home into their Countrey againe, and that Titus Quintus Flaminius also did earnestly intreate them: Philopomen was against it, not for any hatred he bare unto the banished men, but because he would have done it by his owne meane, and the onely grace of the ACHAÏANS, to the end they should not be beholding for so good a turne, neither unto Titus, nor yet to the ROMANES. Afterwards he himselfe, being Generall of the ACHAÏANS, did restore them wholly to their owne againe. Thus was Philopomen sometime a little too bold and quarrellous, by reason of his great stomach: and specially when any man sought for to have things by Authority. Lastly, being threescore and ten yeares of age, he was the eighth time chosen Generall of the ACHAÏANS, and hoped well, not onely to passe the yeare of his charge in peace and quietnesse, but also all the rest of his life without any stir of new Wars, he saw the affaires of GRECE take so good successe. For like as the force and strength of sicknesse declined, as the naturall strength of the sickly body impaireth: so through all the Cities and People of GRECE, the desire of quarrell and of Wars surceased, as their power diminished. Neverthelesse, in the end of his yeares government, the gods divine (who justly punish all insolent words and deeds) threw him to the ground, as they suffer a Rider unfortunately to take a fall off his Horse, being come almost to the end of his carriere. For they write, that he being in a place on a time amongst good company, where one was marvellously praised for a good Captaine, said unto them: Why Masters, can ye commend him that was contented to be taken Prisoner alive of his Enemies? Shortly after came newes that Dinocrates MESSINIAN (a private Enemy of Philopomen's for certaine controversies past betweene them, and a man generally hated besides of all honourable and vertuous men, for his licentious wicked life) had withdrawn the City of MESSINA from the devotion of the ACHAÏANS: and moreover, that he came with an Army to take a Towne called COLONIDE. Philopomen was at that time in the City of ARGOS, sick of an Ague, and yet he hearing these newes, tooke his Journey towards MEGALIPOLIS, making all the hate he could possible, for that he came above foure hundred furlongs that day.

Strait

Straight he departed thence towards MESSINA, and tarried not, but tooke with him a Company of men at Armes of the lustiest and wealthiest MEGALIPOLITANS: who were all young noble men of the City, and willingly offered themselves to go with him for the good will they bare him, and for the desire they had to follow his valiantnesse. Thus went they on their way towards the City of MESSINA, and marched so long, that they came neare to the hill of Evander, where they met with Dinocrates and his company, and gave so fierce an onset on them, that they made them all turne taile: howbeit in the meane while, there came a reliefe of five hundred men to Dinocrates, which he had left to keepe the Countrey of MESSINA. The flying men that were scattered here and there, seeing this supply, gathered themselves againe together, and shewed upon the hills. Philopamen fearing to be environed, and being desirous to bring his men safe home againe, who most of love had followed him: began to march away through narrow bushy places, himselfe being in the rereward, and turned oftentimes upon his Enemies, and skirmished with them; onely to drive them away from following of the rest of his company, and not a man that durst once set upon him: for they did but cry out aloofe, and wheele as it were about him. Howbeit Philopamen sundry times venturing far from his company, to give these young Noblemen leisure to save themselves one after another: tooke no heede to himselfe that he was alone environed on every side with a great number of Enemies. Notwithstanding, of all his Enemies there was not a man that durst come to handstrokes with him, but still slinging and shooting at him afar off, they drave him in the end amongst stony places between hewne rocks, where he had much ado to guide his Horse, although he had spurred him that he was all of a gore blood. And as for his age, that did not lett him but he might have saved himselfe, for he was strong and lusty by the continuall exercise he tooke: but by cursed happe his body being weake with sicknesse, and weary with the long journey he had made that day, he found himselfe very heave and ill disposed, that his Horse stumbling with him, threw him to the ground. His fall was very great, and bruised all his head, that he lay for dead in the place a great while, and never stirred nor spake: so that his Enemies thinking he had bene dead, came to turne his body to strip him. But when they saw him lift up his head and open his eyes, then many of them fell all at once upon him and tooke him, and bound both his hands behinde him, and did all the villany and mischief they could unto him, and such, as one would little have thought Dinocrates would have used in that sort, or that he could have had such an ill thought towards him. So they that tarried behinde in the City of MESSINA, were marvelous glad when they heard these newes, and ranne all to the Gates of the City to see him brought in. When they saw him thus shamefully bound and pinioned, against the Dignity of so many Honours as he had received, and of so many Triumphs and Victories as he had passed: the most part of them wept for pity, to consider the mishap and ill fortune of mans nature, where there is so little certainty, as in manner it is nothing. Then began there some courteous speech to runne in the mouths of the People by little and little, that they should remember the great good he had done them in times past, and the liberty he had restored them unto, when he expelled the Tyrant Nabis out of MESSINA. But there were other againe (howbeit very few) that to please Dinocrates, said they should hang him on a gibbet, and put him to death as a dangerous Enemy, and that would never forgive man that had once offended him: and the rather, because he would be more terrible to Dinocrates then ever he was before, if he escaped his hands, receiving such open shame by him. Nevertheless, in the end they carried him into a certaine Dungeon under the ground, called the Treasury (which had neither light nor aire at all into it, nor doore, nor halfe-doore, but a great stone rolled on the mouth of the Dungeon) and so they did let him downe the same, and stopped the hole againe with the stone, and watched it with armed men for to keepe him. Now when these young noble ACHAIA Horfemen had fled upon the spurre a great way from the Enemy, they remembered themselves, and looked round about for Philopamen: and finding him not in sight, they supposed straight, he had bene slaine. Thereupon they staid a great while, and called for him by name, and perceiving he answered not, they began to say among themselves, they were beasts and cowards to flie in that fort: and how they were dishonoured for ever so to have forsaken their Captaine, to save themselves, who had not spared his owne life to deliver them from danger. Hereupon riding on their way, and enquiring still for him, they were in the end advertised how he was taken. And then they went and carried those newes through all the Townes and Cities of ACHAIA, which were very sorry for him, and tooke it as a signe of great ill fortune toward them. Whereupon they agreed to send Ambassadors forthwith to the MESSINIANS, to demand him: and in the meane time every man should prepare to arme themselves to go thither, and get him either by force or love. When the ACHAIANS had thus sent, Dinocrates feared nothing so much, as that delay of time might save Philopamens life: wherefore to prevent it, as soone as night came, and that the People were at rest, he straight caused the stone to be rolled from the mouth of the Dungeon, and willed the Hangman to be let downe to Philopamen with a cup of poyson to offer him, who was commanded also not to go from him, untill he had drunke it. When the Hangman was come downe, he found Philopamen laid on the ground upon a little Cloake, having no lift to sleepe, he was so grievously troubled in his minde. Who when he saw light, and the man standing by him, holding a cup in his hand with this poyson, he sate upright upon his Couch, howbeit with great paine, he was so weake, and taking the cup in his hand, asked the Hangman if he heard any newes of the Horfemen that came with him, specially of Lycortas. The Hangman made him answer, that the most of them were saved. Then he cast his hands a little over his head, and looking merrily on him, he said: It is well, seeing we are not all unfortunate. Therewith speaking no more words, nor making other ado, he drunke up all the poyson, and laid laid him downe as before. So nature strove not much withall, his body being brought so low, and thereupon the poyson wrought his effect, and rid him straight out of his paine. The newes of his death ranne presently through all ACHAIA, which generally from high to low was lamented. Whereupon all the ACHAIANS Youth and Counsellors of their Cities and Townes, assembled themselves in the City of MEGALIPOLIS, where they all agreed without delay to revenge his death. They made Lycortas their Generall, under whose conduct they invaded the MESSINIANS, with force and violence, putting all to the fire and sword: so as the MESSINIANS were so feared with this mercilesse fury, that they yeelded themselves, and wholly consented to receive the ACHAIANS into their City. But Dinocrates would not give them leisure to execute him by justice, for he killed himselfe: and so did all the rest make themselves away, who gave advice that Philopamen should be put to death. But those that would have had Philopamen hanged on a gibbet, Lycortas caused them to be taken, which afterwards were put to death with all kinde of torments. That done, they burnt Philopamens body, and did put his ashes into a pot. Then they straight departed from MESSINA, not in disorder, one upon anothers necke as every man listed: but in such an order and ray, that in the midst of the Funerals, they did make a Triumph of Victory. For the Souldiers were all crowned with Garlands of Laurell in token of victory, notwithstanding the teares ran downe their cheeks in token of sorrow, and they led their Enemies Prisoners, shackled and chained. The Funerall-pot in the which were Philopamens ashes, was so covered with Garlands of Flowers, Nofegayes, and Laces, that it could scant be seene or discerned, and was carried by one Polybius a young man, the Sonne of Lycortas, that was Generall at that time to the ACHAIANS: about whom there marched all the noblest and chiefe of the ACHAIANS, and after them also followed all the Souldiers armed, and their Horses very well furnished. The rest, they were not so sorrowfull in their countenances, as they are commonly which have great cause of sorrow: nor yet so joyfull, as those that came Conquerors from so great a Victory. Those of the Cities, Townes and Villages in their way as they past, came and presented themselves unto them, to touch the Funerall-pot of his ashes, even as they were wont to take him by the hand, and to make much of him when he was returned from the Warres: and did accompany his Convoy unto the City of MEGALIPOLIS: at the Gates whereof were old men, women and children, which thrusting themselves amongst the Souldiers, did renew the teares, sorrows and lamentations, of all the miserable and unfortunate City: who tooke it that they had lost with their Citizens, the first and chiefe place of honour among the ACHAIANS. So he was buried very honourably, as appertained unto him: and the other Prisoners of MESSINA were all stoned to death, about his Sepulcher. All the other Cities of ACHAIA, besides many other honours they did unto him, did set up Statues, as like to him as could be counterfeited. Afterwards in the unfortunate time of GREECE, when the City of CORINTH was burnt and destroyed by the ROMANS, there was a malicious ROMAN that did what he could to have the same pulled downe againe, by burdening and accusing Philopamen (as if he had bene yet alive) that he was alwaies enemy to the ROMANS, and envied much their prosperity and Victories. But after Polybius had answered him, neither the Confull Mummius, nor his Counsellors, nor Lieutenants, would suffer them to deface and take away the honours done in memory of so famous and worthy a man, although he had many waies done much hurt unto Titus Quintius Flaminius, and unto Manius. So, these good men then made a difference betweene Duty and Profit: and did thinke Honesty and Profit two distinct things, and so separated one from the other, according to reason and justice. Moreover, they were perswaded, that like as men receive courtesie and goodnesse of any, so are they bound to requite them againe with kindnesse and duty. And as men use to acknowledge the same: even so ought men to honour and reverence Vertue. And thus much of the Life of Philopamen.

Ann. Mond.
3752.

Ant. Christ.

IT is easie to see Titus Quintius Flaminius forme and stature, by Philopomenus Statue of Brasse, to whom we compare him: the which is now set up at ROME, neare to great Apollo that was brought from CARTHAGE, and is placed right against the coming into the Shew-place, under which there is an Inscription in Greeke Letters. But for his nature and conditions, they say of him thus: he would quickly be angry, and yet very ready to pleasure men againe. For if he did punish any man that had angered him, he would doe it gently, but his anger did not long continue with him. He did good also to many, and ever loved them whom he had once pleased, as if they had done him some pleasure: and was ready to do for them still whom he found thankfull, because he would ever make them beholding to him, and thought that as honourable a thing as he could purchase to himselfe, because he greatly sought Honour above all things; when any notable service was to be done, he would do it himselfe, and no man should take it out of his hand. He would ever be rather with them that needed his helpe, then with those that could helpe him, or do him good. For, the first he esteemed as a meane to exercise his Vertue with: the other, he tooke them as his fellows and followers of Honour with him. He came to mans state, when the City of ROME had greatest Warres and trouble: At that time all the Youth of ROME, which were of age to carry Weapon, were sent to the Warre to learne to traile the Pike, and how to become good Captaines. Thus was he entred into Martiall affaires, and the first charge he tooke, was in the Warre against Hannibal of CARTHAGE, where he was made Colonell of a thousand Footemen, under Marcellus the Consul: who being slaine by an ambush Hannibal had laid for him betwene the Cities of BANCIA and VENUSA, then they did choose Titus Quintius Flaminius Governour of the Province and City of TARENTUM, which was now taken againe the second time. In this Government of his, he wanne the reputation as much of a good and just man, as he did of an expert and skillfull Captaine. By reason whereof, when the ROMANES were requested to send men to inhabit the Cities of NARNIA and COSSA, he was appointed the chief Leader of them, which chiefly gave him heart and courage to aspire at the first to the Consulship, passing over all other meane Offices, as to be Edile, Tribune, or Prator, by which (as by degrees) other young men were wont to attaine the Consulship. Therefore when the time came that the Consuls should be elected, he did present himselfe among other, accompanied with a great number of those he had brought with him, to inhabit the two new Townes, who did make earnest suite for him. But the two Tribunes Fulvius and Manlius, spake against him, and said: It was out of all reason, that so young a man should in such manner prease to have the Office of the highest Dignity, against the use and custome of ROME, before he had passed through the inferiour Offices: of the Common-wealth. Nevertheless, the Senate preferred it wholly to the voices of the People: who presently pronounced him Consul openly, with Sextius Aelius, although he was not yet Thirty yeares old. Afterwards, Aelius and he deviding the Offices of the State by Lot, it fell upon Titus Quintius to wake Warre with Philip King of MACEDON. In the which he thinks Fortune greatly favoured the ROMANES affaires, that made such a man Generall of these Warres: for, to have appointed a Generall that by force and violence would have sought all things at the MACEDONIAN hands, that were a People to be won rather by gentleness and persuasions, then by force and compulsion: it was all against themselves. Philip to maintaine the brunt of a Battell against the ROMANES, had Power enough of his owne in his Realme of MACEDON: but to make Warre any long time, to furnish himselfe with Money and Victuals, to have a place and Cities to retire unto: and lastly, to have all other necessities for his men and Army, it stood him upon to get the force of GREECE. And had not the force of GREECE bene politically cut from him, the Wars against him had not bene ended with one Battell. Moreover, GREECE (which never before bare the ROMANES any great good will) would not have dealt then so inwardly in friendship with them, had not their Generall bene (as he was) a gentle Person, lowly and tractable, that wane them more by his wisdom, then by his force, and could both eloquently utter his minde to them, and courteously also hear them speake, that had to doe with him, and chiefly ministred justice, and equity to every man alike. For it is not to be thought that GREECE would otherwise so soone have withdrawn themselves from the rule of those, with whom they were acquainted, and governed: and have put themselves under the rule of strangers, but that they saw great justice and lenity in them. Howbeit that may more plainly appear by declaring of his Acts. Titus was informed, that the Generals before him sent to the Warre in MACEDON (as Sulpicius, and Publius Julius) used to come thither about the latter end of the yeare, and made but cold Warres, and certaine light skirmishes, as sometime in one place, and sometime in another against Philip, and all to take some straight, or to cut off Victuals: which he thought was not his way to follow their example. For they tarrying at home, consumed the most of their Consulship at ROME, in matters of Government, and so enjoyed the Honour of their Office. Afterwards in the end of their yeare, they would set out to the Warres, of intent to get another yeare over their heads in their Office, that spending one yeare in their Consulship at home, they might employ the other in the Warres abroad. But Titus not minding to trifle out the half of his Consulship at ROME, and the other abroad in the Warres: did willingly leave all his Honours and dignities, he might have enjoyed by his Office at ROME, and befought the Senate that they would appoint his Brother Lucius Quintius Lieutenant of their Army by Sea. Furthermore, he took with himself about three thousand old Souldiers of those that had first overthrowne Ardubal in SPAIN, and Hannibal afterwards in AFRICK, under the conduct of Scipio, which yet were able to serve, and were very willing to go with him in his journey, to be the strength of his Army. With this company he passed the Seas without danger, and landed in EPHROS, where he found Publius Julius encamped with his Army before King Philip, who of long time had lien in Camp about the mouth of the River of Apsus, to keep their straight and passage which is the entry into EPHROS. So that Publius Julius had lain still there, and done nothing, by reason of the natural force and hardness of the place. Then Titus took the Army of him, and sent him to ROME. Afterwards, himself went in Person to view and consider the nature of the Country, which was in this sort. It is a long valley walled one either side with great high Mountaines, as those which shut in the valley of Tempe in THESSALY: howbeit it had no such goodly Woods, nor greene Forests, nor fair Medows, nor other like places of pleasure, as the other side had: but it was a great deep marsh or quavemire, through the midst whereof the River called Apsus did runne being in greatnesse and swiftnesse of streame, very like to the River of PENEUS. The River did occupy all the ground at the feete of the Mountaines, saving a little way that was cut out of the maine Rocks by mans hand, and a narrow straight path by the waters side, very unhandfome for an Army to passe that way, though they found not a man to keep the passage. There were some in the Army that counselled Titus to fetch a great compasse about by the Countrey of DASSARETIDE, and by the City of LYNCUS, where the Countrey is very plaine, and the way marvellous easie. Howbeit he stood in great feare he should lacke Victuals, if he staid far from the Sea; and happily if he fell into any barren or leane Countrey, (Philip refusing the Battell, and purposing to flye) he should be constrained in the end to returne againe towards the Sea, without doing any thing, as his predecessor had done before. Wherefore he determined to crosse the Mountaines to set upon his Enemies, and to prove if he could win the passage by force. Now Philip kept the top of the Mountaines with his Army, and when the ROMANES forced to get up the Hills, they were received with Darts, Slings and Shot, that lighted amongst them here and there: insomuch as the skirmish was very hot for the time it lasted, and many were slaine and hurt on either side. But this was not the end of the Warre: for in the meane time there came certaine Neat-herds of the Countrey unto Titus (who did use to keepe Beasts on these Mountaines) and told him they could bring him a way which they knew the Enemies kept not: by the which they promised to guide his Army so, that in three daies at the furthest, they would bring them on the top of the Mountaine. And because they might be assured that their words were true, they said they were sent to him by Charopus, the Sonne of Maebatus. This Charopus was the chiefe man of the EPHROS who loved the ROMANES very well, yet he favoured them but underhand, for feare of Philip. Titus gave credit unto them, and so sent one of his Captaines with them, with foure thousand Footmen, and three hundred Horsemen. Heard;

Heard men that were their guides, went before still, soft bound, and the ROMANES followed after. All the day time the Army rested in thick Woods and marched all night by moon light, which was then by good hap at the full. Titus having sent these men away, rested all the rest of his Camp, saying that some daies he entertained them with some light skirmishes to occupy the Enemy withall. But the same day, when his men that fetched a compass about, should come unto the top of the Mountaine above the Campe of his Enemies, he brought all his Army out of the Campe by breake of day, and divided them into three Troopes: with the one of them he himselfe went on that side of the River, where the way is straightest, making his hands to march directly against the side of the Hill, The MACEDONIANS againe, they shot lustily at them from the height of the Hill, and in certaine places amongst the Rocks they came to the Sword. At the selfe same time, the two other Troopes on either hand of him, did their dangerous likewise to get up the Hill, and as it were envying one another, they climbed up with great courage against the sharp and steep hanging of the Mountaine. When the Sun was up, they might see there off, as it were, a certain smoke, not very bright at the beginning, much like to the Mists we see commonly rise from the tops of the Mountaines. The Enemies could see nothing, because it was behind them, and that the top of the Mountaine was possessed with the same. The ROMANES, though they were not assured of it, did hope being in the midst of the fight, that it was their fellows they looked for. But when they saw it increased still more and more, and in such sort, that it darkned all the Ayre, then they did assure themselves it was certainly the token their men did give them that they were come. Then they began to cry out, climbing up the Hills with such a lusty courage, that they drave their Enemies up the Hill still, even unto the very rough and hardest places of the Mountaine. Their fellows also that were behind the Enemies, did answer them with like loud cries from the top of the Mountaine: where with the Enemies were so affrighted, that they fled presently upon it. Notwithstanding, there was not flaine above Two thousand of them, because the hardnesse and straightnesse of the place did so guard them that they could not be chased. But the ROMANES spoiled their Campe, tooke all that they found in their Tents, tooke also their Slaves, and won the passage into the Mountaine, by the which they entered the Countrey of EPIRUS: and did passe through it so quietly, and with so great abstinence, that though they were farre from their Ships and the Sea, and lacked their ordinary portion of Corne which they were wont to have Monthly, and that Victuals were very scant: with them at that time, yet they never tooke any thing of the Countrey, though they found great store and plenty of all riches in it. For Titus was advertised, that Philip passing by THESSALY, and flying for feare, had caused the Inhabitants of the Cities to get them to the Mountaines, and then to set fire on their Houses; and to leave those goods they could not carry away, by reason of the weight and unhandsome carriage thereof, to the Spoile of his Souldiers: and so (as it seemed) he left the whole Countrey to the Conquest of the ROMANES. Whereupon Titus looking considerably to his doings, gave his men great charge to passe through the Countrey without doing any hurt or mischief, as the same which their Enemies had now left to them as their own. So they carried not long to enjoy the benefit of their orderly and wise forbearing of the Countrey. For, so soone as they were entred THESSALY, the Cities willingly yielded themselves unto them: and the GRECIANS inhabiting beyond the Countrey of THERMOPILES, did marvellously desire to see Titus, asking no other thing, but to put themselves unto his hands. The ACHAIIANS also on the other side, did renounce the League and alliance they had made with Philip and furthermore did determine in their Counsell, to make Warre with him on the ROMANES side. And although the ETOLIANS were at that time friends and confederates with the ROMANES, and that they did shew themselves very loving to take their part in the Warres: nevertheless when they desired the OPUNTIANs that they would put their City into their hands, and were offered that it should be kept and defended from Philip: they would not hearken thereto, but sent for Titus, and put themselves and their goods wholly into his Protection. They say, that when King Pyrrus first saw the ROMANES Army range in order of Battell from the top of a Hill, he said: This order of the Barbarous People setting of their men in Battell ray, was not done in a Barbarous manner. And those also that never had seen Titus before, and came for to speake with him: were compelled in a manner to say as much. For where they had heard the MACEDONIANS say, that there came a Captaine of the Barbarous People that destroyed all before him by force of Armes, and subdued whole Countries by violence; they said to the contrary, that they found him a man indeed young of yeares, howbeit gentle, and courteous to looke on, and that spake the Greek tongue excellently well, and was a lover onely of true glory. By reason whereof they returned home marvellous glad, and filled all the Cities and Towns of GREECE with good will towards him, and said: they had seen Titus, the Captaine, that would restore them to their ancient liberty againe. Then it much more appeared, when Philip shewed himselfe willing to have Peace and that Titus also did offer it him, and the friendship of the People of ROME, with these conditions that he would leave the GRECIANS their whole liberties, and remove his Garrisons out of their Cities and strong holds: which Philip refused to doe. And thereupon all GRECE, and even those which favoured Philip, said with one voice: that the ROMANES were not come to make Warres with them, but rather with the MACEDONIANS in favour of the GRECIANS. Whereupon all GREECE came in, and offered themselves unto Titus without compulsion. And as he passed through the Countrey of BOEOTIA, without any shew at all of Warres, the chiefe men of the City of THEBES went to meet him: who thought they tooke part with the King of MACEDON, because of a private man called Barchyletes, yet they would Honour Titus, as those which were contented to keepe keepe League and friendship with either side. Titus embraced them, and spake very courteously unto them, going on his way still faire and softly, entertaining them sometime with one matter, and sometime with another, and kept them in talke of purpose, to the end his Souldiers being wearied, with journeying, might in the meane time take good breath: and so marching on by little and little, he entered into the City with them. Wherewith the Lords of THEBES were not greatly pleased, but yet they durst not refuse him, though he had not at that time any number of Souldiers about him. When he was within THEBES, he prayed audience and began to perswade the People (as carefully as if he had not had the City already, that they would rather take part with the ROMANES, then with the King of MACEDON. And to further Titus purpose, King Attalus being by chance at that time in the Assembly, did helpe to exhort the THEBANS very earnestly, that they would doe as Titus perswaded them. But Attalus was more earnest then became a man of his yeares, for the desire he had (as was imagined) to shew Titus his eloquence: who did so straine and move himselfe withall, that he swooned sodainly in the midst of his Oration, whereby the rewme fell down so fast upon him, that it tooke away his senses, so as he fell in a Trance before them all, and few daies after was conveyed again by Sea into ASIA, where he lived not long after. In the meane time, the BOEOTIANS came in to the ROMANES, and tooke their part. And Philip having sent Ambassadors to ROME, Titus also sent thither of his men to sollicite for him, in two respects. The one if the Warres continued against Philip, that then they would prolong his time there. The other if the Senate did grant him Peace: that they would doe him the Honour, as to make and conclude it with Philip. For Titus of his owne nature being very ambitious, did feare least they would send a successor to continue those Warres, who should take the glory from him, and make an end of them. But his friends made such earnest sute for him, that neither King Philip attained that he prayed: neither was there sent any other Generall in Titus place, but he still continued his charge in these Warres. Wherefore, so soone as he had received his Commission and Authority from the Senate, he went straight towards THESSALY, with great hope to overcome Philip. For he had in his Army above Six and twenty thousand fighting men, whereof the ETOLIANS made Sixe thousand Footemen, and Three thousand Horsemen. King Philip's Army on the other side was no lesse in number, and they began to march one towards the other, untill at the length they both drew neare the City of SCOTUSA, where they determined to try the Battell, so neither they nor their men were afraid to see themselves one so neare another: but rather to the contrary, the ROMANES on the one side tooke greater heart and courage unto them, desiring to fight, as thinking with themselves what great Honour they should win to overcome the MACEDONIANS, who were so highly esteemed for their valiantnesse, by reason of the famous Acts that Alexander the Great did by them. And the MACEDONIANS on the other side also, taking the ROMANES for other manner of Souldiers then the PERSIANS, began to have good hope if they might winne the Field, to make King Philip more famous in the world, then ever was Alexander his Father. Titus then calling his men together, spake and exhorted them to stand to it like men, and to shew themselves valiant Souldiers in this Battell, as those which were to shew the proove of their valiantnesse in the heart of GREECE, the goodliest Theater of the world, and against their Enemies of most Noble fame. Philip then by chance, or forced to it by the speed he made, because they were both ready to joyne, did get up unawares upon a charnell House, (where they had buried many Bodies, being a little Hill raised up above the rest, and neare the trenches of his Campe) and there began to encourage his Souldiers, as all Generals doe before they give Battell. Who when he saw them all discouraged, for they tooke it for an ill signe that he was gotten up on the top of a Grave to speak unto them, he of a conceit at the matter, did of himselfe deferre to give Battell, that day. The next morning because the night was very wet by reason the South windes had blowne, the Clouds were turned to a Mist, and filled all the vally with a darke grosse thicke Ayre, coming from the Mountaines thereabouts, which covered the Field betwene both Campes with a Mist all the morning: by reason whereof the skouts on both sides that were sent to discover what the Enemies did, in very short time met together, and one gave charge upon another, in a place they call the Dogges heads, which are points of Rocks placed upon little Hills one before another, and very neare one unto another, which had beene called so, because they have had some likenesse of it. In this Skirmish there were many changes, as commonly fallieth out when they fight in such ill favoured stony places: for sometime the ROMANES fled, and the MACEDONIANS chased them: another time the MACEDONIANS that followed the chase, were glad to fly themselves, and the ROMANES who fled before, now had them in chase. This change and alteration came by sending new supplies still from both Camps, to relieve them that were distressed and driven to fly. Now began the Mist to breake up, and the Ayre to cleare, so that both Generals might see about them, what was done in either Campe: by reason whereof both of them drew on their Army to the Field and Battell. So Philip had the vantage on the right wing of his Army, which was placed on the height of an hanging Hill, from which they came so amaine to set upon the ROMANES, and with such a fury, that the Strongest and Valiantest that could be, had never beene able to abide the front of their Battell, so closely were they joyned together, and their Wall of Pikes was so strong. But on his left wing it was not so, because the ranks of his Battell could not joyne so neare nor close Target to Target, the place being betwixt the Hills and the Rocks, where the Battell was coming, so as they were compelled by reason of the straightnesse and unevennesse of the ground, to leave it open, and unfurnished in many places. Titus finding that disadvantage, went from the left wing of his Battell which he saw overlaid by the right wing of his Enemies, and going sodainly towards the left wing of King Philip's Battell, he set upon the MACEDONIANS on that side, where he saw they could not close their Ranks in the front, nor joyne them together in the midst of the Battell (which is the whole strength and order of the MACEDONIAN fight) because the Field was up hill and down hill: and to fight hand to had they were so pestered behind, that one thronged and over laid another. For the Battell of the MACEDONIANS hath this property, that so long as the order is kept close and joynd together, it seemeth as it were but the Body of a Beast of a force invincible. But also after that it is once open, and that they are sundred and not joynd together, it doth not onely lose the force and Power of the whole Body, but also of every private Souldier that fighteth: partly by reason of the diversity of the weapons wherewith they fight, and partly for that their whole strength consisteth most, in the disposing and joyning together of their ranks and orders, which doth stay up one another, more then doth every private Souldiers strength. So when this left wing of the MACEDONIANS was broken, and that they ran their way: one part of the ROMANS followed the chase, and the other ran to give a charge upon the Flanks of the right wing which fought yet, and they made great slaughter of them. Whereupon they now which before had the vantage, began to stagger and breake, and in the end ran away as fast as the other did, throwing down their weapons: insomuch as there were slaine of them Eight thousand in the Field, and Five thousand taken Prisoners in their chase. And had not the fault been in the ETOLIANS, Philip had not saved himselfe by flying as he did. For whilest the ROMANS had their Enemies in chase, the ETOLIANS tarried, and risled all King Philip's Campe, so as they left the ROMANS nothing to spoile at their returne. Whereupon there grew great quarrell and hot words betweene them, and one with another. But afterwards it angered Titus worse, challenging the Honour of this Victory to themselves, because they gave it out through GREECE, that they alone had overthrown King Philip in the Battell. So that in the Songs and Ballades the Poets made in praise of this Victory, which every Countrey and Town-man had in his mouth, they alwayes put the ETOLIANS before the ROMANS: as in this that followeth, which was currantly Sung in every place:

Withouten Honour of the grave, without Lamenting teares.
We thirty Thousand were, which ended have our dayes:
In cruel coasts of Thessaly, which caused our decayes.
We have been overthrown by th' Etolians men of Warre:
And by the Latine crews likewise, whom Titus led from farre, Even out of Italy, to Macedonie Land,
Us to destroy, he (Captaine like) did come with mighty band:
And Philip stout, therewhiles for all his proud fierce face, Is fled, more swift then Harts do runne, which are pursue in chase.*

The Poet was Alcaeus that made these Verses for to Sing, who did them in disgrace of King Philip, fastely increasing the number of his men which died in the Battell, onely to shame and spite him the more: howbeit he spited Titus thereby more then Philip, because it was Sung in every place. For Philip laughed at it, and to encounter him againe with the like mocke, he made a Song to counterfeit his, as followeth:

*This gibbet on this Hill, which passers by may marke, Was set to hang Alcaeus up withouten Leaves or barks.*

But Titus tooke it grievously, who chiefly desired to be Honoured amongst the GRECIANS, by reason whereof from that time forwards he dealt in the rest of his matters alone, without making account of the ETOLIANS: wherewith they were marvellous angry, and specially when he received an Ambassadour from Philip, and gave care unto a treaty of Peace which he offered. For then they were so nettled against him, that they gave it out through all GREECE, that Titus had sold Peace unto Philip, when he might altogether have ended the Warre, and utterly have destroyed Philip's whole Power and Empire, who had first brought GREECE into bondage. These slanderous reports and false Tales which the ETOLIANS spread thus abroad, did much trouble the ROMANS friends and confederates: but Philip selfe pulled this suspicion out of their heads, when he came in Person to require Peace, and did submit himselfe wholly to the discretion of Titus and the ROMANS. Titus then granted him Peace, and delivered to him his Realme of MACEDON, and commanded him he should give over all that he held in GREECE; and besides, that he should pay one Thousand Talents for tribute, taking from him all his Army by Sea, saving onely Ten Ships: and for assurance of this Peace, he tooke one of his Sons for Hostage, whom he sent to ROME. Wherein Titus certainly did very well, and wisely did foresee the time to come. For then Hannibal of CARTHAGE (the great Enemy of the ROMANS) was banished out of his Countrey, and came to King Antiochus, whom he put in the head, and earnestly moved, to follow his good Fortune, and the increase of his Empire. Whom Hannibal fo followed with these persuasions, that King Antiochus at length was come to it. And trusting to his former good success, and notable Acts, whereby in the Warres before he had attained the surname of Great, he began now to aspire to the Monarchy of the whole world, and sought how to finde occasion to make Warres with the ROMANS. So that if Titus (foreseeing that a farre off) had not wisely inclined to Peace, but that the Warres of Antiochus had fallen out together with the Warres of King Philip, and that these two the mightiest Princes of the world had joynd together against the City of ROME: then it had beene been in as great trouble and danger, as ever it was before in the time of their Warres against Hannibal. Howbeit, Titus having happily thrust in this Peace betweene both Warres, he cut off the Warre that was present, before the other that was coming: by which meanes heooke from one of the Kings his last: and from the other his first hope. In the meane time the Ten Commissioners that were sent by the Senate from ROME to Titus, to aide and assist him in the order of the affaires of GREECE, did counsell him to set all the rest of GREECE at liberty, and onely to keepe in their hands with good Garrison, the Cities of CHALCIDE, of CORINTH, and of DEMETRIADE, to make sure that by practise they should not enter into league and alliance with Antiochus. Then the ETOLIANS (that were the common slanderers of Titus proceedings) began openly to make these Cities to rebell, and did summon Titus to loose the Chaines of GREECE: for so did King Philip call these three Cities. Then they asked the GRECIANS in mockery, whether they were willing now to have heavier Fetters on their Legs then before, being somewhat brighter and fairer then those they had beene shackled with: and also whether they were not greatly beholding to Titus for taking off the Fetters from the GRECIANS Legs, and tying them about their necks. Titus being marvellously troubled and vexed with this, moved the Ten Counsellors so earnestly, that he made them grant his request in the end, that those three Cities also should be delivered from Garrison: because the GRECIANS thenceforth might no more complaine, that his grace and liberality was not thoroughly performed and accomplished in every respect on them all. Wherefore when the Feast called Isthmia was come, there were gathered together an infinit multitude of People, come to see the sport of the Games played there: for GREECE having beene long time troubled with Warres, they seeing themselves now in sure peace, and in very good hope of full liberty, looked after no other thing, but delighted onely to see Games, and to make merry. Proclamation was then made by sound of Trumpet in the Assembly, that every man should keepe silence. That done, the Herald went forward, and thrust into the midst of the multitude, and proclaimed aloud: that the Senate of ROME, and Titus Quintus Flaminius, Consul of the People of ROME, (now that they had overthrown King Philip and the MACEDONIANS in Battell) did thenceforth discharge from all Garrisons, and set at liberty from all Taxes, subsidies, and impositions for ever, to live after their old ancient Lawes, and in full liberty: the CORINTHIANS, the LOCRICIANS, those of PHOCIDE, those of the Iles of EUBOEAE, the ACHAIANS, the PHYLIOTIS, the MAGNESIANS, the THESSALIANS, and the PERROEBEANS. At the first time of the Proclamation, all the People could not hear the voice of the Herald; and the most part of those that heard him, could not tell directly what he said: for there ran up and down the Shew-place where the Games were Plaid, a confused brute and tumult of People, that wondred, and asked what the matter meant, so as the Herald was driven againe to make the Proclamation Whereupon after silence made, the Herald putting out his voice far louder then before, did proclaim it in such audible wise, that the whole Assembly heard him: and then rose there such a loud shout and cry of joy through the whole People, that the sound of it was heard to the Sea. Then all the People that had taken their places, and were set to see the Sword-players play, rose up all on their feet, letting the Games alone, and went together with great joy to salute, to embrace, and to thanke Titus the recoverer, Protector, and Patron of all their liberties of GREECE. Then was seen (which is much spoken of) the Power of mens voices: for Crowes fell down at that present time among the People, which by chance flew over the Shew-place at that time that they made the same out-shout. This came to passe, by reason the ayre was broken and cut asunder with the vehemency and strength of the voices, so as it had not his naturall Power in it, to keepe up the flying of the Birds: which were driven of necessity to fall to the ground, as flying through a voide place where they lacked ayre. Unless we will rather say, that it was the violence of the cry, which strook the Birds passing through the ayre, as they had beene hit with Arrows, and so made them fall down dead to the Earth. It may be also, that there was some hurling winde in the ayre, as we doe see sometime in the Sea, when it riseth high and many times turneth about the waves, by violence of the storme. So it is, that if Titus had not prevented the whole multitude of People which came to see him; and that he had not got him away betimes, before the Games were ended: he had hardly escaped from being stifled amongst them, the People came so thicke about him from every place. But after that they were weary of crying and Singing about his Pavilion untill night, in the end they went their way: and as they went, if they met any of their kin, Friends or Citizens, they did kisse and embrace one another for joy, and so supped and made merry together. In their more rejoicing yet, as we may thinkefull well, they had no other talke at the Table; but of the Warres of GREECE, discoursing among them what sundry great Warres they had made, what they had endured heretofore, and all to defend and recover their liberty. And yet for all that, they could never so joyfully, nor more assuredly obtaine it, then they did even at that present, receiving the Honourable reward, and that which deserved greatest fame through the world: that by the valiantnesse of strangers who fought for the same (without any spilt blood of their owne in comparison, or that they lost the Life of any one man, whose death they had cause to lament) they were so restored to their ancient freedom and liberty. It is a very rare thing amongst men, to finde a man very valiant, and Wife withall: but yet of all sorts of valiant men, it is harder to finde a just man. For Agessilaus, Lysander, Nicias, Alcibiades, and all other the famous Captaines of former times, had very good skill to leade an Army, and to win the Battell, as well by Sea as by Land: but to turne their Victories to any Honourable benefit, or true Honour among men, they could never skill of it.

Chalide, Corinth, Demetriade, called by Philip of Macedon, the Chaine of Greece.

Crowes flying, fell down by the sound of mens voices.

And if you doe except the Battell against the Barbarous People, in the plaine of MARATHON, the Battell of SALAMINA, the journey of PLATÆS, the Battell of THERMOPYLES, the Battell Cimon fought about CYPRUS, and upon the River of Eurymedon: all the other Warres and Battels of GREECE that were made, fell out against themselves, and did ever bring them into bondage: and all the tokens of Triumph which ever were set up for the same, was to their shame and losse. So that in the end, GREECE was utterly destroyed and overthrowne, and that chiefly through the wickednesse and selfe-will of her Governors and Captaines of the Cities, one envying anothers doing. Where a strange Nation, the which (as it should seeme) had very small occasion to move them to doe it, (for that they had no great familiarity with ancient GREECE, and through the counsell and good wisdom of the which, it should seeme very strange that GREECE could receive any benefit) have notwithstanding with dangerous Battels and infinite troubles, delivered it from oppreffion and servitude of violent Lords and Tyrants. This and such like talke, did at that time occupy the GRECIANS heads: and moreover, the deedes following did answer and performe the words of the Proclamation. For at one selfe time, Titus sent Lentulus into ASIA, to set the BARGILIANS at liberty, and Titillius into THRACIA, to remove the Garrisons out of the Iles and Cities which Philip had kept there: and Publius Fulvius was sent also into ASIA, unto King Antiochus, to speake unto him to set the GRECIANS at liberty which he kept in subjection. And as for Titus, he went himselfe unto the City of CHALCIDE, where he tooke Sea, and went into the Province of MAGNESIA, out of the which he tooke all the Garrisons of the Cities, and re-delivered the Government of the Common-wealth unto the Citizens of the same. Afterwards when time came that the Feast of Nemea was celebrated in the City of ARGOS in the Honour of Hercules, Titus was chosen Judge and Rector of the Games that were plaied there: where, after he had set all things in very good order, pertaining unto the solemnity of the Feast, he caused againe a solemn Proclamation to be made openly, for the Generall liberty of all GREECE. Furthermore visiting the Cities, he did establish very good Lawes, reformed justice, and did set the Inhabitants and Citizens of every one of them in good peace, amity and concord one with another: and did call home also all those that were out-lawes and banished men, and pacified all old quarrels and diffentions among them. The which did no lesse please and content him, that by perswasions he could bring the GRECIANS to be reconciled one with the other, then if he had by force of Armes overcome the MACEDONIANS. Infomuch, as the recovery of the Liberty which Titus had restored unto the GRECIANS, seemed unto them the least part of the goodness they had received at his hands. They say that Lycurgus the Orator seeing the Collectors of Taxes, carry Zenoaratus the Philosopher one day to Prison, for lacke of payment of a certaine imposition, which the strangers inhabiting within the City of ATHENS were to pay: he rescued him from them by force, and moreover prosecuted Law so hard against them, that he made them pay a fine for the injury they had done unto so worthy a Person: And they tell, that the same Philosopher afterwards meeting Lycurgus Children in the City, said unto them: I doe well requite your Fathers good turne he did me: For I am the cause that he is praised and commended of every man, for the kindeesse he shewed one my behalfe. So the good deedes of the ROMANES, and of Titus Quintius Flaminius unto the GRECIANS, did not only reape this benefit unto them, in recompence that they were praised and honoured of all the world: but they were cause also of increasing their Dominions and Empire over all Nationes, and that the world afterwards had great affiance and trust in them, and that most justly. So that the People and Cities did not onely receive the Captaines and Governours the ROMANES sent them: but they also went to ROME unto them, and procured them to come, and did put themselves into their hands. And not onely the Cities and commonalties, but Kings and Princes also which were oppressed by other (more mighty then themselves) had no other refuge, but to put themselves under their Protection: by reason whereof in a very short time (with the favour and helpe of the gods, as I am perswaded) all the world came to submit themselves to their obedience, and under the Protection of their Empire. Titus also did glory more that he had restored GREECE againe unto liberty, then in any other service or exploit he had ever done. For when he offered up unto the Temple of Apollo in the City of DELPHES, the Targets of Silver with his owne Shield, he made these Verses to be graven upon them, in effect as followeth:

O Noble twins Tyndarides Dan I love his Children deare, Throw out lowde shouts of joy and mirth, rejoyce and make good cheer.
O Noble Kings of Spartan soyle, which take delight to ride Your trampling Steeds, with fomy bit, and trappings by their side: Rejoyce you now, for Titus be, the valiant Romane Knight, These gifts so great to you hath got, even by his force and might:
That having taken cleane away from off the Greekish neckes,
The heavy yoke of servitude, which held them thrall to checkes, Unto their former liberty he hath restor'd them free, Which altogether perisht was, as men might plainly see.

He gave a Crowne of maslie Gold unto Apollo, upon the which he made this inscription to be written:

A valiant Romane Knight, even Titus by his Name,
A Captaine worthy by desert of high renowne and fame:

To

Torhee (Apollo god) this Crowne of pure fine Gold Hath given, thy godhead to adorne with Jewels manifold: Therefore let it thee please (Apollo god of grace)
With favour to requite this love to him and to his race:
That his renowned fame and Vertue may be spread,
And blazed through the world so wide, to shew what Life he led.

So hath the City of CORINTH enjoyed this good hap, that the GRECIANS have beene twice proclaimed to be set at liberty: the first time by Titus Quintius Flaminius, and the second time by Nero in our time, and at the selfe same instant when they solemnely kept the Feast called Isthmia. Howbeit the first Proclamation of their liberty (as we have told you before) was done by the voice of an Herald: and the second time it was done by Nero himselfe, who proclaimed it in an Oration he made unto the People in open Assembly, in the Market-place of the City of CORINTH. But it was a long time after. Furthermore, Titus began then a goodly and just Warre against Nabis the cursed and wicked Tyrant of LACEDÆMON. Howbeit in the end he deceived the expectation of GREECE: for when he might have taken him, he would not doe it, but made peace with him, forsaking poore SPARTA, unworthily oppressed under the yoke of bondage: either because he was afraid that if the Warre held on, there should come a succellour unto him from ROME, that should carry the glory away to end the same, or else he stood jealous and envious of the Honour they did unto Philopamen: who having shewed himselfe in every place as excellent a Captaine as ever came in GREECE, and having done notable Acts and famous service, both of great wisdom, and also of valiantnesse, and specially in the ACHAIANS Warre: he was as much Honoured and revered of the ACHAIANS in the Theater and common Assemblies, even as Titus was. Whereat Titus was marvellously offended, for he thought it unreasonable that an ARCADIAN who had never beene Generall of an Army, but in small little Warres against his neighbors, should be as much esteemed and Honoured as a Confull of ROME, that was come to make Warres for the recovery of the liberty of GREECE. But Titus alledged reasonable excuse for his doings, saying, that he saw very well he could not destroy this Tyrant Nabis, without the great losse and misery of the other SPARTANS. Furthermore of all the Honours the ACHAIANS ever did him (which was very great) he thinks there was none that came neare any recompence of his Honourable and well deserving, but one onely Present they offered him, and which he above all the rest most esteemed: and this it was. During the second Warres of AFRICK, which the ROMANES had against Hannibal, many ROMANES were taken Prisoners in sundry Battels they lost, and being sold here and there, remained slaves in many Countries: and amongst other, there were dispersed in GREECE to the number of Twelve hundred, which from time to time did move men with spite and compassion towards them that saw them in so miserable change and state of Fortune. But then much more was their misery to be pitied, when these captives found in the ROMANES Army, some of them their Sonnes, other their Brethren, and the rest their fellows and friends, free and conquerours, and themselves slaves and bondmen. It grieved Titus much to see these poore men in such miserable captivity, notwithstanding he would not take them by force from those that had them. Whereupon the ACHAIANS redeemed and bought them for Five hundred Pence a man, and having gathered them together into a Troope, they presented all the ROMANE captives unto Titus, euen as he was ready to take Ship to returne into ITALY: which present made him returne home with greater joy and contentation, having received for his Noble deeds so Honourable a recompence, and worthy of himselfe, that was so loving a man to his Citizens and Countrey. And surely, that onely was the Ornament (in my opinion) that did most beautifie his Triumph. For these poore redeemed captives did that, which the slaves are wont to doe on that day when they be set at liberty: to wit they shave their heads, and do weare little Hats upon them. The ROMANES that were thus redeemed, did in like manner: and so followed Titus Chariot, on the day of his Triumph and entry made into ROME in the Triumphing manner. It was a goodly sight also, to see the spoiles of the Enemies, which were carried in the shew of this Triumph: as store of Helms after the GRECIANS fashion, heapes of Targets, Shields, and Pikes after the MACEDONIAN manner, with a wonderfull summe of Gold and Silver. For Titus the Historiographer writeth, that there was brought a marvellous great Masse of Treasure in nigots of Gold, of Three thousand Seven hundred and Thirteene Pound weight: and of Silver, of forty three Thousand two Hundred Threecore and Ten Pound weight; and of Gold ready coyned in pieces called Philips, Fourteene thousand Five hundred and Fourteene, besides the Thousand Talents King Philip should pay for a rancome: the which summe, the ROMANES afterwards forgave him, chiefly at Titus sute and intercession, who procured that grace for him, and caused him to be called a friend and confederate of the People of ROME, and his Son Demetrius to be sent unto him againe, who remained before as an Hostage of ROME. Shortly after King Antiochus went out of ASIA into GREECE with a great fleet of Ships, and a very puissant Army, to stir up the Cities to forsake their League and alliance with the ROMANES, and make a diffention among them. To further this his desire and enterprise, the ETOLIANS did aide and back him, which of long time had borne great and secret malice against the ROMANES, and desired much to have had Warres with them. So they taught King Antiochus to say, that the Warre which he tooke in hand, was to set the GRECIANS at liberty; whereof they had no neede, because they did already enjoy their liberty: but for that they had no just cause to make Warre, they taught him to cloke it the honestest way he

he could. Wherefore the ROMANES fearing greatly the rising of the People, and the rumour of the Power of this great King, they sent thither Manius Acilius their Generall, and Titus, one of his Lieutenants for the GRECIANS sakes. Which arrivall did more assure them that already bare goodwill to the ROMANES, after they had once seene Manius and Titus: and the rest that began to fly out, and to shrinke from them, those Titus kept in obedience from starting, remembering that them of the friendship and good will they had borne him; even like a good skilfull Physitian that could give his Patient Phisicke to preserve him from a contagious disease. Indeede there were some (but few of them) that left him, which were won and corrupted before by the AETOLIANS: and though he had just cause of offence towards them, yet he saved them after the Battell. For King Antiochus being overcome in the Countrey of THERMOPYLES, fled his way, and in great hast tooke the Sea to returne into ASIA. And the Consull Manius following his Victory, entered into the Countrey of the AETOLIANS, where he tooke certaine Townes by force, and left the other for a pray unto King Philip. So Philip King of MACEDON on the one side, spoiled and sacked the DOLOPHANS, the MAGNESIANS, the ATHAMIANs, and the APERANTINES: and the Consull Manius on the other side, destroyed the City of HERACLEA, and laid siege to the City of NAUPACTUM, which the AETOLIANS kept. But Titus taking compassion of them to see the poore People of GREECE thus spoiled and turned out of all: went out of PELOPONNESUS (where he was then) unto Manius Acilius Camp, and there reproved him for suffering King Philip to usurpe the benefit and reward of his Honourable Victory, still conquering many People, Kings and Countries, whilst he continued siege before a City, and onely to wreak his anger upon them. Afterwards, when they that were besieged saw Titus from their Walls, they called him by his Name, and held up their hands unto him, praying him he would take pity upon them: but he gave them never a word at that time, and turning his back unto them, he fell a weeping. Afterwards he spake with Manius, and appeasing his anger, got him to grant the AETOLIANS truce for certaine dayes, in which time they might send Ambassadors to ROME, to see if they could obtain grace and pardon of the Senate. But the most trouble and difficulty he had, was to intreat for the CHALCIDIANS, with whom the Consull Manius was more grievously offended, then with all the rest: because that King Antiochus after the Warres was begun, had married his Wife in their City, when he was past yeares of marriage, and out of all due time. For he was now very old, and being in his extreme age, and in the midst of his Warres, he fell in dotage with a young Gentlewoman, the Daughter of Cleopatra, the fairest woman that was at that time in all GREECE. Therefore the CHALCIDIANS were much affected unto King Antiochus, and did put their City into his hands, to serve him in this Warre, for a strong and safe retiring place. Whereupon, when Antiochus had lost the Battell, he came thither with all possible speed, and taking from thence with him his passing faire young Queene which he had married, and his Gold, his Silver and Friends, he tooke the Seas incontinently, and returned into ASIA. For this cause the Consull Manius having wonne the Battell, did march straight with his Army towards the City of CHALCIDE in a great rage and fury. But Titus that followed him, did alwaies lye upon him to pacifie his anger, and did so much intreate him, together with the other ROMANES of state and Authority in Councell: that in the end, he got him to pardon them of CHALCIDE also. Who because they were preserved from perill by his meares, they to recompence this Fact of his, did consecrate unto him, all their most stately and sumptuous Buildings and common Works in their City, as appeareth yet by the superscriptions remaining to be seene at this day. As in the Shew-place of exercises: the People of CHALCIDE did dedicate this Shew-place of exercises, unto Titus and Hercules. And in the Temple called Delphinium: the People of CHALCIDE did consecrate this Temple unto Titus, and unto Apollo. And furthermore, unto this present time, there is a Priest chosen by the voice of the People, purposely to do Sacrifice unto Titus: in which Sacrifice after that the thing Sacrificed is offered up, and Wine powered upon it, the People standing by, doe sing a Song of Triumph made in praise of him. But because it were too long to write it all out, we have onely drawne in briefe the latter end of the fame: and this it is:

And vow to be their faithfull friends both now and evermore.
Sing out you Muses nine to Joves eternall fame:
Sing out the Honour due to Rome, and Titus worthy Name.
Sing out: (I say) the praise of Titus and his faith:
By whom you have preserved beene from ruine, dole and death.*

Now the CHALCIDIANS did not alone Honour and reverence Titus, but he was generally Honoured also by the GRECIANS as he deserved, and was marvellously beloved for his courtesie and good nature: which argueth plainly that they did not fainedly Honour him, or through compulsion, but even from the Heart. For though there were some jarre betwix him and Philopamen at the first about service, for emulation of Honour, and after betwix him and Diophanes also, both Generals of the ACHAIANS, yet he never bare them any malice in his heart, neither did his anger move him at any time to hurt them in any way, but he ever ended the heate of his words in Councell and Assemblies, where he uttered his minde frankly to them both. Therefore none thought him ever a cruell man, or eager of revenge: but many have thought him rash, and hasty of nature. Otherwise, he was as good a companion in company as possible could be, and would use as pleasant wife Mirth as any man. As when he said to the ACHAIANS, on a time, who would needs unjustly usurpe the Ile of the ZAZINTHIANs, to dissuade them from it: My Lords of ACHAIAS, if ye once go out of PELOPONNESUS, you put your selves in danger, as the torteyes doe, when they thrust their heads out of their shels. And the first time he parled with Philip to treat of Peace: when Philip said unto him, you have brought many men with you, and I am come alone: Indeede it is true you are alone, said he, because you made all your friends and kin to be slaine. Another time, Democrates MESSENIAN being in ROME, after he had taken in his cups in a Feast where he was, he disguised himselfe in Womans apparell, and danced in that manner: and the next day following he went unto Titus, to pray him to helpe him through with his sute, which was, to make the City of MESSINA to rebell, and leave the Tribe of the ACHAIANS. Titus made him answer, that he would thinke upon it: but I can but wonder at you (said he) how you can dance in Womans apparell, and Sing at a Feast, having such matters of weight in your head. In the Countsell of the ACHAIANS, King Antiochus Ambassadors being come thither, to move them to breake their League with the ROMANES, and make their alliance with the King their Master, they made a marvellous large discourse of the great multitude of Souldiers that were in their Masters Army, and did number them by many divers Names. Whereunto Titus answered, and told how a friend of his having bidden him one night to Supper, and having served for many dishes of Meate to his Boord, as he was angry with him for bestowing so great cost upon him, as wondering how he could so sodainly get so much store of Meate, and of so divers kinds: my friend said to me againe, that all was but Porke dressed for many waies, and with so sundry Sawces. And even so (quoth Titus) my Lords of ACHAIAS, esteeme not King Antiochus Army the more, to hear off so many men of Armes, numbred with their Lances: and of such a number of Footmen with their Pikes: for they are all but SYRIANS, diversly Armed, onely with ill favoured little weapons. Furthermore, after Titus had done these things, and that the Warre with Antiochus was ended, he was chosen Censor at ROME, with the Son of that same Marcellus, who had been five times Consull. This Office is of great dignity and as a man may say, The Crown of all the Honours that a Citizen of ROME can have in their Common-wealth. They put off the Senate, foure men onely, but they were not famous. They received all into the Number of Citizens of ROME, that would present themselves to be enrolled in their common Register: with a proviso, that they were born free by Father and Mother. They were compelled to do it, by Terentius Culeo, Tribune of the People, who to despise the Nobility perswaded the People of ROME to command it so. Now at that time two of the Noblest and most famous men of ROME were great Enemies one against another: Publius Scipio AFRICAN, and Marcus Porcius Cato. Of these two, Titus named Publius Scipio AFRICAN, to be Prince of the Senate, as the chiefeest and worthiest Person in the City: and got the displeasure of the other, which was Cato, by this mishap. Titus had a Brother called Lucius Quintus Flaminius, nothing at all like him in condition: for he was so disolutely and licentious given to his pleasure, that he forgot all comblinesse and honesty. This Lucius loved well a young Boy, and carriad him alwaies with him when he went to the Warres, or to the charge and Government of any Province. This Boy flattering him, one day said unto Lucius Quintus, that he loved him so well, that he did leave the sight of the Sword-players at the sharpe, which were making ready to the fight, although he had never seen man killed before, to waite upon him. Lucius being glad of the Boys words, answered him straight. Thou shalt lose nothing for that my Boy, for I will by and by please thee as well. So he commanded a condemned man to be fetched out of Prison, and withall called for the Hangman, whom he willed to strike off his head in the midst of his Supper, that the Boy might see him killed. Valerius Antias the Historiographer writeth, that it was not for the love of the Boy, but of a Woman which he loved. But Titus Livius declareth, that in an Oration which Cato himselfe made, it was written that it was one of the GAULES: who being a traitor to his Countrey-men, was come to Flaminius Gate with his Wife and Children, and that Flaminius making him come into his Hall, killed him with his own hand, to please a Boy he loved, that was desirous to see a man killed. Howbeit, it is very likely that Cato wrot in this sort, to aggravate the offence, and to make it more cruell. For, many have written it that it is true, and that he was no traitor, but an offender condemned to dye, and among other, Cicero the Orator doth recite it in a Book he made of age, where he made it to be told unto *Cato*s owne Person. Howsoever it was, Marcus Cato being chosen Censor, and cleansing the Senate of all unworthy Persons, he put off the same Lucius Quintus Flaminius, although he had been Consull: which disgrace did seeme to redound to his Brother Titus Quintus Flaminius also. Whereupon both the Brethren came weeping with all humility before the People, and made a Petition that seemed very reasonable and civill: which was, that they would command Cato to come before them, to declare the cause openly, why he had with such open shame defaced so Noble a House as theirs was. Cato then without delay, or shrinking back, came with his companion into the Market-place, where he asked Titus out aloud, if he knew nothing of the Supper where such a Fact was committed. Titus answered, he knew not of it. Then Cato opened the whole matter as it was, and in the end of his Tale, he had Lucius Quintus sweare openly, if he would deny that he had said was true. Lucius answered not a word. Whereupon the People judged the shame was justly laid upon him: and so to Honour Cato, they did accompanie him from the Pulpit for Orations, home unto his owne House. But Titus being much offended at the disgrace of his Brother, became Enemy to Cato, and fell in with those that of long time had hated him. And so by practise he procured of the Senate, that all bargaines of Leases and all Deedes of Sales, made by Cato during his Office, were called in, and made void: and caused many Suits also to be commenced against him.

him. Wherein, I cannot say he did wisely or civilly, to become mortall Enemy to an honest man, a good Citizen, and dutifull in his Office for his yeare, for an unworthy kinsman, who had justly deserved the shame laid upon him. Notwithstanding, shortly after when the People were Assembled in the Theater to see Games played, and the Senators were set according to their custome, in the most Honourable places: Lucius Flaminius came in also, who in lowly and humble manner, went to sit downe in the Furthest Seates of the Theater, without regard of his former Honour: which when the People saw, they tooke pity of him, and could not abide to see him thus dishonoured. So they cried out to have him come and sit among the other Senators and Consuls, who made him place, and received him accordingly. But to returne againe to Titus. The naturall ambition and covetous greedy minde he had of Honour, was very well taken and esteemed, so long as he had any occasion offered him to exercise it in the Warres, which we have spoken of before. For, after he had bene Consul, of his owne seeking he became a Colonell of a Thousand Footmen, nor being called to it by any man. So when he began to stoop for age, and that he had given over as a man at the last cast, to beare Office any longer in the State: they saw plainly he was ambitious beyond measure, to suffer himselfe in old age to be overcome with such youthfull violence, being farre unmeet for any of his yeares. For methinks his ambition was the onely cause that moved him to procure Hannibal's death, which bred him much disliking and ill opinion with many. For, after Hannibal had fled out of his owne Countrey, he went first unto King Antiochus: who, after he lost the Battell in PHRYGIA, was glad the ROMANES granted him Peace, with such conditions as themselves would. Wherefore Hannibal fled again from him, and after he had long wandered up and down, at the length he came to the Realme of BITHYNIA, and remained there about King Prusias, the ROMANES knowing it well enough: and because Hannibal was then an old broken man, of no force nor Power, and one whom Fortune had spurned at her feete, they made no more reckoning of him. But Titus being sent Ambassadour by the Senate, unto Prusias King of BITHYNIA, and finding Hannibal there, it grieved him to see him alive. So that notwithstanding Prusias marvelously intreated him, to take pity upon Hannibal a poore old man, and his friend who came to him for succour: yet he could not perswade Titus to be content he should live. Hannibal long before had received answer of his death from an Oracle, to this effect:

The Land of Libya, shall cover under mould,

The valiant corps of Hannibal, when he is dead and cold.

So Hannibal understood that of LIBYA, as if he should have died in AFRICA, and bene buried in CARTHAGE. There is a certain fandy Countrey in BITHYNIA, neare to the Seas side, where there is a little Village called LYSSA, and where Hannibal remained continually. He mistrusting King Prusias faint heart, and fearing the ROMANES malice also, had made seven privy Caves and vaults under ground long before, that he might secretly go out at either of them which way he would, and every one of them came to the maine vault where himselfe did lye, and could not be discerned outwardly. When it was told him that Titus had willed Prusias to deliver him into his hands, he sought then to save himselfe by those mines: but he found that all the vents out, had Watch and Ward upon them by the Kings commandement. So then he determined to kill himselfe. Now some say, he wound a Linnen Towell hard about his necke, and commanded one of his men he should set his knee upon his buttocke, and weighing hard upon him, holding the Towell fast, he should pull his neck backward with all the power and strength he could, and never leave pressing on him, till he had strangled him. Others say that he drank Bulls blood, as Midas and Theomistocles had done before him. But Titus Livius writeth, that he had Poison which he kept for such a purpose, and tempered it in a Cup he held in his hands, and before he drank he spake these words: Come on, let us deliver the ROMANES of this great care, sith my life is so grievous unto them, that they thinke it too long to tarry the naturall death of a poore old man, whom they hate so much: and yet Titus by this shall win no honourable Victory, nor worthy the memory of the ancient ROMANES, who advertised King Pyrrus their Enemy, even when he had Warres with them, and had won Battells of them, that he should beware of poisoning which was intended towards him. And this was Hannibal's end, as we finde it written. The News whereof being come to Rome unto the Senate, many of them thought Titus too violent and cruell to have made Hannibal kill himselfe in that sort, when extremity of age had overcome him already, and was as a Bird left naked, her Feathers falling from her for age: and so much the more, because there was no instant occasion offered him to urge him to doe it, but a covetous minde of Honour, for that he would be Chronicled to be the cause and Author of Hannibal's death. And then in contrariwise they did much Honour and commend the clemency and Noble minde of Scipio Africanus: who having overcome Hannibal in Battell, in AFRICA selfe, being then indeed to be feared, and had bene never overcome before: yet he did not cause him to be driven out of his Countrey, neither did aske him of the CARTHAGINIANS, but both then, and before the Battell, when he parlied with him of Peace, he tooke Hannibal courteously by the hand, and after the Battell, in the conditions of Peace he gave them, he never spake word of hurt to Hannibal's Person, neither did he shew any cruelty to him in his misery. And they tell how afterwards they met againe together in the City of EPHESUS, and as they were walking, that Hannibal tooke the upper hand of Scipio: and that Scipio bare it patiently, and left not off walking for that, neither shewed any countenance of misliking. And in entering into discourse of many matters, they descended in the end to talke of ancient Captaines: and Hannibal gave judgement, that Alexander the Great was the famousst Captaine, Pyrrus the second,

cond, and himselfe the third. Then Scipio smiling, gently asked him: What wouldst thou say then, if I had not overcome thee? Truly, quoth Hannibal, I would rather put my selfe the third man, but the first, and above all the Captaines that ever were. So divers greatly commending the goodly sayings and deeds of Scipio, did marvelously mislike Titus, for that he had (as a man may say) laid his hands upon the death of another man. Other to the contrary againe said, it was well done of him, saying, that Hannibal so long as he lived, was a fire to the Empire of the ROMANES, which lacked but one to blow it: and that when he was in his best force and lusty age, it was not his hand nor body that troubled the ROMANES so much, but his great wilddome, and skill he had in the Warres, and the mortall hate he bare in his heart towards the ROMANES, which neither yeares, nor age would diminish or take away. For mens naturall conditions doe remaine still, but Fortune doth not alwaies keepe in a state, but changeth still, and then quickeneth up our desires to set willingly upon those that Warre against us, because they hate us in their hearts. The things which fell out afterwards, did greatly prove the reasons brought out for this purpose, in discharge of Titus. For once Aristonius, Son of the Daughter of a plaier upon the Cithern, under the name and glory of Ennius, whose bastard he was, filled all ASIA with Warre and rebellion, by reason the People rose in his favour. Againe Mithridates, after so many losses he had received against Sylla and Fimbria, and after so many Armies overthrown by Battell and Warres, and after so many famous Captaines lost and killed: did yet recover againe, and came to be of Power both by Sea and Land against Lucullus. Truly Hannibal was no lower brought then Caim Marins had bene: for he had a King to his friend that gave him entertainment for him and his family, and made him Admirall of his Ships, and Generall of his Horsemen and Footmen in the Field. Marinus also went up and down AFRICA a begging for his living, inso much as his enemies at Rome laughed him to scorn: and soone after notwithstanding they fell down at his feete before him, when they saw they were whipped, murdered, and flaine within Rome by his commandement. Thus we see no man can say certainly he is meane or great, by reason of the uncertainty of things to come: considering there is but one death, and change of better Life. Some say also, that Titus did not this Act alone, and of his owne Authority, but that he was sent Ambassadour with Lucius Scipio to no other end, but to put Hannibal to death, by what means soever they could. Furthermore after this Ambassade, we doe not finde any notable thing written of Titus worthy of memory, neither in Peace, nor in Warres, for he died quietly of a naturall death at home in his Country.

IT is time now we come to compare them together. Therefore as touching the great benefits that came to the GRECIANS, neither Philopomen, nor all the other former Captaines are to be compared with Titus. For all the ancient Captaines almight being GRECIANS, made Warres with other GRECIANS: but Titus being a ROMANE, and no GRECIAN, made Warres for the liberty of GREECE. When Philopomen was not able to help his poore Citizens distressed sore and vexed with Warres, he sailed away into CRETA. Titus having overcome Philip King of MACEDON in Battell, did restore againe to liberty all the People and Cities of the same, which were kept before in bondage. And if any will narrowly examine the Battels of either party, they shall finde that Philopomen being Generall of the ACHAIANS, made more GRECIANS to be slaine, then Titus did of the MACEDONIANS, fighting with them for the liberty of the GRECIANS. And for their imperfections, the one of them was ambitious, the other was as obstinate: the one was quick and sodainly angred, the other was very hard to be pacified. Titus left King Philip his Realm and Crown after he had overcome him, and used great clemency towards the ETOLIANS: where Philopomen for spite and malice, took Towns and Villages from his owne native Countrey and City wherein he was borne, that had alwaies payed them tribute. Furthermore, Titus continued a found friend to them, to whom he had once professed friendship, and done pleasure unto: and Philopomen in a geare and anger, was ready to take away that he had given, and to overthrow the pleasure and good turne he had shewed. For Philopomen when he had done the LACEDAMONIANS great pleasure, did afterwards raze the Walls of their City, and spoiled and destroyed all their Countrey: and Philip overthrew their whole Government. It seemeth also by reason of his immoderate cholere, he was himselfe the cause of his owne death, for that he made more hast then good speed, to goe out of Crete to set upon those of MESSINA: and not as Titus, who did all his affaires with wisdom, and ever considered what was best to be done: But if we look into the number of Battels, and Victories. The Warre which Titus made against Philip was ended with two Battels: whereas Philopomen in infinite Battels in which he had the better, never left it doubtfull, but that his skill did ever help him more to the Victory, then the good Fortune he had. Moreover, Titus won Honour by means of the Power of ROME, when it flourished most, and was in best prosperity: Philopomen made himselfe, famous by his deeds, when GREECE began to stoope and fall altogether. So that the deeds of the one, were common to all the ROMANS: and the deeds of the other, were private to himselfe alone. For Titus was Generall over good and valiant Souldiers, that were already trained to his hand: and Philopomen being chosen Generall, did train his men himself, and made them afterwards very expert and Valiant, that were but meane and green Souldiers before. And whereas Philopomen had continuall Wars with the GRECIANS, it was not for any good Fortune he had, but that it made a certain proofe of his valiantnesse. For where all other things are answerable to his, there we must judge that such as overcome, have the most courage. Now Philopomen making Wars with the most Warlike Nations of all GREECE, (as the CRETANS, and the LACEDAMONIANS) did overcome the subtillest of them, by finenesse and policie: and the most valiant by prowesse and hardinesse. But Titus overcame, by putting that onely in practise, which was already found and stablished: as the discipline of Wars, and order of Battell, in the which his Souldiers had long before been trained. Whereas Philopomen brought into his Countrey, both the one and the other, and

and altered all the order which before they were accustomed unto. So that the chiefeft point how to win a battell, was found out anew, and brought in by the one; into a place where it was never before: and onely employed by the other, which had very good skill to use it, and had found it out already before. Againe, touching the valiant acts done in the person of themselves, many notable acts may be told of Philopomen, but none of Titus: but rather to the contrary. For there was one Archedamus an ETOLIAN, who flouting Titus one day, said in his reproach: that at a day of battell, when Philopomen ran with his sword in his hand, to that side where he saw the MACEDONIANS fighting and making head against the enemy, Titus held up his hands unto heaven, and was busie at his prayers to the gods, not stirring one foot, when it was more time to handle the sword, and to fight of all hands. All the goodly deeds Titus ever did, were done alwayes as a Consul, or Lieutenant, or Magistrate: whereas Philopomen shewed himself unto the ACHAIANS, a man no lesse valiant and of execution, being out of Office, then when he was a General. For when he was a General, he did drive Nabis the Tyrant of the LACEDAMONIANS out of MESSINA, and delivered the MESSINIANS out of bondage: and being a private man, he shut the Gates of the City of SPARTA, in the face of Diophanes (Generall of the ACHAIANS) and of Titus Quintus Flaminius, and kept them both from coming in, and thereby saved the City from sacking. Thus being borne to command, he knew not onely how to command according to the Law, but could command the Law it self upon necessity, and when the Commonwealth required it. For at such a time he would not tarry while the Magistrates which should govern him, did give him Authority to command, but he took it of himself; and used them when the time served: esteeming, that he which knew better then they what was to be done, was more truly their Generall, then he whom they had chosen. And therefore they do well, that do commend Titus Acts, for his clemency and courtesie used to the GRECIANS: but much more the Noble and Valiant Acts of Philopomen unto the ROMANS. For it is much easier to pleasure & gratifie the weak, then it is to hurt and resist the strong. Therefore sithence we have thoroughly examined and compared the one with the other, it is very hard to judge altogether the difference that is between them. Peradventure therefore the judgement would not seem very ill, if we do give the GRECIAN for Discipline of Warre, the pre-eminence and praise of a good Captaine: and to the ROMANS for Justice and Clemencie, the Name and Dignity of a most Just and Courteous Gentleman.

It is written, that since Noahs flood, the first King of the THESSALIANS, and of the MOLOSSIANS, was Phaeon, one of those who came with Pelagus into the Realme of EPIRUS. But some say otherwise, that Democalion, and his Wife Pyrra remained there, after they had built and founded the Temple of Dodone, in the Countrey of the MOLOSSIANS. But howsoever it was, a great while after that, Neoptolemus the Sonne, of Achilles, bringing thither a great number of people with him, conquered the Country, and after him left a Succession of Kings, which were called after his name, the PYRRIDES: because that from his infancy he was surnamed Pyrrus, as much to say, as red: and one of his legitimate Sonnes whom he had by Lanassa, the Daughter of Cleodes the Son of Hylus, was also named by him Pyrrus. And this is the cause why Achilles is honoured as a god in EPIRUS, being called in their language, Aspetos, that is to say, mighty, or very great. But from the first Kings of that race untill the time of Tharrytas, there is no memory nor mention made of them: nor of their Power that Raigned in the mean time, because they all became very Barbarous, and utterly void of civility. Tharrytas was indeed the first that beautified the Cities of his Countrey with the GRECIAN tongue, brought in civil Laws and Customes, and made his name famous to the posterity that followed. This Tharrytas left a Sonne called Alcetas; of Alcetas came Arymbas, of Arymbas and Troiade his Wife came Eacides, who married Phthia the Daughter of Menon the THESSALIAN, a famous man in any o- time of the warres, surnamed LAMIAN, and one that had farre greater authority then any o- ther of the confederates, after Leofhenes. This Eacides had two Daughters by his Wife Phthia, to say, Deidamea and Troiade, and one Sonne called Pyrrus. In his time the MOLOSSIANS rebelled, drave him out of his Kingdom, and put the Crowne into the hands of the Sons of Neoptolemus. Whereupon all the friends of Eacides that could be taken, were generally murdered and slaine outright. Androclides and Angelus in the meane time stole away Pyrrus, being but a sucking babe, (whom his enemies nevertheless eagerly sought for to have destroyed) and fled away with him as fast as possible they might, with few servants, his Nurses and necessary women onely to look to the child and giveit suck: by reason whereof their flight was much hindered, so as they could go no great journeyes, but that they might easily be overtaken by them that followed. For which cause they put the childe into the hands of Androclion, Hippias, and Neander, three lusty young men whom they trusted with him, and commanded them to runne for life to a certain City of MACEDON, called MEGARES, and they themselves in the meane time, partly by intreaty, and partly by force made stay of those that followed them till night. So as with much ado having driven them backe, they ran after them that carried the childe Pyrrus, whom they overtook at Sun-set. And now, weening they had bene safe, and out of all danger, they found it clean contrary. For when when they came to the River under the Towne Wallles of MEGARES, they saw it so rough and swift, that it made them afraid to behold it: and when they gaged the foord, they found it impossible to wade through, it was so high risen and troubled with the fall of the raine, besides that the darknesse of the night made every thing seeme fearfull unto them. So as they now that carried the childe, thought it not good to venture the passage over of themselves alone, with the women that tended the child: but hearing certaine Countrymen on the other side, they prayed and besought them in the name of the gods, that they would helpe them to passe over the childe, shewing Pyrrus unto them afare off. But the Countrymen by reason of the roaring of the River understood them not. Thus they continued a long space, the one crying, the other listning, yet could they not understand one another, till at the last one of the company bethought himselfe to pill off the Barke of an Oke, and upon that he wrote with the tongue of a buckle, the hard fortune and necessity of the childe. Which he tied to a stone to give it weight, and so threw it over to the other side of the River: other say, that he did prick the Barke through with the point of a dart which he cast over. The Countrymen on the other side of the River, having read what was written, and understanding thereby the present danger the child was in: felled down trees in all the hast they could possible, bound them together and so passed over the River. And it fortuned that the first man of them that passed over, and tooke the other that came with the childe, and conveyed them over as they came first to hand. And thus having escaped their hands, by easie journeyes they came at the length unto Glaucias King of ILLYRIA, whom they found in his house sitting by his Wife: and laid downe the childe in the midst of the floor before him. The King hereupon staied a long time without uttering any one word, weighing with himselfe what was best to be done: because of the fear he had of Cassander, a mortall enemy of Eacides. In the meane time, the childe Pyrrus creeping of all foure, took hold of the Kings Gown, and scrawled up by that, and so got up on his feet against the Kings knees. At the first, the King laughed to see the child: but after it pitied him againe, because the childe seemed like an humble suter that came to seek sanctuary in his Armes. Others say, that Pyrrus came not to Glaucias, but unto the Altar of the familiar gods, amongst the which he got up on his feet, and embraced it with both his hands. Which Glaucias imagining to be done by gods providence, presently delivered the childe to his wife, gave her the charge of him, and willed her to see him brought up with his owne. Shortly after, his enemies sent to demand the child of him: and moreover, Cassander caused two hundred talents to be offered him, to deliver the child Pyrrus into his hands. Howbeit Glaucias would never grant thereunto, but contrarily, when Pyrrus was come to twelve years old, he brought him into his Countrey of EPIRUS with an Army, and stablished him King of the Realme againe: Pyrrus had a great Majesty in his countenance, but yet indeed more fearfull then friendly. He had also no Teeth in his upper Jaw that stood distinctly one from another, but one whole bone throughout his Gumme, marked a littel at the top onely, with certaine rifts in the place where the Teeth should be divided. Men held opinion also, that he did heale them that were sicke of the Spleene, by sacrificing a white Cock, and touching the place of the Spleene on the left side of them that were sick, softly with his right foot, they lying on their backs: and there was not so poore nor simple a man that craved this remedy of him, but he gave it him, and tooke the Cocke he sacrificed, for reward of the remedy, which pleased him very well. They say also, that the great toe of his right foot had some secret vertue in it. For when he was dead, and that they burnt his body, all the rest being consumed to ashes, his great toe was whole, and had no hurt at all: but of that, we will write more hereafter. Now, when he was seventeen years of age, thinking himselfe sure enough of his Kingdom, it chanced him to make a journey into ILLYRIA, where he married one of Glaucias Daughters, with whom he had bene brought up. But his backe was no sooner turned, but the MOLOSSIANS rebelled againe against him, and drave out his friends and servants, and destroyed all his goods, and yeelded themselves unto his adversary Neoptolemus. King Pyrrus having thus lost his Kingdom, and seeing himselfe forsaken on all sides, went to Demetrius (Antigonus Sonne) that had married his Sister Deidamia, who in her young age was assured to Alexander the Sonne of Alexander the Great, and of Roxane, and was called his Wife. But when all that race was brought to wicked end, Demetrius then married her, being come to full and able age. And in that great battell which was stricken neere to the City of HIRPUS, where all the Kings fought together, Pyrrus being then but a young man, and with Demetrius, put them all to flight that fought with him, and was worthily reputed for the valiantest Prince amongst them all. Furthermore, when Demetrius was overcome, and had lost the battell, Pyrrus never forsook him, but faithfully did keepe for him the Cities of GRECE, which he put into his hands. And afterwards when Peace was concluded betwixt Demetrius and Ptolomy, Pyrrus was sent an Hostage for Demetrius into the Realme of EGYPT: where he made Ptolomy know (both in Hunting and in other exercises of his person) that he was very strong, hard, and able to endure any labour. Furthermore perceiving that Berenice amongst all Kings Ptolomies Wives, was best beloved and esteemed of her husband; both for her Vertue and Wisdome, he began to entertaine and honour her above all the rest. For he was a man that could tell how to humble himselfe towards the great (by whom he might win benefit) and knew also how to creepe into their credit: and in like manner was he a great scorner and despiser of such as were his inferiours. Moreover, for that he was found marvellous honourable and of faire condition, he was preferred before all other young Princes, to be the Husband of Antigona, the Daughter of Queen Berenice, whom she had by Philip, before she was married unto Ptolemy. From thenceforth growing through the alliance of that marriage, more and more in estimation and favour by means of his Wife Antigona, who shewed her self very vertuous and loving towards him: he found means in the end, to get both men and money to returne againe into the Realme of EPIRUS, and to conquer it: so was he then very well received of the people, and the better, for the malice they beare to Neoptolemus, because he dealt both hardly and cruelly with them. That notwithstanding, Pyrrus fearing lest Neoptolemus would repaire unto some of the other Kings, to seek aide against him, thought good to make peace with him. Whereupon it was agreed betweene them, that they should both together be Kings of EPIRUS. But in proceesse of time, some of their men secretly made strife againe betweene them, and set them at defiance one with another: and the chieftest cause as it is said, that angered Pyrrus most, grew upon this: the Kings of EPIRUS had an ancient custome of great antiquity, after they had made solemne sacrifice unto Jupiter Martialis, in a certain place in the Province of MOLOSSIDS (called PASSARON) to take their Oath, and to be sworne to the EPIROTS, that they would reigne well and justly, according to the Lawes and Ordinances of the Countrey: and to receive the Subjects Oathes interchangeably also, that they should defende and maintaine them in their Kingdome, according to the Lawes in like manner. This Ceremony was done in the presence of both the Kings, and they with their friends did both give and receive Presents each of other. At this meeting and solemnity, among other, one Gelon a most faithfull servant and assured friend unto Neoptolemus, who besides great shewes of friendship and honour he did unto Pyrrus, gave him two pair of draught Oxen, which one Myrtilus a Cup-bearer of Pyrrus being present, and seeing did crave of his master. But Pyrrus denied to give them unto him, whereat Myrtilus was very angry. Gelon perceiving that Myrtilus was angry, prayed him to sup with him that night. Now some say, he sought to abuse Myrtilus, because he was faire and young: and began to perswade him after supper to take part with Neoptolemus, and poyson Pyrrus. Myrtilus made as though he was willing to give care to this perswasion, and to be well pleased withall. But in the meane time, he went and told his master of it, by whose commendement he made Alexicrates, Pyrrus chiefe Cup-bearer, to talke with Gelon about this practise, as though he had also given his consent to it, and was willing to be partaker of the enterprife. This did Pyrrus to have two Witnesses, to prove the pretended poysoning of him. Thus Gelon being finely deceived, and Neoptolemus also with him, both imagining they had cunningly spurne the threed of their treason: Neoptolemus was so glad of it, that he could not keepe it himselfe, but told it to certaine of his friends. And on a time going to be merry with his Sister, he could not keepe it in, but must be prating of it to her, supposing no body had heard him but her selfe, because there was no living creature neere them, saving Phoenareta Samons wife, the Kings chiefe heardman of all his beastes, and yet she was laid upon a little bed by, and turned towards the wall: so that she seemed as though she had slept. But having heard all their talke, and no body mistrusting her: the next morning she went to Antigona King Pyrrus wife, and told her every word what she had heard Neoptolemus say to his Sister. Pyrrus hearing this, made no countenance of any thing at that time: but having made sacrifice unto the gods, he had Neoptolemus to supper to his house, where he slew him, being well informed before of the goodwill the chieftest men of the Realme did beare him, who wished him to dispatch Neoptolemus, and not to content himself with a piece of EPIRUS onely, but to follow his natural inclination, being borne to great things: and for this cause, this suspition also falling out in the meane while, he prevented Neoptolemus and slew him first. And furthermore, remembering the pleasures he had received of Ptolemy and Berenice, he named his first Sonne by his Wife Antigona, Ptolemy, and having built a City in the PRESSOYE, an Isle of EPIRUS, did name it BERENICIDA. When he had done that, imagining great matters in his head, but more in his hope, he first determined with himself how to winne that which lay neereft unto him: and so tooke occasion by this meanes, first to set foot into the Empire of MACEDON. The eldest Sonne of Cassander, called Antipater, put his owne Mother Thejalonica to death, and drove his Brother Alexander out of his own Countrey, who sent to Demetrius for help, and called in Pyrrus also to his aide. Demetrius being troubled with other matters could not so quickly go thither. And Pyrrus being arrived there, demanded for his charge sustained, the City of NYMPHÆA, with all the Sea coasts of MACEDON: and besides all that, certaine Lands also that were not belonging to the ancient Crowne and Revenues of the Kings of MACEDON, but were added unto it by force of Armes, as Ambracia, Acarnania, and Amphilochia. All these, the young King Alexander leaving unto him, he tooke possession thereof, and put good Garisons into the same in his own name: and conquering the rest of MACEDON in the name of Alexander, put his Brother Antipater to great distresse. In the mean time King Lysimachus lacking no goodwill to help Antipater with his force, but being busied in other matters, had not the mean to do it. Howbeit knowing very well that Pyrrus in acknowledging the great pleasures he had received of Ptolemy, would deny him nothing: he determined to write counterfeit Letters to him in Ptolemies name, and thereby instantly to pray and require him to leave off the warres begun against Antipater, and to take of him towards the defraying of his charges, the sum of three hundred Talents. Pyrrus opening the Letters, knew straight that this was but a fetch and device of Lysimachus. For King Ptolemies common manner of greeting of him, which he used at the beginning of his Letters, was not in them observed: To my Son Pyrrus, health. But in those counterfeit was,

Pyrrus first journey into Macedon.

King Lysimachus came to receive Pyrrus.

King Ptolemy, unto King Pyrrus health. Whereupon he presently pronounced Lysimachus for a naughty man: nevertheless, afterwards he made Peace with Antipater, and they met together at a day appointed, to be sworne upon the Sacrifices into the Articles of peace. There were three beasts brought to be sacrificed, a Goate, a Bull, and a Ramme: of the which the Ramme fell downe dead of himselfe before he was touched, whereat all the standers by fell a laughing. But there was a Soothsayer, one Theodotus, that perswaded Pyrrus not to swear: saying, that this signe and token of the gods did threaten one of the three Kings with sudden death. For which cause Pyrrus concluded no peace. Now Alexanders warres being ended, Demetrius notwithstanding came to him, knowing well enough at his coming, that Alexander had no more need of his aide, and that he did it onely but to feare him. They had not bene many dayes together, but the one began to mistrust the other, and to spie all the wayes they could to intrap each other: but Demetrius embracing the first occasion offered, perverted Alexander, and slew him, being a young man, and proclaimed himselfe King of MACEDON in his room. Now Demetrius had certaine quarrels before against Pyrrus, because he had over-run the Countrey of THESSALIE: and furthermore, greedy covetousnesse to have the more (which is a common vice with Princes and Noble men) made, that being so neare neighbours, the one stood in feare and mistrust of the other, and yet much more after the death of Deidamia. But now that they both occupied all MACEDON betweene them, and were to make divison of one selfe Kingdome: now I say began the matter and occasion of quarrell to grow the greater betweene them. Whereupon Demetrius went with his Army to set upon the ÆTOLIANS, and having conquered the Countrey, left Pantauchus his Lieutenant there with a great Army: and himselfe in person in the meane time marched against Pyrrus, and Pyrrus on the other side against him. They both missed of meeting, and Demetrius going on further on the one side, entered into the Realme of EPIRUS, and brought a great spoile away with him: Pyrrus on the other side marched on, till he came to the place where Pantauchus was. To whom he gave battell, and it was valiantly fought out betweene the souldiers of either party, but specially betweene the two Generals. For doubtlesse Pantauchus was the valiantest Capitaine, the stoutest man, and of the greatest experience in Armes, of all the Captaines and souldiers Demetrius had. Whereupon Pantauchus trusting in his strength and courage, advanced himselfe forwards, and lustily challenged the combat of Pyrrus. Pyrrus on the other side being inferiour to no King in valiantnesse, nor in desire to win honour, as he that would ascribe unto himselfe the glory of Achilles, more for the invitation of his valiance, then for that he was descended of his blood: passed through the midd of the battell unto the first ranke, to buckle with Pantauchus. Thus they began to charge one another, first with their darts, and then coming nearer, fought with their swords, not onely artificially, but also with great force and fury: untill such time as Pyrrus was hurt in one place, and he hurt Pantauchus in two: the one neere unto his throat, and the other in his legge: so as in the end Pyrrus made him turn his back, and threw him to the ground, but nevertheless killed him not. For, so soone as he was downe, his men took him up, and carried him away. But the EPIROTS encouraged by the victory of their King, and the admiration of his valiantnesse, took to it so lustily, that in the end they brake the battell of the MACEDONIAN footmen: and having put them to flight, followed them so lively, that they slew a great number of them, and took five thousand prisoners. This overthrow did not so much fill the hearts of the MACEDONIANS with anger, for the losse they had received, nor with the hate conceived against Pyrrus: as it wan Pyrrus great fame and honour, making his courage and valiantnesse to be wondered at of all such as were present at the battell that saw him fight, and how he laid about him. For they thought that they saw in his face the very life and agility of Alexander the Great, and the right shaddow as it were, shewing the force and fury of Alexander himselfe in that fight. And where other King did but onely counterfeit Alexander the Great in his Purple garments, and in numbers of souldiers and guards about their persons, and in a certain fashion and bowing of their necks a little, and in uttering their speech with an high voice: Pyrrus onely was like unto him, and followed him in his Martiall deeds and valiant Acts. Furthermore, for his experience and skill in Warlike Discipline, the bookes he wrote himselfe thereof, do amply prove and make manifest. Furthermore, they report, that King Antigonus being asked, whom he thought to be the greatest Capitaine: made answer, Pyrrus, so farre forth as he might live to be old, speaking onely of the Captaines of his time. But Hannibal generally said, Pyrrus was the greatest Capitaine of experience and skill in wars of all other, Scipio the second, and himselfe the third: as we have written in the Life of Scipio. So it seemeth that Pyrrus gave his whole life and study to the Discipline of warres, as that which indeed was Princely and meete for a King, making no reckoning of all other knowledge. And furthermore touching this matter, they report that he being at a feast one day, a question was asked him, whom he thought to be the best player of the Flute, Pjthion or Cephebias: whereunto he answered, that Polyperchon in his opinion was the best Capitaine, as if he would have said, that was the onely thing a Prince should seeke for, and which he ought chiefly to learne and know. He was very gentle and familiar with his friends, easie to forgive when any had offended him, and marvellous desirous to requite and acknowledge any courtesie or pleasure by him received. And that was the cause why he did very unpatiently take the death of Æropus, not so much for his death (which he knew was a common thing to every living creature) as for that he was angry with himselfe he had deferred the time so long, that time it selfe had cut him off from all occasion and meanes to requite the courtesies he had received of him. True it is, that money lent understand of them, if (before they entered into this war) they could be content the controversies they had with all the GRECIANS dwelling in ITALY, might be decided by justice; and therein to refer themselves to his arbitration, who of himself would undertake the pacification of them. Whereunto the Consul Leuinus made answer, that the ROMANES would never allow him for a Judge, neither did they feare him for an enemy. Wherefore Pyrrus going on still, came to lodge in the plaine which is between the Cities of PANDOSIA, and of HERACLEA: and having news brought him that the ROMANES were encamped very neer unto him on the other side of the River of Siris, he tooke his horse, and rode to the Rivers side to view their Campe. So having thoroughly considered the forme, the situation, and the order of the same, the manner of charging their watch, and all their fashions of doing, he wounded much thereat. And speaking to Megacles, one of his familiars about him, he said, This order Megacles (quoth he) though it be of barbarous people, yet it is not barbarously done, but we shall shortly prove their force. After he had thus taken his view, he began to be more careful then he was before, and purposed to tarry till the whole aide of their confederates were come together, leaving men at the Rivers side of Siris, to keep the passage, if the enemies ventured to passe over, as they did indeed. For they made hast to prevent the aide that Pyrrus looked for, and passed their footmen over upon a Bridge, and their horsemen had diverse fords of the River: inso-much as the GRECIANS fearing lest they should be compassed in behind drew backe. Pyrrus advertised thereof, and being a little troubled therewithal, commanded the Captains of his footmen presently to put their bands in battell ray, and not to stir till they knew his pleasure: and he himself in the mean time marched on with three thousand horse, in hope to finde the ROMANES by the River side, as yet out of order, and utterly unprovided. But when he saw afarre off a great number of footmen with their Targets ranged in battell, on this side the River, and their horsemen marching towards him in very good order: he caused his men to joyne close together, and himselfe first began the charge being easie to be known from other, if it had bene no more but his passing rich glistering Armour and furniture, and withall, for that his valiant deeds gave manifest proofe of his well deserving fame and renowe. For, though he valiantly bestirred his hands and body both, repulsing them he encountered withall in fight, yet he forgot not himselfe, nor neglected the judgement and foresight which should never be wanting in a Generall of an Army: but as though he had not fought at all, quietly and discreetly gave order for every thing, riding to and fro, to defend and encourage his men in those places, where he saw them in most distresse. But even in the hottest of the battell, Leonatus MACEDONIAN spied an ITALIAN man of Armes, that followed Pyrrus up and down where he went, and ever kept in manner of even hand with him, to set upon him. Wherefore he said to Pyrrus: My Lord, do you not see that barbarous man there upon a Bay horse with white feet? Sure he looketh as though he meant to do some notable feat and mischief with his owne hands: for his eye is never off you, but waiteth onely upon you, being sharpe set to deale with your self and none other, and therefore take heed of him. Pyrrus answered him, It is impossible Leonatus, for a man to avoid his destiny: but neither he nor any other ITALIAN whatsoever, shall have any joy to deale with me. And as they were talking thus of the matter, the ITALIAN taking his Speare in the middle, and setting spurs to his horse, charged upon Pyrrus, and ran this horse through and through with the same, Leonatus at the selfe same instant served the ITALIAN horse in the like manner, so as both their horses fell dead to the ground. Howbeit Pyrrus men that were about him, saved him presently, and slew the ITALIAN in the field, although he fought it out right valiantly. The ITALIAN name was Oplacus, borne in the City of FERENTUM, and was Captaine of a band of men of Armes. This mishance made King Pyrrus looke the better to himself afterwards, and seeing his horsemen give back, sent presently to hasten his footmen forward, whom he straight set in order of battell: and delivering his Armour and cloake to one of his familiars called Megacles, and being hidden as it were in Megacles Armour, returned againe to the battell against the ROMANES, who valiantly resisted him, so that the Victory depended long in doubt: for it is said, that both the one side and the other did chase, and was chased, above seven times in that conflict. The changing of the Kings Armour served very well for the safety of his own person, howbeit it was like to have marred all, and to have made him lose the field. For many of his enemies set upon Megacles, that wore the Kings Armour: and the party that slew him dead, and threw him starke to the ground, was one Deximus by name, who quickly snatched off his head-piecc, took away his cloake, and ranne to Leuinus the Consul, crying out aloud, that he had slaine Pyrrus, and withall shewed forth the spoiles he supposed to have taken from him. Which being carried about through all the Bands, and openly shewed from hand to hand, made the ROMANES marvellous joyfull, and the GRECIANS on the contrary, both afear'd and right sorrowfull: untill such time as Pyrrus hearing of it, went and passed along all his Bands bare headed, and bare faced, holding up his hand to his souldiers, and giving them to understand with his owne voice, that it was himselfe. The Elephants in the end were they indeed that won the battell, and did most distresse the ROMANES: for, their horses seeing them afarre off, were fore afraid, and durst not abide them, but carried their masters backe in despite of them. Pyrrus at the sight thereof, made his THESSALIAN horsemen to give charge upon them whilest they were in this disorder, and that so lustily, as they made the ROMANES flie, and sustaine great slaughter. For Dionysius writeth, that there died few lesse, then fifteene thousand ROMANES at that battell. But Hieronymus speaketh onely of seven thousand. And of Pyrrus side, Dionysius writeth, there were slaine thirteene thousand. But Hieronymus saith, lesse then four thousand: howbeit they were all of the best men of his Army, and those whom he most trusted.

King

King Pyrrus presently hereupon also tooke the ROMANES Campe, which they forlooke, and wan many of their Cities from their alliance, spoiled and overcame much of their Country. In so much as he came within fixe and thirty miles of ROME, whither came to his aide, as confederates of the TARENTINES, the LUCANIANS, and SAMNITES, whom he rebuked because they came too late to the battell. Howbeit a man might easily see in his face, that he was not a little glad and proud to have overthrowne so great an Army of the ROMANES with his owne men, and the aide of the TARENTINES onely. On the other side, the ROMANES hearts were so great, that they would not depose Leuinus from his Consulship, notwithstanding the losse he had received: and Caius Fabricius said openly, that they were not the EPIROTS that had overcome the ROMANES, but Pyrrus had overcome Leuinus: meaning thereby, that this overthrow chanced unto them, more through the subtilty and wise conduction of the General, then through the valiant feates and worthinesse of his Army. And hereupon they speedily supplid their Legions againe that were diminished, with other new souldiers in the dead mens place, and Leavied a fresh Force besides, speaking bravely and fiercely of this warre, like men whose hearts were nothing appalled. Whereat Pyrrus marvelling much, thought good first to send to the ROMANES, to prove if they would give any ear to an offer of peace, knowing right well that the winning of the City of ROME was no easie matter to compass or attain, with that strength he presently had: and also that it would be greatly to his glory, if he could bring them to peace after this valiant Victory. And hereupon he sent Cineas to ROME, who spake with the chieft of the City, and offered Presents to them and their Wives, in the behalfe of the King his Master. Howbeit, neither man nor woman would receive any at his hands, but answered all with one voice, That if the peace might be generall to all, they all privately would be at the Kings commandement, and would be glad of his friendship. Moreover, when Cineas had talked in open Audience before the Senate, of many courteous offers, and had delivered them profitable capitulations of peace: they accepted none, nor shewed any affection to give ear unto them, although he offered to deliver them their Prisoners home againe without ranfome, that had bene taken at the battell, and promised also to aide them in the conquest of ITALY, requiring no other recompence at their hands, saving their good wills onely to his Master, and assurance for the TARENTINES, that they should not be annoyed for any thing past, without demand of other matter. Nevertheless in the end, when they had heard these offers, many of the Senators yeelded, and were willing to make peace: alledging that they had already lost a great battell, and now they looked for a greater, when the force of the confederates of ITALIE should joyne together with King Pyrrus Power. But Appius Claudius, a famous man, who came no more to the Senate, nor dealt in matters of State at all by reason of his age, and partly because he was blind, when he understood of King Pyrrus offers, and of the common brute that ranne through the City, how the Senate were in minde to agree to the capitulations of peace propounded by Cineas, he could not abide, but caused his servants to carry him in his Chaire upon their armes unto the Senate door, his Sonnes, and Sonnes in Law taking him in their armes, carried him into the Senate house. The Senate made silence to honour the coming in of so notable and worthy personage: and he so soone as they had set him in his seate, began to speake in this sort: "Hitherunto with great impatience (my Lords of ROME) have I borne the losse of my sight, but now, I would I were also deafe as I am blind, that I might not (as I do) heare the report of your dishonorable consultations determined upon in Senate, which tend to subvert the glorious fame and reputation of ROME. What is now become of all your great and mighty bragges you blazed abroad through the whole world? That if Alexander the great himselfe had come into ITALY, in the time that our Fathers had bene in the flower of their age, and we in the prime of our youth, they would not have said every where that he was altogether invincible; as now at this present they do: but either he should have left his body slaine here in battell, or at the leastwise have bene driven to flie, and by his death or flying should greatly have enlarged the renowe and glory of ROME. You plainly shew it now, that all these words spoken then, were but vaine and arrogant vaunts of foolish pride: considering that you tremble for feare of the MOLOSSIANS and CHAONIANS, who were ever a pray to the MACEDONIANS: and that ye are afraid of Pyrrus also, who all his life time served and followed one of the guard unto Alexander the Great, and now is come to make wars in these parts, not to aide the GRECIANS inhabiting in ITALY, but to flie from his enemies there about his own Country, offering you to conquer all the rest of ITALY with an Army, wherewith he was nothing able to keep a small part of MACEDON onely for himselfe. And therefore you must not perswade your selves, that in making peace with him, you shall thereby be rid of him: but rather shall you draw others to come and set upon you besides. For they will utterly despise you, when they shall hear ye are so easily overcome, and that you have suffered Pyrrus to escape your hands, before you made him feeble the just reward of his bold presumptuous attempt unto you: carrying with him for a further hire, this advantage over you: that he hath given a great occasion both to the SAMNITES, and TARENTINES, hereafter to mocke and deride you. After that Appius had told this tale unto the Senate, every one through the whole Assembly, desired rather war then peace. They dispatched Cineas away theupon with this answer, that if Pyrrus sought the ROMANES friendship, he first must depart out of ITALY, and then send unto them to treat of peace: but so long as he remained there with his Army, the ROMANES would make war upon him; with all the force and power they could make, yea although he had overthrowne and slaine ten thousand such Captaines as Levinus was. They say that Cineas, during the time of his abode at Rome, intreating for their peace, did curiously labour to confider and understand the manners, order, and life of the ROMANES, and their Commonweale, discoursing thereof with the chiefeft men of the City: and how afterwards he made ample report of the same unto Pyrrus: and told him amongst other things, that the Senate appeared to him, a Councell-house of many Kings. And furthermore (for the number of people) that he feared greatly they should fight against such a Serpent, as that which was in old time in the Marshes of LEBNA, of which, when they had cut of one head, seven other came up in the place: because the Consul Levinus had now leaved another Army, twice as great as the first was, and had left at Rome also, many times as many good able men to carry Armor. After this, there were sent Ambassadors from Rome unto Pyrrus, and amongst other, Caius Fabricius, touching the state of Prisoners. Cineas told the King his Master, that this Fabricius was one of the greatest men of account in Rome, a right honest man, a good Captaine, and a very valiant man of his hands, yet poore indeed he was notwithstanding. Pyrrus taking him secretly aside, made very much of him, and amongst other things, offered him both Gold and Silver, praying him to take it, not for any dishonest respect he meant towards him, but onely for a pledge of goodwill and friendship that should be between them. Fabricius would none of his gift: so Pyrrus left him for that time. Notwithstanding the next morning, thinking to feare him, because he had never seen Elephant before, Pyrrus commanded his men, that when they saw Fabricius and him talking together, they should bring one of his greatest Elephants, and set him hard by them, behind a hanging: which being done, at a certaine signe by Pyrrus given, suddenly the hanging was pulled backe, and the Elephant with his Trunke was over Fabricius head, and gave a terrible and fearfull cry. Fabricius softly giving backe, nothing afraid, laughed, and said to Pyrrus smiling: Neither did your Gold (Oh King) yesterday move me, nor your Elephant to day feare me. Furthermore, whilest they were at Supper, falling in talke of diverse matters, specially touching the state of Greece, and the Philosophers there: Cineas by chance spake of Epicurus, and rehearsed the opinions of the EPICURIANS touching the gods and Government of the Commonwealth, how they placed mans chiefe felicity in pleasure, how they fled from all Office and Publike charge, as from a thing that hindereth the fruition of true felicity: how they maintained that the gods were immortall, neither moved with pity nor anger, and led an idle life full of all pleasures and delights, without taking any regard of mens doings. But as he still continued this discourse, Fabricius cried out aloud, and said: The gods grant that Pyrrus and the SAMNITES were of such opinions, as long as they had warres against us. Pyrrus marvelling much at the constancy and magnanimity of this man, was more desirous a great deale to have peace with the ROMANES, then before. And privately prayed Fabricius very earnestly, that he would Treatate for Peace, whereby he might afterwards come and remaine with him: saying, that he would give him the chiefe place of honour about him, amongst all his friends. Whereunto Fabricius answered him softly: That were not good (Oh King) for your selfe, quoth he: for your men that presently do honour and esteem you, by experience if they once knew me, would rather chuse me for their King, then your selfe. Such was Fabricius talke, whose words Pyrrus took not in ill part, neither was offended with them at all, as a Tyrant would have been: but did himselfe report to his friends and familiars the noble minde he found in him, and delivered him upon his faith onely, all the ROMANE prisoners: to the end that if the Senate would not agree unto peace, they might yet see their friends and keep the feast of Saturne with them, and then to send them backe againe unto him. Which the Senate established by decree, upon pain of death to all such as should not performe the same accordingly. Afterwards Fabricius was chosen Consul, and as he was in his Campe, there came a man to him that brought him a Letter from King Pyrrus Physician, written with his owne hands: in which the Physician offered to poison his Master, so he would promise him a good reward, for ending the wars without further danger. Fabricius detesting the wickednes of the Physician, and having made Quintus Amylius his Colleague and fellow Consul also to abhor the same: wrote a Letter unto Pyrrus, and bade him take heed, for there were that meant to poison him. The Contents of his Letter were these: Caius Fabricius, and Quintus Amylius Consuls of Rome, unto King Pyrrus. Greeting, You have (O King) made unfortunate choise, both of your friends and of your enemies, as shall appear unto you by reading of this Letter which one of yours hath writ unto us: for you make wars with just and honest men, and do your selfe trust altogether the wicked and unfaithful. Hereof therefore we have thought good to advertise you, not in respect to pleasure you, but for feare lest the misfortune of your death might make us unjustly to be accused: imagining that by treachery or treason, we have fought to end this war, as though by valiantnesse we could not otherwise achieve it. Pyrrus having read this Letter, and proved the contents thereof true, executed the Physician as he had deserved: and to requite the advertisement of the Consuls, he sent Fabricius and the ROMANES their prisoners, without paying of ranfome, and sent Cineas againe unto them, to prove if he could obtain peace. Howbeit the ROMANES, because they would neither receive pleasure of their enemies, and least of all reward, for that they consented not unto so wicked a deed: did not onely refuse to take their prisoners of free gift, but they sent him againe so many SAMNITES, and TARENTINES. And furthermore, for peace and his friendship, they would give no ear to it, before the wars were ended, & that he had sent away his Army againe by sea into his Kingdom of Epirus. Wherefore Pyrrus seeing no remedy, but that he must needs fight another battell, after he had somewhat refreshed his Army, drew towards the City of Asculum, where he fought the second time with the ROMANES: and was brought into a marvellous ill ground for horsemen, by a very swift running River, from whence came many Brookes and deepe Marishes, insomuch as his Elephants could have no space nor ground to joyne with the Battell of the Footemen, by reason whereof there was a great number of men hurt and slaine on both sides. And in the end, the Battell being fought out all day long, the darke night did sever them: but the next morning, Pyrrus to winne the advantage to fight in the plaine Field, where he might prevaile with the force of his Elephants, sent first certaine of his Bands to sieze upon the naughty ground they had fought on the day before. And by this policy having brought the ROMANES into the plaine Field, he thrust in amongst his Elephants, store of shot and sling men, and then made his Army march (being very well set in order) with great fury against his Enemies. They missing the other daies turnings and places of retire, were now compelled to fight all on a front in the plaine Field: and striving to breake into the Battell of Pyrrus Footmen before the Elephants came, they desperately pressed in upon the Enemies Pikes with their Swords, not caring for their owne persons what became of them, but onely looked to kill and destroy their Enemies. In the end notwithstanding, after the Battell had holden out very long, the ROMANES lost it, and they first began to breake and fle from that side that Pyrrus was, by reason of the great force and fury of his Charge, and much more through the violence of the Elephants: against which the ROMANES valiantnesse nor courage could ought prevaile, but that they were driven to give them place (much like the rage of surging waves, or terrible trembling of the Earth) rather then tarry to be troden under feet, and overthrowne by them, whom they were not able to hurt againe, but be by them most grievously martyred, and their troubles thereby yet nothing eased. The chafe was not long, because they fled but into their Campe: and Hieronymus the Historiographer writeth, that there died six thousand men of the ROMANES, and of Pyrrus part about three thousand five hundred and five, as the Kings owne Chronicles do witnesse. Nevertheless, Dionysius makes no mention of two Battels given neare unto the City of Asculum, nor that the ROMANES were certainly overthrowne: howbeit he affirmeth that there was one Battell onely that continued unto Sunne-set, and that they scarcely fevored also when night was come on, Pyrrus being hurt on the arme with a Speare, and his carriage robbed and spoyled by the SAMNITES besides. And further, that there died in this Battell, above fifteene thousand men, as well of Pyrrus side, as of the ROMANES part: and that at the last, both the one and the other did retire. And some say, that it was at that time Pyrrus answered one, who rejoiced with him for the Victory they had wonne: If we winne another of the price, quoth he, we are utterly undone. For indeede then had he lost the most part of his Army he brought with him out of his Realme, and all his friends and Captains in manner every one, or at the least there lacked little of it: and besides that, he had no means to supply them with other from thence, and perceived also that the Confederates he had in Italy, began to waxe cold. Where the ROMANES to the contrary, did easily renew their Army with fresh Souldiers, which they caused to come from Rome as neede required (much like unto a lively Spring, the head whereof they had at home in their Country) and they fainted not at all for any losses they received, but rather were they so much the more hotly bent, stoutly determining to abide out the Warres, whatever betide. And thus whilest Pyrrus was troubled in this sort, new hopes and new enterprises were offered unto him, that made him doubtfull what to do. For even at a clap came Ambassadors unto him out of Sicilia, offering to put into his hands, the Cities of Syracusa, of AGRIGENTUM, and of the LEONTINES, beseeching him to aide them to drive the CARTHAGINIANS out of the Isle, thereby to deliver them from all the Tyrants. And on the other side also, newes was brought him from Greece, how Ptolemie surnamed the Lightning, was slaine, and all his Army overthrowne in Battell against the GAULES, and that now he should come in good houre for the MACEDONIANS, who lacked but a King. Then he cursed his hard fortune, that presented him all at once, such sundry occasions to do great things: and as if both enterprises had been already in his hand, he made his account that of necessity he must lose one of them. So, long debating the matter with himselfe, which of the two waies he should conclude upon: in the end he resolved, that by the Warres of Sicilia, there was good meane to attaine to the greater matters, considering that AFRICKE was not far from them. Wherefore, disposing himselfe that way, he sent Cineas thither immediately to make his way, and to speake to the Townes and Cities of the Country, as he was wont to do: and in the meane time left a strong Garrison in the City of TARENTUM, to keepe it at his devotion, wherewith the TARENTINES were very angry. For they made request unto him, either to remaine in their Country to maintaine Wars with them against the ROMANES (which was their meaning why they sent for him) or else if he would needes go, at the leastwise to leave their City in as good state as he found it. But he answered them againe very roughly, that they should speake no more to him in it, and that they should not choose but tarry his occasion. And with this answer he tooke Shippe, and sailed towards Sicilia: where so soone as he was arrived, he found all that he hoped for, for the Cities did willingly put themselves into his hands. And where necessity of Battell was offered him to employ his Army, nothing at the beginning could stand before him. For, with thirty thousand Footemen, two thousand five hundred Horsemen, and two hundred Saile which he brought with him, he drave the CARTHAGINIANS before him, and conquered all the Country under their obedience. Now at that time, the City of ERIX was the strongest place they had: and there were a great number of good Souldiers within to defend it. Pyrrus determined to prove the assault of it, and when his Army was ready to give the Charge, he armed himselfe at all pieces from top to toe, and approaching the Walls, vowed unto Hercules to give him a solemne Sacrifice, with a Feast of common Playes, so that he would grant him grace to shew himselfe unto the GRECIANS inhabiting in Sicilia, worthy of the noble Ancestors from whence he came, and of the great good fortune he had in his hands. This Vow ended, he straight made the Trumpets found to the assault, and caused the barbarous People that were on the Walls, to retire with force of his shot. Then when the scaling-ladders were set up, himselfe was the first that mounted on the Wall, where he found divers of the barbarous People that resisted him. But some he threw over the Walls on either side of him, and with his Sword slew many dead about him, himselfe not once hurt: for the barbarous People had not the heart to looke him in the face, his countenance was so terrible. And this doth prove that Homer spake wisely, and like a man of experience, when he said: That valiantnesse onely amongst all other Morall Vertues, is that which hath sometimes certaine furious motions and divine provocations, which makes a man besides himselfe. So the City being taken, he honourably performed his vowed Sacrifice to Hercules, and kept a Feast of all kinds and sorts of Games and Weapons. There dwelt a barbarous People at that time about MESSINA, called the MAMERTINES, who did much hurt to the GRIECIANS thereabouts, making many of them pay Taxe and Tribute: for they were a great number of them, and all men of Warre and good Souldiers, and had their name also of Mars, because they were Martiall men, and given to Armes. Pyrrus led his Army against them, and overthrew them in Battell: and put their Collectors to death, that did levie and exact the Taxe, and razed many of their Fortresses. And when the CARTHAGINIANS required peace and his friendship, offering him Ships and Money, pretending greater matters, he made them a short answer: That there was but one way to make peace and love betweene them, to forsake SICILIA altogether, and to be contented to make Mare Libycum the border betwixt GREECI and them. For this good fortune, and the force he had in his hands, did set him aloft, and further allured him to follow the hope that brought him into SICILIA, aspiring first of all unto the conquest of LYBIA. Now, to passe him over thither he had Ships enough, but he lacked Owers and Mariners: wherefore when he would presse them, then he began to deale roughly with the Cities of SICILIA, and in anger compelled, and severely punished them, that would not obey his commandement. This he did not at his first coming, but contrarily had wonne all their good wills, speaking more courteously to them than any other did, and shewing that he trusted them altogether, and troubled them in nothing. But suddenly being aldrd from a popular Prince, unto a violent Tyrant, he was not onely thought cruell and rigorous, but that worst of all is, unfaithfull and ungratefull: nevertheless, though they received great hurt by him, yet they suffered it, and granted him any needfull thing he did demand. But when they saw he began to mistrust Thanon and Softratus, the two chiefe Captaines of SYRACUSA, and they who first caused him to come into SICILIA, who also at his first arrivall delivered the City of SYRACUSA into his hands, and had beene his chiefe aiders in helping him to compasse that he had done in SICILIA: when, I say, they saw he would no more carry them with him, nor leave them behinde him for the mistrust he had of them, and that Softratus fled from him, and absented himselfe, fearing lest Pyrrus would doe him some mischief: and that Pyrrus moreover, had put Thanon to death, mistrusting that he would also have done him some harme, then all things fell out against Pyrrus: not one after another, nor by little and little, but all together at one instant, and all the Cities generally hated him to the death, and did againe some of them confederate with the CARTHAGINIANS, and others with the MAMERTINES, to set upon him. But when all SICILIA was thus bent against him, he received Letters from the SAMNITES and TARENTINES, by which they advertised him, how they had much ado to defend themselves within their Cities and strong Holds, and that they were wholly driven out of the Field: wherefore they earnestly besought him speedily to come to their aide. This newes came happily to him, to cloake his flying, that he might say it was not for despaire of good successe in SICILIA that he went his way: but true it was indeede, that when he saw he could no longer keepe it, then a Ship could stand still among the waves, he sought some honest shadow to colour his departing. And that surely was the cause why he returned againe into ITALY. Nevertheless, at his departure out of SICILIA, they say that looking backe upon the Isle, he said to those that were about him: O what a goodly Field for a Battell (my friends) do we leave to the ROMANES and CARTHAGINIANS, to fight the one with the other? And verily so it fell out shortly after, as he had spoken. But the barbarous People conspiring together against Pyrrus, the CARTHAGINIANS, on the one side watching his passage, gave him Battell on the Sea, in the very Straight it selfe, of MESSINA, where he lost many of his Ships, and fled with the rest, and tooke the Coast of ITALY. And there the MAMERTINES on the other side, being gone thither before, to the number of eightene thousand fighting men, durst not present him Battell in open Field, but tarried for him in certaine Straights of the Mountaines, and in very hard places, and so set upon his Rereward, and disordered all his Army. They slew two of his Elephants, and cut off a great number of his Rereward, so as he was compelled himselfe in person to come from his Vant-guard, to helpe them against the barbarous People, which were lusty valiant men, and old trained Souldiers. And there Pyrrus caught a blow on his head with a Sword, and was in great danger: inso much as he was forced to retire out of the prease and Fight: which did so much the more encourage his Enemies: amongst which there was one more adventurous than the rest, a goodly man of personage, faire armed in white Armour, who advancing himselfe farre before his Company, cried out to the King with a bold fierce voyce, and challenged him to fight with him if he were alive. Pyrrus being mad as it were with this bravery, turned againe with his Guard, in spite of his men, hurt as he was. And besides that, he was all on a fire with choler, and his face all bloody and terrible to behold, he went through his men, and came at the length to this barbarous Villaine that had challenged him: and gave him such a blow on his head with all his force and power, that that what by the strength of his arme, and through the goodnesse of the temper and mettall of his Sword, the blow clave his head right in the middle, downe to the shoulders: so that his head being thus divided, the one part fell on the one shoulder, and the other part on the other. This matter suddenly stayed the barbarous People, and kept them from going any further, they were so afraid and amazed, to see so great a blow with ones hand, and it made them thinke indeede, that Pyrrus was more then a man. After that, they let him go, and troubled him no more: Pyrrus holding on his Journey, arrived at the length in the City of TARENTUM, with twenty thousand Footemen, and three thousand Horse. And with these (joyning thereto the choicest men of the TARENTINES) he went incontinently into the Field to seeke out the ROMANES, who had their Campe within the Territories of the SAMNITES, which were then in very hard state: for their hearts were killed, because that in many Battels and encounters with the ROMANES they were ever overthrowne. They were very angry besides with Pyrrus, for that he had forsaken them, to go his Voyage into SICILIA, by reason whereof there came no great number of Souldiers into his Campe. But notwithstanding, he divided all his strength into two parts, whereof he sent the one part into LUCANIA, to occupie one of the ROMANES Consls that was there, to the end he should not come to aide his companion: and with the other part he went himselfe against Manius Curius, who lay in a very strange place of advantage, neare to the City of BENEVENTO, attending the aide that should come to him out of LUCANIA, besides also that the Soothsayers (by the signes and tokens of the Birds and Sacrifices) did counsell him not to stir from thence. Pyrrus to the contrary, desiring to fight with Manius before his aide came unto him, which he looked for out of LUCANIA, tooke with him the best Souldiers he had in all his Army, and the warlikest Elephants, and marched away in the night, supposing to steale upon Manius on the sudden, and give an assault unto his Campe. Now Pyrrus having a long way to go, and through a woody Countrey, his Lights and Torchés failed him, by reason whereof many of his Souldiers lost their way, and they lost a great deale of time also, before they could againe be gathered together: so as in this space the night was spent, and the day once broken, the Enemies perceived plainly how he came downe the hills. This at the first sight made them muse a while, and put them in a little feare: nevertheless Manius having had the signes of the Sacrifices favourable, and seeing that occasion did presse him to it, went out into the Field, and set upon the Voward of his Enemies, and made them turne their backs. The which feared all the rest in such wise, that there were slaine a great number of them in the Field, and certaine Elephants also taken. This Victory made Manius Curius leave his strength and come into the plaine Field, where he set his men in Battell ray, and overthrew his Enemies by plaine force on the one side: but on the other he was repulld by violence of the Elephants, and compelled to draw backe into his owne Campe, where in he had left a great number of men to guard it. So when he saw them upon the Rampiers of his Campe all armed, ready to fight, he called them out, and they coming fresh out of the places of advantage, to charge upon the Elephants, compelled them in a very short time to turne their backs, and fle through their owne men, whom they put to great trouble and disorder: so as in the end, the whole Victory fell upon the ROMANES side, and consequently by meanes of that Victory, followed the greatnesse and power of their Empire. For the ROMANES being growne more courageous by this Battell, and having increased their force, and wonne the reputation of men unconquerable, immediately after conquered all ITALY besides, and soone after that, all SICILIA. To this end (as you see) came King Pyrrus vaine hope he had to conquer ITALY and SICILIA, after he had spent sixe yeares continually in Warres, during which time his good fortune decayed, and his Army consumed. Notwithstanding, his noble courage remained alwaies invincible, what losses soever he had sustained: and moreover whilest he lived, he was ever esteemed the chiefe of all the Kings and Princes in his time, as well for his experience and sufficiency in Warres, as also for his valiantnesse and hardinesse of his person. But what he wanne by famous deedes, he lost by vaine hopes: desiring so earnestly that which he had not, as he forgot to keepe that which he had. Wherefore Antigonus compared him unto a Dice-player, that casteth well, and cannot use his lucke. Now having brought backe againe with him into EPIDUR, eight thousand Footemen, and five hundred Horsemen, and being without Money to pay them, he devised with himselfe to seeke out some new Warre to entertaine those Souldiers, and keepe them together. Wherefore upon a new aide of certaine GAULES being come unto him, he entred into the Realme of MACEDON (which Antigonus, Demetrius Sonne held at that time) with intent onely to make a Forrey, and to get some spoile in the Countrey. But when he saw that he had taken divers Holds, and moreover, that two thousand men of Warre of the Countrey came and yeelded themselves unto him, he began to hope of better successe, then at the first he looked for. For upon that hope he marched against King Antigonus selfe, whom he met in a very straight Valley, and at his first coming, gave such a lusty Charge upon his Rereward, that he put all Antigonus Army in great disorder. For Antigonus had placed the GAULES in the Rereward of his Army to close it in, which were a convenient number, and did valiantly defend the first Charge: and the Skirmish was so hot, that the most of them were slaine. After them the leaders of the Elephants perceiving they were environed on every side, yeelded themselves and their Beasts. Pyrrus seeing his power to be now increased, with such a supply, trusting more to his good fortune, then any good reason might move him: thrust further into the Battell of the MACEDONIANS, who were all afraid, and troubled for the overthrow of their Rereward, so as they could not once bafe their Pikes, nor fight against him: He for his part holding up his hand, and calling the Captaines of the Bander by their names, straightwaies made all the Footemen of Antigonus turne wholly to his side : who flying saved himselfe with a few Horsemen, and kept certaine of the Cities in his Realme upon the Sea Coast. But Pyrrus in all his prosperity judging nothing more to redound to his honour and glory, then the overthrow of the Gauls, layd aside their goodliest and richest Spoiles, and offered up the same in the Temple of Minerva Lucina, with this Inscription :

*When Pyrrus had subdu'd, the puissant Gauls in fields, He caus'd of their Spoiles to make these Targets, Armes and Shields :
The which he hang'd up, in Temple all on high,

The covetousnesse of the Gauls.

Immediately after this Battell all the Cities of the Realme of MACEDON yielded unto him: but when he had the City of EGES in his power, he used the Inhabitantes thereof very hardly, and specially because he left a great Garrison of the GAULES there, which he had in pay. This Nation is extreme covetous, as then they shewed themselves: for they spared not to breake up the Tombes wherein the Kings of MACEDON lay buried, and tooke away all the Gold and Silver they could finde: and afterwards with great infoleny cast out their bones into the open winde. Pyrrus was told it, but he lightly passed it over, and made no reckoning of it: either because he deferred it till another time, by reason of the Wars he had then in hand: or else for that he durst not meddle with punishing of these barbarous People at that time. But whatsoever the matter was, the MACEDONIANS were very angry with Pyrrus, and blamed him greatly for it. Furthermore, having not yet made all things sure in MACEDON, not being fully posselt of the same: new toyes and hopes came in his head; and (mocking Antigonus) said he was a mad man to go apparelled in Purple like a King, when a poore Cloake might become him like a private man. Now, Cleonymus King of SPARTA being come to procure him to bring his Army into the Countrey of LACEDAMON, Pyrrus was very willing to it. This Cleonymus was of the Bloud-royall of SPARTA: but because he was a cruell man, and would do all things by authority, they loved him not at SPARTA, nor trusted him at all: and therefore did they put him out, and made Arcus King, a very quiet man. And this was the oldest quarrell Cleonymus had against the Commonwealth of SPARTA; but besides that, he had another private quarrell, which grew upon this cause. In his old yeares, Cleonymus had married a faire young Lady called Chelidonida, which was also of the Bloud-royall, and the Daughter of Leotichides. This Lady being fallen extremely in love with Acrotatus, King Arcus Sonne, a goodly young Gentleman, and in his lusty youth, the greatly vexed and dishonoured her Husband Cleonymus, who was over head and eares in love and jealousie with her: for there was not one in all SPARTA, but plainly knew that his Wife made none account of him. And thus his home sorrows, being joyned with his outward common griefes, even for spite, desiring a revenge, in choler he went to procure Pyrrus to come unto SPARTA, to restore him againe to his Kingdom. Hereupon he brought him into LACEDAMONIA forthwith, with five and twenty thousand Footemen, two thousand Horse, and foure and twenty Elephants: by which preparation, though by nothing else, the World might plainly see, that Pyrrus came with a minde not to restore Cleonymus againe unto SPARTA, but of intent to conquer for himselfe (if he could) all the Countrey of PELOPONNESUS. For in words he denied it to the LACEDAMONIANS themselves, who sent Ambassadors unto him, when he was in the City of MEGALIPOLIS, where he told them that he was come into PELOPONNESUS, to set the Townes and Cities at liberty, which Antigonus kept in bondage: and that his true intent and meaning was to send his young Sonnes into SPARTA (so they would be contented) to the end they might be trained after the LACONIAN manner, and from their youth have this advantage above all other Kings, to have beene well brought up. But feigning these things, and abusing those that came to meete him on his way, they tooke no heede of him, till he came within the Coast of LACONIA, into the which he was no looner entred, but he began to waste and spoile the whole Countrey. And when the Ambassadors of SPARTA reproved and found fault with him, for that he made Warres upon them in such sort, before he had openly proclaimed it: he made them answer, No more have you your selves used to proclaime that, which you purposed to do to others. Then one of the Ambassadors called Mandricidas, replied againe unto him in the LACONIAN Tongue: If thou be a god, thou wilt do us no hurt, because we have not offended thee: and if thou be a man, thou shalt meete with another that shall be better then thy selfe. Then he marched directly to SPARTA, where Cleonymus gave him counsell even at the first, to assault it. But he would not so do, fearing (as they said) that if he did it by night, his Souldiers would sacke the City: and said it should be time enough to assault it the next day at broad day light, because there were but few men within the Towne, and beside they were very ill provided. And furthermore, King Arcus himselfe was not there, but gone into CRETA to aide the GORTINIANS, who had Warres in his owne Countrey. And doubtlesse that onely was the saving of SPARTA from taking, that they made no reckoning to assault it hotly: because they thought it was not able to make resistance. For Pyrrus camped before the Towne, thoroughly perswaded with himselfe, that he should finde none to fight with him: and Cleonymus friends and Servants also did prepare his lodging there, as if Pyrrus should have come to supper to him, and lodged with him. When night was come, the LACEDAMONIANS counselled together, and secretly determined to send away their Wives, and little Children into CRETA: But the Women themselves were against it, and there was one among them called Archidamia, who went into the Senate-house with a Sword in her hand, to speake unto them in the name of all the rest, and said: That they did their Wives great wrong, if they thought them so faint-hearted, as to live after SPARTA were destroyed. Afterwards it was agreed in Councell, that they should cast a Trench before the Enemies Campe, and that at both ends of the same they should bury Carts in the ground unto the middle of the wheeles, to the end that being fast set in the ground, they should stay the Elephants, and keepe them from passing further: And when they began to go in hand withall, there came Wives and Maides unto them, some of them their clothes girt up round about them, and others all in their smokes, to worke at this Trench with the old men, advising the young men that should fight the next morning, to rest themselves in the meane while. So the Women tooke the third part of the Trench to taske, which was fixe cubits broad, foure cubits deepe, and eight hundred foote long, as Philarcus saith, or little lesse as Hieronymus writeth. Then when the breake of day appeared, and the Enemies removed to come to the assault: the Women themselves fetched the Weapons, which they put into the young mens hands, and delivered them the taske of the Trench ready made, which they before had undertaken, praying them valiantly to keepe and defend it, telling them withall, how great a pleasure it is to overcome the Enemies, fighting in view and sight of their native Countrey, and what great felicity and honour it is to die in the armes of his Mother and Wife, after he had fought valiantly like an honest man, and worthy of the magnanimity of SPARTA. But Chelidonida being gone aside, had tied a halter with a riding knot about her necke, ready to strangle and hang her selfe, rather then to fall into the hands of Cleonymus, if by chance the City should come to be taken. Now Pyrrus marched in perfon with his Battell of Footemen, against the front of the SPARTANS, who being a great number also, did tarry his coming on the other side of the Trench: the which, besides that it was very ill to passe over, did lett the Souldiers to fight steadily in order of Battell, because the earth being newly cast up, did yeele under their feete. Wherefore Ptolomie, King Pyrrus Sonne, passing all along the Trench side with two thousand GAULES, and all the choise men of the CHAONIANS, assayed if he could get over to the other side at one of the ends of the Trench where the Carts were: which being set very deepe into the ground, and one joyned unto another, they did not onely hinder the assaylants, but the defendants also. Howbeit in the end, the GAULES began to plucke off the wheeles of these Carts, and to draw them into the River. But Acrotatus, King Arcus Sonne, a young man, seeing the danger, ranne through the City with a Troupe of three hundred lusty Youths besides, and went to inclose Ptolomie behinde, before he espied him; for that he passed a secret hollow way till he came even to the Charge upon them: whereby they were enforced to turne their faces towards him, one running in anothers necke, and so in great disorder were thrust into the Trenches, and under the Carts: inomuch as at the last, with much ado, and great bloudshed, Acrotatus and his Company drave them backe, and repulsed them. Now the Women and old men, that were on the other side of the Trench, saw plainly before their face, how valiantly Acrotatus had repulsed the GAULES. Wherefore after Acrotatus had done this Exploit, he returned againe through the City unto the place from whence he came, all on a goare bloud: couragious and lively, for the Victory he came newly from. The women of SPARTA thought Acrotatus far more noble and fairer to behold, then ever he was: so that they all thought Chelidonida happy to have such a friend and lover. And there were certaine old men, that followed him crying after him, Go thy way, Acrotatus, and enjoy thy Love, Chelidonida, beget noble Children of her unto SPARTA. The Fight was cruell on that side where Pyrrus was, and many of the SPARTANS fought very valiantly. Howbeit, amongst other, there was one named Phillius, who after he had fought long, and slaine many of his Enemies with his owne hands, that forced to passe over the Trench, perceiving that his heart fainted for the great number of wounds he had upon him, called one of them that were in the ranke next behinde him, and giving him his place, fell downe dead in the armes of his friends: because his Enemies should not have his body. In the end, the Battell having continued all the day long, the night did separate them: and Pyrrus, being laid in his bed, had this Vision in his sleepe. He thought he stroke the City of LACEDAMON with lightning, that he utterly consumed it: whereat he was so passing glad, that even with the very joy he awaked: and thereupon forthwith commanded his Captaines to make their men ready to the assault, and told his Dreame unto his familiars: supposing that out of doubt it did betoken he should in that approach take the City. All that heard it, believed it was so; saving one Lyfimachus, who to the contrary said, that this Vision liked him not, because the places smitten with lightning are holy, and it is not lawfull to enter into them: by reason whereof he was also afraid, that the gods did signifie unto him, that he should not enter into the City of SPARTA. Pyrrus answered him: That, said he, is a matter disputable to and fro in an open Assembly of People, for there is no manner of certainty in it. But furthermore, every man must take his Weapon in his hand, and set this Sentence before his eyes:

Alluding unto Homers Verses, which he wrote for the defence of his Countrey. And saying thus, he rose, and at the breake of day led his Army unto the assault. On the other side also, the LACEDAMONIANS with a marvellous courage and magnanimity, farre greater then their force, befurred themselves wonderfully to make resistance; having their Wives by them, that gave them their Weapons wherewith they fought, and were ready at hand to give meate and drinke to them that needed, and did also withdraw those that were hurt to cure them. The MACEDONIANS likewise for their part, endeavoured themselves with all their might to fill up the Trench with Woodes and other things, which they cast upon the dead Bodies and Armour lying in the bottome of the Ditch: and the LACEDÆMONIANS againe, laboured all they could possible to lett them. But in this great broile, one perceived Pyrrus on horsebacke to have leapt the Trench, past over the strength of the Caris, and made force to enter into the City. Wherefore those that were appointed to defend that part of the Trench, cried out straight, and the women fell a shrieking, and running as if all had beene lost. And as Pyrrus passed further, striking downe with his owne hands all that stood before him, a CRETAN shot at him, and stroke his Horse through both sides: who leaping out of the preefe for paine of his wound, dying, carried Pyrrus away, and threw him upon the hanging of a sleepe hill, where he was in great danger to fall from the top. This put all his servants and friends about him in a marvellous feare, and therewithall the LACEDÆMONIANS seeing them in this feare and trouble, ranne immediately unto that place, and with force of shot drave them all out of the Trench. After this reigne Pyrrus caused all assault to cease, hoping the LACEDÆMONIANS in the end would yeeld, considering there were many of them slaine in the two daies past, and all the rest in a manner hurt. Howbeit, the good fortune of the City (whether it were to prove the valiantnesse of the Inhabitants themselves, or at the least to shew what power they were of, even in their greatest neede and distresse, when the LACEDÆMONIANS had small hope left) brought one Aminias Phocian from CORINTH, one of King Antigonus Captaine, with a great Band of men, and put them into the City to aide them: and straight after him, as soone as he was entred, King Arenus arrived also on the other side from CRETAN, and two thousand Souldiers with him. So the women went home to their Houses, making their reckoning that they should not neede any more to trouble themselves with Warres. They gave the old men liberty also to go and rest themselves, who being past all age to fight, for necessity sake yet were driven to arme themselves, and take Weapon in hand: and in order of Battell placed the new-come Souldiers in their roomes. Pyrrus understanding that new Supplies were come, grew to greater stomach then before, and enforced all that he could to winne the Towne by assault. But in the end, when to his cost he found that he wanne nothing but blowes, he gave over the Siege, and went to spoile all the Countrey about, determining to lie there in Garison all the Winter. He could not for all this avoide his destiny: for there rose a sedition in the City of ARGOS betwene two of the chiefeest Citizens, Arifiteus and Arifippus: and because Arifiteus thought that King Antigonus did favour his Enemy Arifippus, he made haste to send first unto Pyrrus, whose nature and disposition was such, that he did continually heape hope upon hope, ever taking the present prosperity, for an occasion to hope after greater to come. And if it fell out he was a loser, then he fought to recover himselfe, and to restore his losse by some other new attempts. So that neither for being Conquerour, nor overcome, he would ever be quiet, but alwaies troubled some, and himselfe also: by reason whereof, he suddenly departed towards ARGOS. But King Arenus having laid Ambushes for him in divers places, and occupied also the straightest and hardest passages, by the which he was to passe, gave a Charge upon the GAULES and MOLOSSIANS, which were in the taile of his Army. Now, the selfe-same day Pyrrus was warned by a Soothsayer, who sacrificing had found the Liver of the sacrificed Beast infected: that it betokened the losse of some most neare unto him. But when he heard the noise of the Charge given, he thought not on the warning of the Soothsayer, but commanded his Sonne to take his household Servants with him, and to go thither: and he himselfe in the meane time with as great haste as he could, made the rest of his Army to march, to get them quickly out of this dangerous way. The Fray was very hot about Ptolomie, Pyrrus Sonne, for they were all the chiefeest men of the LACEDÆMONIANS with whom he had to do, led by a valiant Captaine, called Eualcus. But as he fought valiantly against those that stood before him, there was a Souldier of CRETAN called Oresus, borne in the City of APTERA, a man very ready of his hand, and light of foote, who running along by him, stroke him such a blow on his side, that he fell downe dead in the place. This Prince Ptolomie being slaine, his Company began straight to flie: and the LACEDÆMONIANS followed the chase so hotly, that they tooke no heede of themselves, untill they saw they were in the plaine Field far from their Footemen. Wherefore, Pyrrus unto whom the death of his Sonne was newly reported, being on fire with sorrow and passion, turned suddenly upon them with the men of Armes of the MOLOSSIANS, and being the first that came unto them, made a marvellous slaughter among them. For, notwithstanding that every where before that time he was terrible and invincible, having his Sword in his hand: yet then he did shew more proofe of his valiantnesse, strenght, and courage, then he had ever done before. And when he had set spurres to his Horse against Eualcus to close with him: Eualcus turned on the one side, and gave Pyrrus such a blow with his Sword, that he missed little the cutting off his bridle hand: for he cutindeed all the raines of the bridle asunder. But Pyrrus straight ranne him through the body with his Speare, and lighting off from his Horse, he put all the Troupe of the LACEDÆMONIANS to the Sword that were about the body of Eualcus, being all chosen men. Thus the ambition of the Captaine was cause of that losse unto their Countrey for nothing, considering that the Warres against them were ended. But Pyrrus having now as it were made Sacrifice of these poore bodies of the LACEDÆMONIANS, for the soule of his dead Sonne, and fought thus wonderfully also, to honour his Funerals, converting a great part of his sorrow for his death, into anger and wrath against the Enemies: he afterwards held on his way directly towards ARGOS. And notwithstanding that King Antigonus had already seized the Hills

that were over the Valley, he lodged neare unto the City of NAUBIATA, and the next morning following sent an Herald unto Antigonus, and gave him defiance, calling him wicked man, and challenged him to come downe into the Valley to fight with him, to try which of them two should be King. Antigonus made him answer, that he made Warres as much with time as with Weapon: and furthermore, that if Pyrrus were weary of his life, he had waies enough open to put himselfe to death. The Citizens of ARGOS also sent Ambassadors unto them both, to pray them to depart, fith they knew that there was nothing for them to see in the City of ARGOS, and that they would let it be a neuter, and friend unto them both. King Antigonus agreed unto it, and gave them his Sonne for Hostage. Pyrrus also made them faire promise to do so too, but because he gave no caution nor sufficient pledge to performe it, they mistrusted him the more. Then there fell out many great and wonderfull tokens, as well unto Pyrrus as unto the ARGIVES. For Pyrrus having sacrificed Oxen, their heads being striken off from their bodies, they thrust out their tongues, and licked up their owne blood. And within the City of ARGOS, a Sister of the Temple of Apollo Lycius, called Apollonide, ranne through the streetes, crying out that she saw the City full of murthre, and blood running all about, and an Eagle that came unto the fray, howbeit she vanished away suddenly, and no body knew what became of her. Pyrrus then coming hard to the Walls of ARGOS in the night, and finding one of the Gates called Dianepores, opened by Arifiteus, he put in his GAULES: who possessed the Market-place before the Citizens knew any thing of it. But because the Gate was too low to paffe the Elephants through with their Towers upon their backs, they were driven to take them off, and afterwards when they were within, to put them on in the darke, and in tumult: by reason whereof they lost much time, so that the Citizens in the end perceived it, and ranne incontinently unto the Cattle of Apides, and into other strong places of the City. And therewithall, they sent with present speede unto Antigonus, to pray him to come and helpe them, and so he did: and after he was come hard to the Walls, he remained without with the Scouts, and in the meane time sent his Sonne with his chiefeest Captaine into the Towne, who brought a great number of good Souldiers, and men of Warre with him. At the same time also arrived Arenus King of SPARTA, with a thousand of the CRETANS, and most lusty SPARTANS: all which joyning together, came to give a Charge upon the GAULES that were in the Market-place, who put them in a marvellous feare and hazard. Pyrrus entering on that side also of the City called Cylabaris with terrible noises and cries, when he understood that the GAULES answered him not lustily and courageously, he doubted straight that it was the voyce of men distressed, and that had their hands full. Wherefore, he came on with speede to relieve them, thrusting the Horsemen forward that marched before him with great danger and paine, by reason of the holes and sinkes, and water conduits, whereof the City was full. By this meane there was a wonderfull confusion amongst them, as may be thought fighting by night, where no man saw what he had to do, nor could heare what was commanded, by reason of the great noise they made, straying here and there up and downe the streetes, the one scattered from the other: neither could the Captaine set their men in order, as well for the darkenesse of the night, as also for the confused tumult that was all the City over, and for that the streetes also were very narrow. And therefore they remained on both sides without doing any thing, looking for day light: at the dawning whereof, Pyrrus perceived the Cattle of Apides, full of his armed Enemies. And furthermore, suddenly as he was come into the Market-place, amongst many other goodly common Workes set out to beautifie the same, he spied the Images of a Bull and a Woolfe in Copper, the which fought one with another. This sight made him afraid, because at that present he remembered a Prophecie that had beene told him, that his end and death should be when he saw a Woolfe and Bull fight together. The ARGIVES report, that these Images were set up in the Market-place, for the remembrance of a certaine chance that had happened in their Countrey. For when Danaus came thither first, by the way called Pyramis (as one would say, Land sowne with Corne) in the Countrey of THYRATIDE, he saw as he went, a Woolfe fight with a Bull: whereupon he stayed to see what the end of their fight would come to, supposing the case in himselfe, that the Woolfe was of his side, because that being a stranger as he was, he came to set upon the natural Inhabitants of the Countrey. The Woolfe in the end obtained the victory: wherefore Danaus making his Prayer unto Apollo Lycius, followed on his Enterprise, and had so good successe, that he drave Gelanor out of ARGOS, who at that time was King of the ARGIVES. And thus you heare the cause why they say these Images of the Woolfe and Bull were set up in the Market-place of ARGOS: Pyrrus being halfe discouraged with the sight of them, and also because nothing fell out well according to his expectation, thought best to retire: but fearing the straightnesse of the Gates of the City, he sent unto his Sonne Helenus, whom he had left without the City with the greatest part of his force and Army, commanding him to overthrow a piece of the Wall, that his men might the more readily get out, and that he might receive them, if their Enemies by chance did hinder their coming out. But the Messenger whom he sent, was so hasty and fearfull, with the tumult that troubled him in going out, that he did not well understand what Pyrrus said unto him, but reported his Message quite contrary: Whereupon the young Prince Helenus taking the best Souldiers he had with him, and the rest of his Elephants, entred into the City to helpe his Father, who was now giving backe: and so long as he had roome to fight at ease, retiring still, he valiantly repulst those that set upon him, turning his face oft unto them. But when he was driven unto the streete that went from the Market-place to the Gate of the City, he was kept in with his owne men that entred at the same Gate to helpe him. But they could not heare when Pyrrus cried out, and bade them goe backe, the noise was so great: and and though the first had heard him, and would have gone backe, yet they that were behinde, and did still thrust forward into the prease, did not permit them. Besides this moreover, the biggest of all the Elephants by misfortune fell downe overthwart the Gate, where he grinding his teeth, did hinder those also, that would have come out and given backe. Furthermore, another of the Elephants that were entred before into the City, called Nican, (as much to say, as conquering) seeking his Governour that was stricken downe to the ground from his backe with terrible blowes, ranne upon them that came backe upon him, overthrowing friends and foes one in anothers necke, till at the length having found the body of his Master slaine, he lift him up from the ground with his troncke, and carrying him upon his two tuskes, returned backe with great fury, treading all under feete he found in his way. Thus every man being thronged and crowded up together in this fort, there was not one that could helpe himselfe: for it seemed to be a masse and heape of a multitude, and one whole body shut together, which sometime thrust forward, and sometime gave backe, as the sway went. They fought not so much against their Enemies, who set upon them behinde: but they did themselves more hurt then their Enemies did. For if any drew out his Sword, or bated his Pike, he could neither scabard the one againe, nor lift up the other, but thrust it full upon his owne fellows that came in to helpe them, and so killed themselves one thrusting upon another. Wherefore Pyrrus seeing his People thus troubled and harried to and fro, tooke his Crowne from his head which he wore upon his Helmet, that made him knowne of his men afar off, and gave it unto one of his familiars that was next unto him: and trusting then to the goodnesse of his Horse, flew upon his Enemies that followed him. It fortuned that one hurt him with a Pike, but the wound was neither dangerous nor great: wherefore Pyrrus set upon him that had hurt him, who was an ARGIVIAN borne, a man of meane condition; and a poore old Woman's Sonne, whose Mother at that present time was gotten up to the top of the steeles of a House, as all other Women of the City were, to see the Fight. And she perceiving that it was her Sonne whom Pyrrus came upon, was so affrighted to see him in that danger, that she tooke a tile, and with both her hands cast it upon Pyrrus. The tile falling off from his head by reason of his Head-piece, lighted full in the nape of his necke, and brake his neck-bone asunder: wherewith he was suddenly so benumbed, that he lost his fight with the blow, the reins of his bridle fell out of his hand, and himselfe fell from his Horse to the ground, by Licymnius Tombe, before any man knew what he was, at the least the common People. Untill at the last there came one Zopyrus that was in pay with Antigonus, and two or three other Souldiers also that ranne straight to the place, and knowing him, dragged his body into a Gate, even as he was coming againe to himselfe out of this trance. This Zopyrus drew out a SLAVON Sword he wore by his side, to strike off his head. But Pyrrus cast such a grimme countenance on him betweene his eyes, that made him so afraid, and his hand so to shake therewith, that being thus amazed, he did not strike him right in the place where he should have cut off his head, but killed him under his mouth about his chinne, so that he was a great while ere he could strike off his head. The matter was straight blowne abroad amongst divers: wherupon Alcyonius running thither, asked for the head that he might know it againe. But when he had it, he ranne presently unto his Father withall, and found him talking with his familiar friends, and cast Pyrrus head before him. Antigonus looking upon it, when he knew it, laid upon his Sonne with his staffe, and called him cruell murderer and unnaturall barbarous beast: and so hiding his eyes with his Cloake, wept for pity (remembering the fortune of his Grandfather Antigonus, and of his Father Demetrius) and then caused Pyrrus head and body to be honourably burnt and buried. Afterwards Alcyonius meeting Helennus (King Pyrrus Sonne) in very poore estate, muffled up with a poore short Cloake, used him very courteously with gentle words, and brought him to his Father. Antigonus seeing his Sonne bringing of him, said unto him: This part now (my Sonne) is better then the first, and pleaseth me a great deale more. But yet thou hast not done all thou shouldst: for thou shouldst have taken from him his beggarly Cloake he weareth, which doth more shame us that are the gainers, then him that is the loser. After he had spoken these words, Antigonus embraced Helennus, and having apparelled him in good sort, sent him home with honourable Convey into his Realme of EPYRUS. Furthermore, seizing all Pyrrus Campe and Army, he courteously used all his Friends and Servants.

THE LIFE OF CAIUS MARIUS.

Ann. Mund.
3862.

Ant. Christ.

It is not knowne what was the third name of Caius Marius, no more then of Quintus Sertorius, who had all SPAIN in his hands at one time: nor of Lucius Mummius, he that destroyed the City of CORINTH. For this Name of Achnitum that was given unto Mummius, of Africanus unto Scipio, and of Numidicus unto Metellus: were all Surnames given them, by reason of the Conquests they wanne. By this reason Pofidonius thinketh to overcome them that say, that the third Name the ROMANES have, is their proper Name: as Camillus, Marcellus, Cato. For if it fell out so said he, then it must needs follow, that they which have two Names, should have no proper Name. But on the other side also, he doth not consider that by the like reason he should say, that women have no Names: for there is not a woman in ROME that is called by her first Name, which Pofidonius judgeth to be the proper Name of the ROMANES. And that of the other two, the one is the common Name of all the House or Family, as of the POMPEIANS, of the MANLIANS, and of the CORNELIANS, like as the HERACLIIDS and the PELOPIDS are amongst the GRECIANS: and the other is a Surname taken of the deeds, or of the nature, forme, or shape of the body, or of some other like accident, as are these Surnames, Macrinus, Torquatus, and Sylla. Even as amongst the GRECIANS likewise, Mnemon, which significth having good memory: Grypus, having a crooked nose: Callinicos, conquering. But as for that, the diversity of custome would deliver objection sufficient to the contrary, to him that listeth. And furthermore, as touching the favour of Marius face, we have seene an Image of his in Marble at RAVENNA, a City of the GAULES, which doth lively represent that rough severity of nature and manners, which they say was in him. For being borne a rough man by nature, and given to the Warres, and having followed the same altogether from his youth, more then the civil life: when he came to Authority, he could not bridle his anger and cholerick nature. And they say furthermore, that he never learned the Greeke Tongue, nor used it in any matters of weight: as though it had beene a mockery to study to learne the Tongue, the Masters whereof lived in bondage under others. After his second Triumphe, in the dedication of a certaine Temple, he made Greeke Playes to shew the ROMANES pastime: and came into the Theater, howbeit he did but sit downe onely, and went his way straight. Wherefore niethinks, that as Plato was wont to say oft unto Xenocrates the Philosopher, who was of a curth nature, had his head ever occupied, and too feyvere: Xenocrates, my friend, I pray thee do Sacrifice to the Graces. So if any man could have persuaded Marius to have sacrificed to the Muses, and to the GRECIAN Graces: (that is to say, that he had knowne the Greeke Tongue) to so many famous and glorious deedes as he did, both in Peace and Warres, he had not joynd so unfortunate and miserable an end as he made, through his choler and extreme ambition, at such yeares, and through an unvariable covetousnesse, which like boysterous windes made him to make shipwracke of all, in a most cruel, bloody, and unnatural tragde. The which is easily knowne in reading the Discourse of his doings. First of all he was of a meane house, borne of poore Parents by Father and Mother, that got their livings by sweate of their browes. His Father as himselfe, was called Caius: Fulcinus was his Mother. And this was the cause why he began so late to haunt the City, and to learne the civility and manners of Rome, having bene brought up alwaies before in a little poore Village called CYRROBATON, within the Territory of the City of ARPOS: where he led a hard Countrey life, in respect of those that lived pleasantly and finely in the Cities, but otherwise well reformed, and nearest unto the manners of the ancient ROMANES. The first Journey he made unto the Warres, was against the *CELTIBERIAN*s in *SPAIN*e, under Scipio AFRICAN, when he went to besiege the City of NUMANTIA: where his Captaine in short time found that he was a better Souldier then any other of his companions. For he did marvellous easily receive the reformation of manners, and the Discipline of Warres which Scipio advanced amongst his Souldiers, that were ill trained before, and given over to all pleasure. And they say, that in the fight of his Generall he fought hand to hand with one of his Enemies, and slew him: upon which occasion, Scipio to make him love him, did offer him many courtesies and pleasures. But specially one day above the rest, having made him suppe with him at his Table, some one after Supper falling in talke of Captaines that were in Rome at that time: one that stoode by Scipio, asked him (either because indeede he stoode in doubt, or else for that he would curry favour with Scipio) what other Captaine the ROMANES should have after his death, like unto him. Scipio having Marius by him, gently clapped him upon the shoulders, and said: Peradventure this shall be he. Thus happily were they both borne, the one to shew from his youth that one day he should come to be a great man, and the other also for wisely conjecturing the end, by seeing of the beginning. Well, it fortune so, that these words of Scipio (by report) above all things else put Marius in a good hope, as if they had bene spoken by the Oracle of some god, and made him bold to deale in matters of State and Common-wealth: where by meanes of the favour and countenance Cæcilius Metellus gave him (whose house his Father and he had alwaies followed and honoured) he obtained the Office of Tribuneship. In this Office he preferred a Law touching the manner how to give the voyces in election of the Magistrates, which did seeme to take from the Nobility the Authority they had in Judgement. And therefore the Consull Cotta stepped up against it, and perswaded the Senate to resist that Law, and not suffer it to be authorized, and therewithall presently to call Marius before them to yeeld a reason of his doing. So was it agreed upon in Senate. Now Marius coming into the Senate, was not abashed at any thing, as some other young man would have bene, that had but newly begun to enter into the World as he did, and having no other notable calling or quality in him, saving his verue onely to commend him: but taking boldnesse of himselfe (as the noble acts he afterwards did, gave shew of his valour) he openly threatened the Consull Cotta to send him to Prison, if he did not presently withdraw the conclusion he had caused to be resolved upon. The Consull then turning himselfe unto Cæcilius Metellus, asked how he liked it? Metellus standing up, spake in the behalfe of the Consull: and then Marius calling a Serjeant out, commanded him to take Metellus selfe, and to carry him to Prison. Metellus appealed to the other Tribunes, but never a one would take his matter in hand: so that the Senate when all was done, were compelled to call backe the conclusion that before was taken. Then Marius returning with great honour into the Market-place among the Assembly of the People, caused this Law to passe and be authorized: and every man held opinion of him that he would prove a stout man, and such a one, as would not stoop for any feare, nor shrinke for bashfulnesse, but would beare the Senate in favour of the People. Notwithstanding he shortly after changed opinion, and altered the first, by another Act he made: for when another went about to have a Law made, to distribute Corne unto every Citizen without payment of any penny, he was vehemently against it, and overthrew it: so that thereby he came to be alike honoured and esteemed of either party, as he that would neither pleasure the one, nor the other, to the prejudice of the Common-wealth. After he had bene Tribune, he sued for the chiefe Office of Edilis. Of the Ediles there are two sorts: the first is called Ædilitas Curulis, so named, because of certaine Chaires that have crooked feete, upon which they sit when they give audience. The other is of lesse dignity, and that is called Ædilitas Popularis. And when they have chosen the first and greater Edilis at Rome, they presently proceede the same day also in the Market-place unto election of the lesser. Marius seeing plainly that he was put by the chiefe of the Ediles, turned againe straight yet to demand the second: but this was misliked in him, and they tooke him for too bolde, too shamelesse, and too presumptuous a man. So that in one selfe day he had two denials and repulses, which never man but himselfe before had. And nevertheless, all this could not cut his combe, but shortly after he sued also for the Prætorship, and he lacked but a little of the deniall of that: yet in the end, being last of all chosen, he was accused to have bribed the People, and bought their voyces for Money. And surely amongst many other, this presumption was very great: that they saw a man of Cassius Sabacon within the Barres where the election is made, running to and fro among them that gave their voyces; because this Sabacon was Marius very great friend. The matter came before the Judges, and Sabacon was examined upon it: whereunto he answered, that for the great extreme heate he felt, he was very dry, and asked for cold water to drinke, and that his man had brought him some in a pot where he was, howbeit that he went his way as soone as ever he had drunke. This Sabacon was afterwards put out of the Senate by the next Censors, and many judge that he was worthy of

of this infamy, for that he was perjured in judgement, or because he was so subject and given to his pleasure. Caius Herennius was also called for a witnesse against Marius: but he did alledge for his excuse, that the Law and custome did dispense with the Patron, to be a witnesse against his follower and Client; and he was quit by the Judges. For the ROMANES alwaies call those Patrons, who take the protection of meaneer then themselves into their hands: saying, that Marius Predecessors, and Marius himselfe, had ever bene followers of the House of the *HERENNIAN*s. The Judges received his answer, and allowed thereof. But Marius spake against it, alledging that since he had received this honour to beare Office in the Common-wealth, he was now growne from this base condition, to be any more a follower of any man: the which is not true in all. For every Office of a Magistrate doth not exempt him that hath the Office nor yet his Posterity to be under the Patronage of another, nor doth discharge him from the duty of honouring them: but of necessity he must be a Magistrate, which the Law doth permit to sit in the crooked Chaire called Curulis, that is to say, carried upon a Chariot through the City. But notwithstanding that at the first hearing of this Cause, Marius had but ill successe, and that the Judges were against him all they could: yet in the end for all that, at the last hearing of this matter, Marius, contrary to all mens opinions, was discharged, because the Judges opinions with and against him fell to be of like number. He used himselfe very orderly in his Office of Prætorship, and after his yeare was out, when it came to divide the Provinces by lot, *SPAIN*e fell unto him, which is beyond the River of Batis: where it is reported, that he scowled all the Countrey thereabouts of Theeves and Robbers, which notwithstanding was yet very cruell and savage, for the rude, barbarous, and uncivill manner and fashion of life of the Inhabitants there. For the SPANIARDS were of opinion even at that time, that it was a goodly thing to live upon theft and robbery. At his returne to Rome out of *SPAIN*e, desiring to deale in matters of the Common wealth, he saw that he had neither eloquence nor riches, which were the two meanes, by the which those that were at that time in credit and authority, did carry the People even as they would. Notwithstanding, they made great account of his constancy and noble minde they found in him, of his great paines and travell he rooke continually, and of the simplicity of his life: which were causes to bring him to honour and preferment, inso much as he married very highly. For he married Julia, that was of the noblest House of the Cæsars, and Aunt unto Julius Cæsar: who afterwards came to be the chiefe man of all the ROMANES, and who by reason of that alliance betweene them, seemed in some things to follow Marius, as we have written in his Life. Marius was a man of great temperance and patience, as may be judged by an act he did, putting himselfe into the hands of Chyrurgions. For his shankes and legges were full of great swollen veines, and being angry because it was no pleasant thing to behold, he determined to put himselfe into the hands of Chyrurgions to be cured. And first, laying out one of his legges to the Chyrurgion to worke upon, he would not be bound as others are in like case: but patiently abode all the extreme paines a man must of needfull keele being cut, without stirring, groaning, or sighing, still keeping his countenance, and said never a word. But when the Chyrurgion had done with his first legge, and would have gone to the other, he would not give it him: Nay, said he, I see the Cure is not worth the paine I must abide. Afterwards Cæcilius Metellus the Consull, being appointed to go into AFRICKE to make Warre with King Jugurth, tooke Marius with him for one of his Lieutenants. Marius being there, seeing notable good service to be done, and occasion to shew his manhoode, was not of minde in this Voyage to increase Metellus honour and reputation, as other Lieutenants did: and thought that it was not Metellus that called him forth for his Lieutenant, but Fortune herselfe that presented him a fit occasion to raise him to greatnesse, and (as it were) did leade him by the hand into a goodly Field, to put him to the proove of that he could do. And for this cause therefore, he endeavoured himselfe to shew all the possible proofes of valiantnesse and honour he could. For the Warres being great continually there, he never for feare refused any attempt or service, how dangerous or painfull soever it were, neither disdained to take any service in hand, were it never so little: but exceeding all other his fellowes and companions in wisdom and foresight in that which was to be done, and striving with the meanest Souldiers in living hardly and painfully, he wanne the good-will and favour of every man. For to say truly, it is a great comfort and refreshing to Souldiers that labour, to have companions that labour willingly with them. For that they thinke, that their company labouring with them, doth in manner take away the compulsion and necessity. Furthermore, it pleaseth the ROMANE Souldier marvellously to see the Generall eate openly of the same breade he eateth, or that he lieth on a hard bed as he doth, or that himselfe is the first man to set his hand to any worke when a Trench is to be cast, or their Campe to be fortified. For they do not so much esteeme the Captaine that honour and reward them, as they do those that in dangerous attempts, labour and venture their lives with them. And further, they do farre better love them that take paines with them, then those that suffer them to live idly by them. Marius performing all this, and winning thereby the love and good-wills of his Souldiers: he straight filled all LYBIA and the City of Rome with his glory, so that he was in every mans mouth. For they that were in the Campe in AFRICKE, wrote unto them that were at Rome, that they should never see the end of those Wars against this barbarous King, if they gave not the charge unto Marius, and chose him Consull. These things misliked Metellus very much, but specially the misfortune that came upon Turpillius did marvellously trouble him: which fell out in this sort: Turpillius was Metellus friend, yea he and all his Parents had followed Metellus in this Warre, being Master of the Workes in his Campe. Metellus made him Governour over the City of VACCA, a goodly great City: and he using the

the Inhabitants of the same very gently and courteously, mistrusted nothing till he was fallen into the hands of his Enemies through their Treason. For they had brought King Jugurth into their City unknowne to him, howbeit they did him no hurt, but onely begged him of the King, and let him goe his way safe. And this was the cause why they accused Turpilius of Treason. Marius being one of his Judges in the Councell, was not contented to be bitter to him himselfe, but moved many of the Councell besides to be against him: so that Metellus by the voyces of the People, was driven against his will to condemne him to suffer as a Traytor: and shortly after it was found and proved, that Turpilius was wrongfully condemned and put to death. To say truly, there was not one of the Councell but were very sorry with Metellus, who marvellously impatiently tooke the death of the poore innocent. But Marius contrarily rejoiced, and tooke it upon him that he pursued his death, and was not ashamed to make open vaunts, that he had hanged a fury about Metellus necke, to revenge his friends blood, whom he guiltlesse had caused to be put to death. After that time they became mortall enemies. And they say, that one day Metellus to mocke him withall, said unto him: O good man, thou wilt leave us then, and returne to Rome to sue for the Consulship: and canst thou not be contented to tarry to be Confull with my Sonne? Now his Sonne at that time was but a boy. But howsoever the matter went, Marius left him not so, but laboured for leave all he could possible. And Metellus after he had used many delays and excuses, at the length gave him leave, twelve daies onely before the day of election of the Consuls. Wherefore Marius made haste, and in two daies and a night came from the Campe to UTICA upon the Sea side, which is a marvellous way from it: and there before he tooke Ship, did Sacrifices unto the gods, and the Soothsayer told him, that the gods by the signes of his Sacrifices, did promise him incredible prosperity, and so great, as he himselfe durst not hope after. These words made Marius heart greater: whereupon he hoisted Saile, and having a passing good gale of winde in the poepe of the Shippe, passed the Seas in foure daies, and being landed, rode poste to Rome. When he was arrived, he went to shew himselfe unto the People: who were marvellous desirous to see him. And being brought by one of the Tribunes of the People unto the Pulpit for Orations, after many accusations which he objected against Metellus, in the end he befought the People to choose him Confull, promising that within few daies he would either kill, or take King Jugurth Prisoner. Whereupon he was chosen Confull without any contradiction. And so soone as he was proclaimed, he began immediately to levie men of Warre, causing many poore men that had nothing, and many Slaves also, to be enrolled against the order of ancient custome: where other Captaines before him did receive no such manner of men, and did no more suffer unworthy men to be Souldiers, then they did allow of unworthy Officers in the Common-wealth: in doing the which every one of them that were enrolled, left their Goods behind them, as a pledge of their good service abroad in the Warres. Yet this was not the matter that made Marius to be most hated, but they were his stout proud words full of contempt of others, that did chiefly offend the Noblemen in the City. For he proclaimed it every where abroad as it were, that his Consulship was a spoile he had gotten of the effeminate rich Noblemen through his valiantnesse, and that the wounds which he had upon his body for the service of the Common-weale, were those that recommended him to the People, and were his strength, and not the Monuments of the dead, nor the Images and Statues of others. And oft times naming Albinus, and otherwhile Besius, both Noblemen, and of great Houses, who having bene Generals of the ROMANE Army, had very ill fortune in the Countrey of LYBIA: he called them cowards and simple Souldiers, asking them that were about him, if they did not thinke that their Ancestors would rather have wished to have left their Children that came of them like unto himselfe, then such as they had bene: considering that they themselves had wonne honour and glory, not for that they were defended of noble blood, but through their deserved vertue and valiant deedes. Now Marius spake not these words in a foolish bravery, and for vaine glory onely, to purchase the ill will of the Nobility for nothing: but the common People being very glad to see him shame and despight the Senate, and measuring alwaies the greatnesse of his courage with his haughty fierce words, they egged him forward still not to spare the Nobility, and to reprove the great men; so that he ever held with the Commonalty. And furthermore, when he was passed over againe into AFRICKE, it spighted Metellus to the heart, because that he having ended all the Warre, that there remained almost no more to take or winne, Marius should come in that sort to take away the Glory and Triumph out of his hands, having sought to rise and increase by unthankfulnesse towards him. He would not come to him therefore, but went another way, and left the Army with Rutilius one of his Lieutenants, to deliver the same unto him. Howbeit, the revenge of this ingratitude, lighted in the end upon Marius owne necke: for Sylla tooke out of Marius hands the honour of ending this Warre, even as Marius had taken it from Metellus. But how, and after what sort, I will repeat it in few words, because we have written the particularities more at large in the life of Sylla. Bocchus King of high NUMIDIA, was Father-in-law unto King Jugurth, unto whom he gave no great aide, whilst he made Warres with the ROMANS, because he hated his unfaithfulnesse, and feared lest he would make himselfe greater then he was: but in the end, after Jugurth had fled, and wandred up and downe in every place, he was constrained of very necessity to call his last hope and anker upon him, as his finall refuge, and so repaire unto him. King Bocchus received him rather for shame, because he durst not punish him, then for any love or good will he bare him: and having him in his hands, seemed openly to intreate Marius for him, and secretly to write the contrary unto him. But in the meane time, he practised Treason under-hand, and sent privily for Lucius Sylla, who then was Quaestor (to say, high Treasurer) under Marius, and

and of whom he had received certaine pleasures in those Warres. Sylla trusting to this Barbarous King, went at his sending for to him. But when he was come, King Bocchus repented him of his promise, and altered his minde, standing many daies in doubt with himselfe how to resolve, whether he should deliver King Jugurth, or keepe Sylla himselfe: yet at the last he went on with his purpose and intended treason, and delivered King Jugurth alive into Sylla hands. And this was the first originall cause of the pestilent and mortall enmity that grew afterwards betwixt Marius and Sylla, and was like to have utterly overthrowne the City of Rome, and to have razed the foundation of the Empire unto the ground. For many envying the glory of Marius, gave it out every where, that this Act of the taking of King Jugurth, appertained onely unto Sylla: and Sylla himselfe caused a Ring to be made, which he wore commonly, and had graven upon the Stone of the same, how Bocchus delivered Jugurth into his hands. And afterwards he made it alwaies his Seale to dispise Marius withall, who was an ambitious and proud man, and could abide no companion to be partaker of the glory of his doings: and Sylla did it especially at the procurement of Enemies and ill willers, who gave the glory of the beginning and chiefe exploits of this Warre, unto Metellus; and the last and finall conclusion unto Sylla, to the end that the People should not have Marius in so great estimation and good opinion, as they had before. But all this envy, detraction and hatred against Marius, was soone after extinguished and troden under foot, by reason of the great danger that fell upon all ITALY out of the West: and they never spake of it afterwards, knowing that the Common-wealth stood in need of a good Captaine, and that they began to looke about, and consider who should be that great Wise Pilot, that might save and preserve it from so great and dangerous a storme of Warre. For there was not a Noble man of all the ancient Houses of Rome, that durst undertake to offer himselfe to demand the Consulship: but Marius being absent, was chosen Confull the second time. For Jugurth was no sooner taken, but news came to Rome of the coming down of the TEUTONS, and of the CIMBRES, the which would not be beleaved at the first, by reason of the infinite number of the fighting men which was said to be in their company, and for the incredible force and Power of the Armies which was justified to come: but afterwards they knew plainely, that the rumour that ran abroad was lesse then the truth fell out indeed. For they were three hundred thousand fighting men all Armed, who brought with them also another multitude as great (or more) of Women and Children: which wandred up and downe seeking Countries and Townes to dwell and live in, as they heard say the GAULES had done in old time, who leaving their owne Countrey, came, and had possessed the best part of ITALY, which they had taken away from the THUSCANS. Now to say truly, no man knew of what Nation they were, nor from whence they came: as well for that they had no friendship with any other People, as also because they came out of a farre Countrey, as a Cloud of People that was spread all over GAULE and ITALY. It was doubted much they were a People of GERMANY, dwelling about the North side: and this they conjectured by view of the greatnesse of their Bodies, and also for that they had dark blew eyes and red, besides that the GRECIANS in their Tongue do call Theeves and Robbers, Cimbres. Other say, Celtica, for the great length and largenesse of the Countrey, stretching it selfe from the Coast of the great Ocean Sea; and from the North parts, drawing towards the Marishes MOEOTIDES, and the East, runneth into SCYTHIA, or TARTARIA PONTICA: and that for neighbourhood these two Nations joyned together, and went out of their Countrey, not that they made this great voyage all at one time, but at many sundry times, marching yearly in the Spring further and further into the Countrey. And thus by continuance of time, they passed by force of Armes through all the firme Land of EUROPE: and that for this cause, although they had many particular Names according to the diversity of their Nations, yet all this Masse and multitude of People gathered together, were called notwithstanding, the Army of the CELTOSCYTHES, as who would say, the CELTOTARTARES. Other hold opinion that the Nation of the CIMMERIANS, who were known in old time for ancient GRECIANS, the one part of them were not very great in respect of the whole, the which being fled (or driven out of their Countrey for some civill diffention) were compelled by the TARTARES to passe beyond the Marishes MOEOTIDES, into the Countries of ASIA, under the conduction of a Captaine called Ligdamis. But the residue of them, which were a far greater number, and more Warlike men, they dwelt in the furthest parts of the Earth, adjoining to the great Ocean Sea, in a darke shadowed Countrey covered with wonderfull Forrests, of such length, and so great and thick, and the Trees so high, that the Sun can have no Power upon the ground, and they joyne hard upon the great Forrest of HERCYNIA. And furthermore, they are under such a climate, where the Pole is of such a height by the inclination of the Circles equidistant, which they call Paralleles, that it is not farre from the Point that answereth directly to the plummet upon the head of the Inhabitants: and where the daies are Equinoctiall. They do devide all their time in two parts, the which giveth Homer occasion to faigne, that when Ulysses would call upon the dead, he went into the Countrey of the CIMMERIANS, as into the Countrey of Hell. And this is the cause why they say these Barbarous People left their owne Countries to come into ITALY, which from the beginning were called CIMMERIANS, and afterwards they say, (and not without great likelihood) that they were surnamed CIMBRES: howbeit that is spoken rather by a likely conjecture, then by any assured troth of History. And as for the multitude of men, the most part of Historiographers do Write, that they were rather more then lesse, then we have spoken of: and that they were so hardy and Valiant, that nothing could stand before them, they did so great things by the strength of their hands, where they fought with any, so violently and so sodainly that they seemed to be like a Lightning Fire all about where they came. By means whereof, they met with no man that durst resist them, but scraped together and carried away all that they found, hand over head: and there were many ROMANE Captaines appointed Governours to keepe that which the ROMANES held in GAULE beyond the Mountaines, who with great Armies were shamefully overthrowne by them. The cowardlinesse of those whom they had overcome, was the chiefeft cause that moved them to direct their journey to ROME. For when they had vanquished the first they had fought withall, and gotten great riches also: they were so fleshed by this, that they determined to stay no where, before they had destroyed ROME, and sacked all ITALY. the ROMANES hearing of this out of all parts, sent for Marius to give him the conduction and leading of these Warres, and chose him Consull the second time: notwithstanding that it was directly against the Law, that did expressely forbid any man to be chosen being absent, and untill also a certaine time appointed had past betwene the vacation and Election, before they could chuse him Officer twice in one Office. Some alledged this Law, of intent to hinder the Election: but the People repulled them, objecting to the contrary, that this was not the first time the Law had given place to the benefit of the Common-wealth, and that the occasion offered to abrogate the Law at that present, was no lesse then former occasions by the which they chose Scipio Consull, against the course and time appointed by the Law, not for any feare they stood in to lose their owne Countrey, but for the desire they had to destroy the Countrey of the CARTHAGINIANS, by reason whereof the People proceeded to Election. And Marius bringing home his Army againe out of LYBIA into ITALY, tooke possession of his Consullship the first day of January (on which day the ROMANES begin their yeare) and therewithall made his Triumph into the City of ROME, shewing that to the ROMANES, which they thought never to have seene: and that was, King Jugurth Prisoner, who was so subtil a man, and could so well frame himselfe unto his fortune, and with his craft and subtilty was of so great courage besides, that none of his Enemies ever hoped to have had him alive. But it is said, that after he was led in this Triumph, he fell mad straight upon it: and the Pompe of Triumph being ended, he was carried into Prison, where the Sergeants for hast to have the spoile of him, tore his apparell by force from off his back: and because they would take away his rich Gold Eare-rings that hung at his Eares, they pulled away with them the tippe of his Eare, and then cast him naked to the bottom of a deepe Dungeon, his wits being altogether troubled. Yet when they did throw him downe, laughing he said: O Hercules, how cold are your Stoves? He lived there yet six daies, fighting with hunger, and desiring alwaies to prolong his miserable Life unto the last houre: the which was a just deserved punishment for his wicked Life. In this Triumph Marius caused the Senate to Assemble within the Capitoll, where he entred into the company with his Triumphant Robe, either because he forgot it, or else of too grosse and uncivill arrogancy: but perceiving that all the Assembly misliked of it, he rose suddenly, and tooke his long Consuls Gown, and then returned quickly againe into his place. Furthermore, Marius departing to goe to the Warres, thought to traine his Army by the way, and to harden his Souldiers unto labour, causing them to run every way, making great long journeys, compelling each Souldier to carry his owne Furniture, and to prepare him necessary Victuals to finde himselfe withall: so that ever after they made a Proverbe of it, and called such as were painfull and willing to do that which they were commanded without grudging, Marius Moiles. Other notwithstanding doe shew another cause and beginning of this Proverbe: for they say, that Scipio lying at the siege of the City of NUMANTIA, would not onely take view of the Armour and Horfes of Service that were in his Army, but also of the Moiles and other Beasts of burden, because he would see how they were kept and furnished. So Marius brought his Horfe and Moile to the Muster which he kept himselfe, fat, faire, and very well drest; and his Moiles haire so slick and smooth, and therewithal so lusty and trim, as none of the rest were like unto them. Scipio tooke great pleasure to see these Beasts so well kept, and in so good plight: insomuch as he spake of it afterwards many a time and oft. And upon his words, this manner of talke was taken up ever after, and became a common Proverbe: when they meane to mock any man that is painfull, and given to fore labour, making as though they would praise him, they call him Marius Moile. Furthermore, it was a happy turne for Marius (in mine opinion) that these Barbarous People (like in force to the beating back of the raging Seas) turned their first fury towards SPAIN: and that he in the meane space had time and leasure to traine and exercise his Souldiers to make them bold, and withall, himselfe to be thoroughly known amongst them. For when by little and little they had learned not to offend, nor disobey, then they found his rough commanding, and sharpe severity in punishing such as slacked their duty, both profitable and very necessary, besides that it was also just and reasonable. Againe his great fury, his sharpe words, and his fierce looks, after they had a while bene used to them, by little and little they seemed nothing so fearefull to them, as to their Enemies. But the thing that pleased the Souldiers more then all the rest, was his justice and upright dealing: whereof they report such an example: Marius had a Nephew of his in his Campe, called Caius Lucius, who had charge of men in the Army. This Lucius was taken for a marvellous honest man, saying that he had this foule Vice in him, that he would be suddenly in love with fair young Boyes: and as at that time he fell in love with a trim young stripling, called Trebonius, that served under him, and having many times lewdly enticed him, and never could obtaine his purpose, at the last sent for him one night by his Servant. The young man might not disobey his Captaine being sent for, but presently went unto him. When he was come into his Tent, and that his Captaine did strive with all his force to doe him villany: he drew out his Sword, and killed him in the place. And this was done when Marius was out of his Campe: who so soone as he returned, caused the Marshall to bring the young man before him. Many stepped forth straight to accuse him, but no man to defend him. Wherefore he boldly began to tell his tale himselfe, and to Name many Witneses, who had both seene and known how his dead Captaine had oftentimes offered him dishonour, and how that he had continually resisted his abominable motion, and would never yeeld himselfe unto him, for any Gift or Present he could offer him. Wherefore Marius commending him greatly, and being very glad of it, caused presently one of those Crownes to be brought unto him, which are used to be given to them, that in a day of Battell have done some Valiant deed, and he himselfe did Crown Trebonius withall, as one that had done a Noble Act, and at such a time, as good and honest examples were requisite. This judgement of Marius being carried to ROME, stood him to great good purpose towards the obtaining of his third Consullship: beside also that they looked for the coming backe of these Barbarous People about the Spring, with whom the ROMANE Souldiers would not fight under any other Captaine then Marius. Howbeit they came not so soone againe as they looked for them, but Ma-rius passed over also the year of his third Consullship. So time coming about againe for the Election of the new Consuls and his companion also being dead, he was driven to goe himselfe unto ROME, leaving the charge of his Campe in his absence unto Marius Acilius. At that time there were many Noble men that sued for the Consullship: but Lucius Saturninus one of the Tribunes, who had the Commonalty under his Girdle as he would himselfe, more then any of the other Tribunes, and being wonne under hand by Marius, made many Orationes, in the which he perswaded the People to chuse Marius Consull the fourth time. Marius to the contrary, seemed to refuse it, saying, that he would none of it, though the People chose him. Whereupon Saturninus called him Traitor, crying out, That his refusal in such a danger and time of necessity, was an apparant part to betray the Common-wealth. It was found straight that this was a grosse pack betwixt Saturninus and Marius, by such as could see day at a little hole. Nevertheless, the People considering that their Present troubles required Marius skill and good Fortune in the Warres, they made him Consull the fourth time, and joynd Catulus Lullatius Consull with him, a man that was greatly honoured of the Nobility, and not misliked also of the common People. Marius having Newes of the approaching of the Barbarous People, passed over the Alpes with great speed, and fortifying his Campe by the River of RHODNE, he brought great provision of all kinds of Victuals thither with him, lest being straitened by lacke thereof, he should be forced to come to Battell at any other time but even as he would himselfe, and as it should seem good unto him. And where before that time the transporting of Victuals unto his Campe by Sea was very long, and dangerous, and a marvellous great charge besides: he made it very short and easie by this means. The mouth of the River of RHODNE had gathered together so much Mud, and such store of Sand, which the waves of the Sea had cast on heapes together, that the same was become very high and deep: so as the banks made the entry into it very narrow, hard, and dangerous for great Ships of burden that came from the Sea. Marius considering this matter, set his men on worke while they had nothing to do, and made them digge a large Trench, and deep Channell, into the which he turned a great part of the River, and carried it to a convenient place of the Coast, where the Water fell into the Sea by an open gulf, whereby he made it able to carry the greatest Ships that were: and besides that, it was in a very still quiet place, not being troubled with windes nor waves. The Channell carrieth yet his Name, and is called Marius Channell or Trench. These Barbarous People divided themselves into two Armies to passe into ITALY, so that it fell out to the one part which were the CIMBRES, to go through high GERMANIE, and to force that passage which Catulus kept: and unto the other part, which were the TEUTONS and AMBRONS, to passe through the Countrey of the GENE-VESIANS by the Sea side against Marius. Now the CIMBRES having the greater compass to fetch about, stayed longer, and remained behind: but the TEUTONS and the AMBRONS going their way first, had in few daies dispatched their journey they had to go, to bring them to the Campe where the ROMANES lay, unto whom they presented themselves by infinite numbers, with terrible faces to behold, and their cries and voices farre contrary unto other mens. They tooke in a marvellous deale of Ground in length to Campe upon, and so came forth to defie Marius, and provoke him to Battell in open Field. Marius made no reckoning of all their bragging defiance, but kept his men together within his Campe, taking on terribly with them that would rashly take upon them to move ought to the contrary, and which through impatience of choler would needs go forth to fight, calling them Traitors to their Countrey. For said he, we are not come to fight for our private glory, neither to win Triumphs nor Victories for our selves: but we must seeke by all means to divert and put by this great shower of Warres from us, and this Lightning and Tempest, that it overcome not all ITALY. These words he spake unto the private Captaines which were under him, as unto men of behaviour and quality: but as for the common Souldiers, he made them stand upon the Trenches of his Campe, one after another to behold the Enemies, and to acquaint themselves with figat of their faces, their countenance, and marching, and not to be afraid of their voices, and the manner of their speech, which was wonderfull strange and beastly: and also that they might know the fashion of their Weapons, and how they handled them. And by this order and ordinary viewing of them, in time he made the things that seemed fearful unto his men at the first sight, to be afterwards very familiar: so that they made no more wondering at them. For he judged the thing which indeed is true, that a rare and new matter never seene before, for lack of judgement and understanding maketh things unknown to us, more horrible and fearefull then they are: and to the contrary, that custome taketh away a great deale of feare and terror of those things, which by nature are indeed fearefull. The which was seene then by experience. For they being daily acquainted to looke upon these Barbarous People, it did not onely diminish some part of the former feare of the ROMANE Souldiers: but furthermore, they whetting their coler with the fierce untolerable threats and braggs of these Barbarous brutish People, did set their hearts afire to fight with them, because they did not onely waste and destroy all the Countrey about them, but besides that, came to give assault even unto their Campe, with such a boldnesse, that the ROMANE Souldiers could no longer suffer them, and they letted not to speake words that came to Marius eares himselfe. What cowardlinesse hath Marius ever known in us, that he keeps us thus from fighting, and under locke and Key as it were, in the guard of Porters, as if we were Women? Let us therefore shew our selves like Men; and goe aske him if he looke for any other Souldiers, besides our selves to defend ITALY: and if he have determined to employ us as Pioners onely, when he would cast a trench to rid away the mud, or to turne a River contrary. For therein hath he onely hitherto employed us in great labour, and they are the notable workes he hath done in his two Consulships, whereof he maketh his boast unto them at ROME. Is he afraid they should take him as they did Carbo and Cepio, whom the Enemies have overthrowne? He must not be afraid of that: for he is a Captaine of another manner of valour and reputation then they were, and his Army much better then theirs was. But howsoever it be, yet were it much better (in proving) to lose something, then to be idle, and to suffer our friends and confederates to be destroyed and sacked before our eyes. Marius was marvellous glad to hear his men complaine thus, and did comfort them, and told them that he did nothing mistrust their courage and valientnesse: howbeit that through the Counsell of certaine Prophecies and Oracles of the gods, he did expect time and place fit for Victory. For he ever carried a SYRIAN Woman in a Litter about with him, called Martha, with great reverence, whom they said had the spirit of Prophecy in her: and that he did ever Sacrifice unto the gods by her order, and at such time as she willed him to doe it. This SYRIAN Woman went first to speake with the Senate about these matters, and did foretell and Prognosticate what should follow: but the Senate would not hear her, and made her to be driven away. Whereupon she went unto the Women, and made them see prooffe of some things she vaunted of, and specially Marius Wife, at whose feet she was set one day in Assembly of the common Playes, to see the Sword Players fight for Life and death: for the told her certainly which of them should overcome. Whereupon this Lady sent her unto her Husband Marius, who made great reckoning of her, and carried her ever in a Litter with him wheresoever he went. She was always at Marius Sacrifices, apparelled in a Gown of Purple in graine, clasped to her with Claspes, and held a Speare in her hand wound all about with Nosegayes and Garlands of flowers tied on with Laces. This manner of gift made many doubt whether Marius shewed this Woman openly, believing indeed that she had the gift of Prophecy: or else that knowing the contrary, he made as though he did beleieve it, to helpe her faining. But that which Alexander the MINDIAN wrote touching Vultures, is a thing greatly to be wondered at: For he said, there were two of them followed Marius in his Warres, and that they ever shewed themselves, and missed not, when he should win any great Battell, and that they did know them by Lattin collars they wore about their neckes, which the Souldiers had tied about them, and afterwards let them goe where they would: by reason whereof, they did know the Souldiers againe, and it seemed also that they saluted them, and were very glad when they saw them, and perswaded themselves, that it was a signe and token of good luck to follow. Many signes and tokens were seen before the Battell: howbeit all the rest were ordinary sights, saving that which was reported to be seen at TUDERTUM, and AMERIA, two Cities of ITALY. For they say, there were seen Speares and Targets in the night, burning like fire in the Element, which first were carried up and down here and there, and then met together even as men move and stirre that fight one with another, untill at the length, the one giving back, and the other following after, they all vanished away, and consumed towards the West. About the selfe same time also, there came from the City of PESSINUNTA, Barabaces, the chiefe Priest of the great Mother of the gods, who brought Newes, that the goddesse had spoken to him within her Sanctuary, and told him that the Victory of this War should fall out on the ROMANE side. The Senate beleevied it, and ordained that they should build a Temple unto the goddesse, to give her thanks for the Victory which she did promise them. Barabaces also would have presented himselfe unto the People in open Assembly to tell them as much. But there was one Aulus Pompeius a Tribune, that would not suffer him to do it, calling him tumbler or juggler, and violently thrust him behind the Pulpit for Orations: but the mischance that fell upon Pompeius afterwards, made them the more to beleieve Barabaces words. For Pompeius the Tribune no sooner came home to his House, but a great vehement Ague tooke him, whereof he died the seventh day after, as all the world could witnesse. Now the TEBUTONS perceiving that Marius stirred not at all out of his Campe, they proved to assault him: howbeit they were so well received with Shot and slings, that after they had lost certaine of their men, they gave it over, and determined to goe further, perswading themselves that they might easily passe the Alpes without danger. Wherefore trussing up all their baggage, they passed by Marius Campe: at which time it appeared
